extra prints supplied to the defendant at his request, and accepted by him, which is a reasonable charge for the said work so performed by the plaintiff; (5) the defendant further in, or about, the month of March, 1906, employed the plaintiff as architect to prepare plans and specifications, as well as bills of quantities for certain alterations and additions to a certain hotel at Worcester, known as the Commercial Hotel, for the customary and usual remuneration, as aforesaid. The estimated cost of the said alterations and additions to the said hotel was the sum of £1,200; (6) the plaintiff, in pursuance of the said contract of employment, duly prepared the said plans and specifications, as well as the said bills of quantities, and the defendant duly accepted and used the same; (7) thereupon the plaintiff became, and was, entitled to the said customary and usual remuneration of 2½ per cent., reckoned upon the said estimated cost in respect of the said plans and specifications, and a further 2½ per cent. so reckoned in respect of the said bills of quantities, being in all the sum of £60, which is a reasonable remuneration for the work so performed by the plaintiff; (8) the defendant is further justly and lawfully indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £30 sterling, being for professional services rendered and expenses incurred in connection therewith by the plaintiff for and on behalf of and at the special instance and request of the defendant between the months of March and October, 1906. The said services were rendered in connection with the Masonic Hotel, Beaufort West, and an account thereof and of the said expenses has been duly rendered to the defendant. (9) All times have elapsed, all things have been done and all conditions have been fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiff to claim from the defendant payment of the said sums of £3,000, £25, £60, and £30 (or £3,115 in all), with interest à tempore morae. (b) Alternative relief. (c) Costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows: (1) Paragraph 1 of the plaintiff's declaration is admitted. (2) As to paragraphs 2 and 3 thereof, defendant says that in February, 1905, plaintiff and one Armstrong approached defendant to join them in a scheme for the flotation of a limited liability company to erect and own an hotel on the site of Poole's Hotel, Cape Town, the said Poole's Hotel being defendant's property. (3) Plaintiff proposed that he, Armstrong, and defendant should be jointly interested in the scheme, and that the approximate cost of the hotel should be £100,000. (4) Defendant undertook to assist in the scheme, and plaintiff for the purposes thereof and in the mutual interests of the parties aforesaid undertook to prepare plans, drawings, specifications, and estimates of cost, to enable defendant to proceed to England on behalf of the said parties with a view to effect the flotation of the proposed company. (5) Thereafter plaintiff prepared plans, drawings, and specifications accordingly, and upon their completion to the mutual satisfaction of the parties jointly interested as aforesaid, the plans were submitted to and approved of by the Corporation of the City of Cape Town as a necessary preliminary to the flotation or the company upon the basis thereof. (6) Up to the present time, owing to the prevalent general depression, no further steps have been taken by the parties to the said scheme to effect the flotation of the proposed company. (7) It was agreed between the parties in the event of the company being floated and the hotel being erected, that plaintiff should act as architect and receive fees in the usual course for the plans prepared and other work performed by him in such capacity. (8) Save as above, defendant denies each and all the allegations in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the declaration and specially that the employed plaintiff as architect to prepare the said plans, drawings, and specifications. He denies that he is responsible to plaintiff in any event for his fees in regard to the preparation of the said plans, and says that plaintiff will not be entitled to recover such fees unless and until the said company is floated and the said hotel erected pursuant to the arrangements made as aforesaid. (9) With regard to paragraph 4, he admits that plaintiff prepared certain extra prints for the furtherance of the flotation in England of the proposed company, and says that the said prints were supplied in terms of the arrangement aforesaid and for the furtherance of the common project. Otherwise he denied the allegations in paragraph 4 of the declaration. (10) Defendant admits that he employed plaintiff as set out in paragraph 5 of the declaration, and says that plaintiff undertook to prepare plans and specifications for the alterations and additions required to the defendant's licensed premises at Worcester, known as the Commercial Hotel, on the special stipulation that the actual cost of making such alterations and additions should not exceed £1,000. He says, further, that tenders for the execution of the work set out in the plans and specifications as prepared by plaintiff were duly called for, but that, as all the tenders received were for sums far in excess of the limit of £1,000, no tender was acceptable or accepted. (11) The plans and specifications were thereupon returned to plaintiff to enable him to alter and reduce them as to allow of the work being executed at the specified cost, and they are in plaintiff's possession, and have not, so far as defendant is aware, been so altered and reduced. Defendant has not received bills of quantities for the proposed work and he has made no use whatsoever of the plans and specifications thereof. Defendant is prepared to pay to plaintiff whatever sum he may be entitled to in respect thereof upon completion of satisfactory plans and specifications framed in such a manner as to enable the work to be done for the sum specified, but denies that plaintiff is now entitled to claim any remuneration in respect of the preparation of the plans and specifications and bills of quantities returned to and in the possession of plaintiff. Save as above, he denies each and all the allegations in paragraph 5, 6, and 7 of the declaration. (12) With regard to paragraph 8 of the declaration, defendant admits having in the month of March, 1906, engaged plaintiff to inspect and report on certain building operations at Beaufort West, and that plaintiff did some small services and wrote two or three letters in connection therewith, but says that the charge of £30 in respect of the services rendered and expenses incurred in connection therewith is excessive. He admits that he is liable to pay to plaintiff a reasonable sum in respect of such services and expenditure, and says that he is prepared and hereby tenders to pay to plaintiff a sum of £25 (with costs to date hereof) in full satisfaction of plaintiff's claim under this head. (13) Paragraph 9 of the declaration is denied. Wherefore, subject to the above tender, defendant prays that plaintiff's claims may be dismissed with costs.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones for plaintiff. Mr. Close (with him Mr. Bisset) for defendant.

Arthur T. O'Brien, the plaintiff, stated his qualifications as an architect were obtained in America. In February, 1905, the defendant employed him in connection with the proposed hotel. Armstrong introduced him to the defendant on the 9th of that month. After talking over the proposal, the defendant employed him to draw plans and specifications for a hotel on the site of the present Poole's Hotel, to be known as the Hotel Selborne. Mr. Logan had some sketches drawn by Messrs. Parker and Forsyth, but said he thought them too ordinary. The defendant handed witness the drawings, and said, "Kick off and get on with these drawings." Witness produced drawings in March, which the defendant approved of. About July 25, the defendant said he was endeavouring to buy more property as he wanted a larger hotel. Eventually he did, witness was informed by him, purchase additional ground. In October, 1905, the defendant said he wanted two hotels under one roof. The original scheme had about 80 rooms, and the new one 120 rooms, so that one manager could run the two houses. He was instructed to prepare working plans for the new arrangement. Witness told Mr. Logan the cost would be approximately £125,000, and the defendant did not limit him. The witness gave evidence as to further interviews and correspondence with Mr. Logan, and deposed as to receiving a permit from the Town Council in connection with the erection of the Hotel Selborne. The plans were approved by Mr. Logan, and witness had done all that was necessary in order that the work should be proceeded with. He had drawn up the specifications. The charge he made of 2½ per cent. on the estimate was the usual one in such cases. He estimated that the cost of the building was, roundly, £120,000. It worked out, on cube measurement, at £122,388. There were no bills of quantities taken out. He had made repeated demands to Mr. Logan for some payment on account, but had received nothing. There was much correspondence. Mr. Logan refused to pay him anything. On sending a detailed account on the 16th February, he received a reply from the defendant in which he said he objected to being spoofed, and had consigned the account to the waste paper basket. The writer said that he (O'Brien) knew very well the conditions he had agreed to, and that when the work commenced he would be paid as it went on. With regard to the Commercial Hotel, Worcester, witness prepared specifications and bills of quantities and took tenders. There was, however, no building work carried out there. Defendant asked whether it could be done for a thousand. Witness said he did not know until he got it on paper, but that he thought it would be about £1,500. He told witness to go on and that afterwards they could cut it down. On his instructions witness called for tenders, the lowest of which was £1,857. Mr. Logan complained of this as being too high, and eventually it was cut down to £1,059. Mr. Logan had previously told him to try and get them down to £1,200. It was not customary for the proprietor to receive bills of quantities. It was impossible to get tenders without bills of quantities. Witness did not guarantee an estimate. On witness cutting the figures down to £1,060, Mr. Logan said that if the contractor (Mr. Poole) would do it for £1,000, he would give him the extra £60 if he did a good job. This was agreed to, but nothing further was done.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Armstrong, who was a contractor, introduced witness to Logan, and the latter said he had some land, and wanted to build a hotel costing about £50,000. He said he estimated the land and the licence as being worth £50,000. Witness was instructed to prepare sketches for a hotel worth £50,000. In July, 1905, Mr. Logan told witness he had acquired more land adjoining the site of the proposed hotel. Armstrong was the representative of Milligan Bros., a firm of steel-work contractors in the United States. Witness was not dealing with Armstrong; he was dealing with Logan. He always understood that Mr. Logan would find the money for the building.

Evidence was given as to the reasonableness of the plaintiff's charges by J. Collingwood Tully, F.R.I.B.A., and Frederick Cherry, M.R.I.A.I.

The plaintiff (re-called) said the work in connection with the Hotel Selborne matter occupied him about two months. Witness and two others were engaged on the plans. These other two were his brothers, and they were fully qualified architects. He paid them £30 and £25 a month respectively.

Mr. Jones closed his case.

James D. Logan, the defendant, said that Armstrong, whom he did not know previously, wrote to him asking for an interview, so that he might lay a proposition before him for the re-building of Poole's Hotel. Armstrong and plaintiff called upon him together, that being the first occasion upon which he had seen either of them. At that interview Armstrong said he (witness) had one of the best sites in Cape Town upon which to build a hotel. He suggested that they should form a company to build a hotel. Witness informed them that he had already formed that intention, and had plans out. Messrs. Parker and Forsyth had previously prepared plans, and there were negotiations in 1902 with reference to the formation of a company. At the interview referred to, it was agreed that the cost of the building should not exceed £100,000. Witness was to sell the land for £50,000, £25,000 to be in cash and the balance in shares. Witness was to supply half the capital, on the condition that his firm should supply the liquor to the hotel, and Armstrong undertook to find the other half of the capital, on condition that his firm should have the steel work to do. O'Brien and Armstrong, witness understood, were working together. O'Brien's fees were not discussed, except to the extent that he was to have his ordinary fees, after the work was commenced. O'Brien's share in the enterprise was that he was to provide the plans. Witness did not employ O'Brien to do this work on his (witness's) account. It was Armstrong's suggestion that O'Brien should do the work.

By the Court: Armstrong said that O'Brien would do the work as architect, and should not have any fees until the work went through. O'Brien agreed to this.

Examination continued: It was perfectly understood that this work should be done with a view to a company being formed. Witness did not contemplate building the hotel for himself. Times in respect to hotel business were then very bad. Before that time—in 1902, when matters were much better—his project was to build a hotel costing £50,000, and that also was with a view to forming a company. There was no engagement of Mr. O'Brien by witness individually. Witness got a copy of the plans from the plaintiff for the purpose of taking them to England. Witness told O'Brien there ought to be a proper notarial agreement drawn up. The prospects of floating a company grew worse as time went on. The present was not an opportune time to float such a company. Witness was willing to perform his part of the agreement, and if Mulligans agreed, the plaintiff would be employed as architect in the carrying out of these plans. In regard to the Commercial Hotel matter, witness told O'Brien at the outset that he would not pay a penny more than £1,000. On ascertaining that the lowest tender was £1,200, witness declined to accept it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He never instructed O'Brien to take out bill of quantities in connection with the Commercial Hotel work. He never agreed that £1,200 would be a fair price for the work. Witness thought that O'Brien was one with Milligan Bros. O'Brien did all this work on the off-chance of the company being floated. Armstrong had gone away. If the latter carried out his undertaking on behalf of Milligan Bros., witness would perform his part. As a matter of fact, witness, Armstrong, and O'Brien were a syndicate.

Mr. Jones: Do you hold this agreement is binding on Milligan Bros?

Witness: It is binding on Armstrong.

You entered into an agreement of this sort right off the reel with persons you had never seen before?—Yes.

You were dealing with £50,000 worth of your property, with people you had never made any inquiry about?—I would have done nothing affecting my property without being careful.

Re-examined, Mr. Logan said that Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Armstrong came to him with much larger ideas than he had entertained when he thought of floating a company in connection with the new hotel.

[Hopley, J.: The company might have been floated if there had not been this depression?]

Witness: I am still prepared to carry out my part of the agreement.

Herbert Kitson, secretary to Mr. Logan, gave corroborative evidence. He said that so far as he was aware Mr. Logan never contemplated building the new hotel himself, this idea being to float a company. It was agreed between Mr. Logan and the plaintiff that the price for the Commercial Hotel, Worcester, should be £1,000.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He did not remember that plaintiff ever gave a guarantee that this work would be done for £1,000. He looked upon plaintiff as subsidiary to Armstrong in the matter of the Hotel Selborne.

Mr. Close closed his case.

Mr. Jones contended that, subject to the Court being satisfied of the engagement of plaintiff by the defendant as architect, for the Hotel Selborne, plaintiff was entitled to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commission on the contemplated cost, the work having been abandoned through no fault of the architect. He quoted Emden on the Law of Leases and Building Contracts, 103, 106, and 109; Hudson on Building Contracts, vol. 1, p. 78, and referred to the cases of De Wit v. Cape Canning Company, 11 S.C.R., 116; Ackermann v. Adamson, 19, S.C.R., 274; Le Sean v. Nourse (Transvaal S.C.R., 1903, 814); and quoted Nathan, vol. 3, section 1,449. The onus was on the defendant, he urged, to show the terms of employment. The presumption was strongly in the plaintiff's favour, and he submitted that he had not discharged the onus of rebutting that presumption. Counsel further referred to the case of Rore v. Gotherph (11 C.T.R., 666), and said if the Court found on a quantum meruit, and the work were hereafter proceeded with, the plaintiff's claim for the full 5 per cent. would be met with a plea of res judicata, and that was the reason why plaintiff now claimed the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which, in the circumstances, he (counsel) contended the architect was entitled to.

Mr. Close submitted that the defendant's version of the arrangement between himself, Armstrong, and O'Brien was the correct one, viz., that it was an engagement between the three to build this hotel subject to a company being floated. It was, he urged, only agreed that plans should be drawn up for the purpose of floating a company, and that the work should be done for the company, and should be paid for by the company. At the most, there was only a common employment of plaintiff by the two: Logan and Armstrong. On the facts he submitted that the arrangement was either, as Mr. Logan had said, or that there was a complete misunderstanding, and that the parties were at cross purposes, and there was no agreement between them. As to the question of the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., counsel argued that there was no evidence of custom, and that if there were such custom proved, it was not recoverable. He quoted Hudson, 78 and 87; Emden, 104, and contended that a reasonable remuneration for the plaintiff's services was £130, and for his assistants' work £75. Mr. Close, in further argument, cited 2, Macassey and Strong, 25, and the cases of Rore v. Gotherph, Ackermann v. Adamson, De Wit v. Cape Canning Company, Le Sean v. Nourse, Lucke v. Von Coller (10 C.T.R., 338), and Pearce v. Pearce and Walker (19, E.D.C. Rep., 80).

Mr. Jones having replied,

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff for £350, with costs.

Hopley, J., reviewed the facts of the case, and said he found as a fact on the evidence that there was no evidence of any agreement between the plaintiff and Armstrong, nor any understanding by which they should work together as partners in this matter. He (the learned judge) thought that the evidence showed that the plaintiff was taken by Armstrong to the defendant as a competent architect who would be able to aid in the pushing through of the scheme formed by Logan and Armstrong. Both the defendant and Anderson were at the time satisfied that this scheme would go through, and it seemed a priori unlikely that there was anything like a bargain with the architect that he was to do the work at his own risk and was not to be paid unless there were a successful flotation of the company. Although Mr. Logan may have had an idea in his mind that all these costs would come out of the flotation of the company, and although he may not have thought at the time that he was rendering himself individually liable for these costs for the preparation of the plans and so forth, and although the idea may have got crystallised in his mind that that was the real state of affairs—that the company was eventually to pay and that he himself was not liable—still he (the learned judge) did not think that anything was said at the time of the transactions which would set up the state of affairs which Mr. Logan now wished to maintain. Both the defendant and the plaintiff might be perfectly honest in their evidence, but he thought that the plaintiff's recollection of the matter was the more trustworthy, and also that it was supported by the course of conduct of the parties, and by the written correspondence which had passed. As to the amount claimed by the plaintiff, the Court had never been bound by the arbitrary scales laid down by the body of architects in England, and had never adopted as a basis for their charges by architects in this country what seemed to be the customary remuneration in England; it had rather been the rule of the Courts here that if a contract had not been carried to completion, and if there was no custom proved as to the exact amount, the Court should fix as best it could a sum which it thought the architect's work was worth. In the present case, as in the case of Rore v. Gotherph, plans had been approved and accepted, and to a certain extent acted upon. Now such plans were only steps towards carrying out a project from which, if it were completed, both the employer and the architect would receive considerable benefits; the former in the shape of a completed building, the latter by way of customary fees and charges; but it would be, to his mind, an injustice that an owner should be required to pay very large fees when the scheme never saw completion. He did not think the Court had ever gone so far in this country as to say that a man should pay the same as though he had got the full advantage of the scheme being carried out. What was done in such circumstances was that the architect was given what the Court considered to be a fair remuneration for his work, and on this basis it seemed to him that £250 would be a fair amount to allow the plaintiff for the work of himself and of his assistants in this matter. With regard to the extra plans, he found that they had been ordered by the defendant, and he thought £20 would be a fair sum to award. As to the matter of the Commercial Hotel, Worcester, his lordship said he did not think that the plaintiff, in his instructions, was absolutely limited to the £1,000, nor that it was clearly put to him that he would be entitled to nothing if this sum was exceeded. He therefore thought that the plaintiff was entitled to payment of £50 in respect of that work. The result would be that judgment would be given for £250 in respect of the work on the Hotel Selborne, £20 for the extra plans, £50 in regard to the Commercial Hotel work, and £30, as tendered, for the other work—£350 in all—with costs.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

WESTERN WINE CO. AND OTHERS V. FEDERAL COLD STORAGE CO.	{ 1907. Feb. 20th. Apl. 23rd. " 24th. " 30th. May 10th.

Commonage—Servitude—Registration—Filing of general

One O. B. had sold certain even on his farm subject to the right of purchasers to user of a certain commonage shown on a general plan of the farm filed with the Registrar of Deeds. Thereafter the defendant's predecessor in title purchased certain of these even and also the remaining extent. Defendants denied the servitude and had encroached on the commonage by appropriating to their exclusive use certain portions thereof. Plaintiffs now claimed a declaration of rights in respect of the commonage.

Held, that, as the filing of the general plan with the title deeds was equivalent to the registration of a servitude, the defendants must be ordered to remove such fences as protected their encroachments.

This was an action brought by certain six plaintiffs, who are erf-holders at a place called Berghville, near Tulbagh Station, against the defendant company to have their rights declared in respect of certain property that they hold at Berghville, and for damages.

The declaration set out that in the year 1875 one Oloff P. Bergh was the proprietor of the farm Nooitgedacht, in the Tulbagh division, and as such proprietor Bergh caused to be laid out on the farm a village which he called Berghville, and he caused to be prepared a general plan showing a subdivision of the ground, and showing certain pieces of ground adjoining the lots as commonage for the benefit of the lots. On the 5th May and 27th September, the same year Bergh caused to be sold by public auction a number of these lots according to this general plan, which plan was filed in the office of the Registrar of Deeds. The auctioneers sold by public auction on condition that the buyers of lots and erven and their successors in title would have equal rights of grazing on the commonage. The plaintiffs were either original purchasers of erven, or as successors in title they were entitled to all the rights of the original purchasers. Subsequent to the sale by public auction about 1900 Bergh sold all the land left vested in him to one Verster, predecessor in title of the defendant company. In 1903 and 1904 the defendant company having purchased the land now owned by them from Verster encroached upon the commonage rights of the plaintiff and others by cultivating and fencing in certain portions of the commonage. They claimed exclusive control of the commonage, and denied that the plaintiffs had any rights. The first two plaintiffs, D. L. Malherbe and Jacob Caplin, claimed damages in £250, and the others £50 each, with a declaration of rights, and an order compelling the defendant company to remove all fences erected which interfered with the free access of plaintiffs and their cattle, and an interdict.

The plea admitted that in 1875 Mr. Bergh was the owner of the farm, and that he caused a general plan to be prepared. Plaintiffs denied that the portions were reserved as commonage for the benefit of the lots. In 1877, Bergh sold and transferred to one Joubert portion of the land now claimed by the plaintiffs as commonage. It was denied that the purchasers of the erven and their predecessors in title bought their lots upon conditions contained in the declaration that the commonage was reserved. Verster sold to the Verster Cold Storage Company, and that company sold to the defendant company. The number of proposed lots laid down on the general plan were 214, of which 39 were deducted. Of these the plaintiffs held 18, 14 were owned by other persons, and the remaining 7 were owned by the defendants, who also owned the remaining 175 lots of the intervening spaces between them. The defendant company denied that any intervening spaces belonging to the plaintiffs were enclosed. Only the lots of which they were the owners were enclosed. The company was entitled to fence in the portion which Bergh, as of right, fenced in in 1875. In reconvention they claimed against Malherbe, one of the plaintiffs, £250, for fencing in and cultivating part of the commonage, and £100 and an interdict against Samaai, who did not reside on the lots, for trespass by grazing his cattle on the farm of the defendant. There was no claim against the others.

A general plan of the village of Berghville, transferred to O. P. Bergh in 1872, and a plan of a resurvey and extension of the village was put in from the Deeds Office.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Roux), was for the plaintiffs, and Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), was for the defendants.

Jacob Daniel Theron said that land was sold at the sale at which he was present, which was not part of the village. People bought parts outside what was pointed out as commonage. In respect of the piece which witness bought, he got no right of commonage. A considerable number of the village lots were sold. Witness lived as a tenant in the village under Fagana and De Klerck, who had purchased the lots with commonage rights. Witness exercised his rights equally with the others on the commonage, speculating in cattle. Bricks were made on the commonage by others, and witness, like the others, cut wood for his own use. During the time he was there no part of the commonage was enclosed, but some of the unsold erven were enclosed by Bergh. All the erven above the road had to get water. The lower side, where there was a river, had no right to water.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Wood and stone were got from the Government ground. He could not say who made the bricks on the commonage.

O. P. Bergh stated that the agent who acted for Isaac Verster in the sale by witness to him, saw a copy of the general plan. After the sale went through, witness made Verster a present of the general plan. The commonage, which was a large area, was of value.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Witness sold a number of lots out of hand, and in the transfers of a number of these lots there was no reference to the general plan. Witness left it to the conveyancer to give transfer. By equal rights to the water, witness meant that if he kept 100 cattle, the others would be entitled to keep the same number.

A tenant under Verster, the Verster Cold Storage, and in 1896 a tenant also under Mr. Bergh, stated that he grazed his cattle on the commonage, and during Mr. Bergh's time there was no interference. Bergh did not interfere with the erf-holders making bricks or cutting wood. Witness had built huts on the commonage, and when a surveyor came along, he ordered their removal. Mr. Verster paid the cost of their removal to within the boundary of the erven. There was some valuable grazing ground on the commonage. Before Mr. Verster sold to the Verster Cold Storage, there was no interference with the erf-holders.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The huts were not removed because coloured people who occupied them were polluting the water. Witness was positive that Verster paid for their removal.

Jacob Kaplan, one of the plaintiffs in the case, and owner of four and a half erven at Bergville, stated he had been resident there for about seventeen years, during which time he had owned several erven. About twelve years ago Mr. Berg held a sale at which the general plan was shown. The commonage was also pointed out.

Mr. Malherbe, one of the plaintiffs, said he knew the piece of commonage ground between the road to Tulbagh and the railway line. There was the railway fence on one side, but all other sides had been enclosed by the company. The extent of the ground would be close on 50 morgen, and he also complained that during the last couple of years portion had been ploughed up and cultivated. He would be satisfied on a survey to remove his fence back to the boundary, if it took in other property. Before this action he had not had any notice that he was encroaching on other property. He regarded the commonage rights of value to the erf-holders; if there were no such rights, the erven would not be worth anything. Witness had suffered damage through not having grazing ground for his cattle and horses. The cattle were accustomed to graze on the enclosed part. Three years ago witness had to purchase an adjoining piece of ground for grazing purposes.

Petrus Jacobus Uys, another of the plaintiffs, gave evidence on his diagram. He bought from Mr. Isaac Verster and took transfer in 1905. Before he bought the erven he saw people's cattle and horses grazing on the commonage, which increased the value of the adjoining property by about half. Since Berg's time, a larger portion of the commonage rights had been taken in by the company.

Noah Metter, who came to live on the property in January, 1881, gave evidence as to use which the people made of the commonage. There was no dispute until three or four years ago. Besides grazing, there were rights to water, clay, and wood. He was also present at the public sale of Mr. Berg's lots when the general plan was exhibited. There was no question that the rights of grazing, etc., on the commonage were very valuable to the erf-holders.

Walter Piers Murray, Registry Surveyor and Examiner of Diagrams in the Deeds Registry, stated that he had held that appointment since 1903. His office was a department of the Deeds Office. He produced the general plan of the village of Berghville. The plan referred to the deed of transfer of 1872, and said "for deductions see portfolio." He produced the portfolio. A large number of general plans were filed. All erven were shown on the plan. He had a plan of the lots cut off in 1901. He could not explain how the six lots, cut off from what was marked commonage on the general plan, were laid out. He regarded the general plan and the outline plan as supplementing each other.

Cross-examined: The quitrent grant and diagrams were filed in the Surveyor-General's Office.

Re-examined: General plans of a village were filed if the diagram of the farm on which the village was laid out was not large enough to show all erven. If the diagram was sufficiently large all erven would be shown on it. When the recent deductions were made the diagram of the seller or a certified copy of it would have been produced. The certified copy would be issued from the Surveyor-General's Office. The defendants could not know exactly what they bought without referring to the general plan. The actual extent of what they bought was in the transfer deed.

William de Neufville Lucas said that he had been Registrar of Deeds since 1901. The general plan was filed because the diagram could not show all deductions. It was very unusual for diagrams to be large enough to show lots. The general plan was really an extension of the diagram—a subsidiary diagram. According to the practice now obtaining in his office if any diagram or general plan contained a reference to commonage he would not allow a deed of transfer to be registered inconsistent with the general plan. The general plan should not be accepted until any servitude on the property had been registered. Until recent years these plans were filed without registration or servitudes. He regarded the general plan as a registered diagram. Even if for the present case this was sufficient registration he thought it would be better to have the servitude registered against the deed of transfer by way of an endorsement.

Cross-examined: Registration was an official act which the Registrar of Deeds was required to do. There might be a large number of documents filed in the Deeds Registry, e.g., such as powers which were recorded, but not registered. His signature would be necessary to registration, and his signature to a transfer deed would cover the diagram attached to the deed. The general plan was optional in some cases, but essential in others. If it were impossible to lay down lots clearly on the diagram, the Registry Surveyor would be justified in insisting on a general plan. Diagrams were not registered, although there was an index for diagrams and general plans. There had to be a diagram to register a deed referring to a diagram.

One might have a transfer deed without a diagram, where there was no deduction. The area of the remaining extent was given in the transfer deed, but if he was buying a piece of land like that he would find out what the "streets, etc.," referred to, were. To ascertain what had been cut off, it would be necessary to refer to the general plan, and to the index, which was really part of the general plan.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Mr. Close asked for absolution from the instance on the ground that even if there was a servitude against defendants such servitude would only allow each erfholder a reasonable use of the commonage, and there was no proof that plaintiffs had been deprived of such a reasonable use. A servitude had to be registered in the Deeds Office, and evidence of what took place at the sale was inadmissible. He referred to the case of Colonial Government v. Stephan Bros. (17 S.C., 59).

[Maasdorp, J.: You may define their use, but you cannot confine them to a certain area, and you have enclosed a portion of what they claim as commonage.]

Just as roads shown on the general plan which had become useless could be closed up, so some portion of this ground could be closed up.

[Maasdorp, J.: People entitled to the common user of a thing are entitled to the common user of the whole of it.]

The Court will always apply the principles of law which require that servitudes should be restricted, and here, even if there was a servitude, the plaintiffs still enjoy the user of a reasonable portion of the farm.

Ryno Johannes Verster said that he was manager of the defendant company. The company had a capital of half a million pounds, and was registered in England. He held between 20,000 and 25,000 shares. The farm in question was taken over from the Verster Company for £12,800. Certain other properties were also taken over; the whole lot for £105,000. He never saw the general plan, and did not know that there was a general plan with the words "Village commonage" marked on it. He didn't know of any commonage rights, and did not give defendant company any intimation of such rights.

Cross-examined: He was managing director of the Verster Company, which company sold to the defendant company. The Verster Company bought from Izak Verster, his brother. His brother, J. C. Verster, bought from Bergh for £2,000, and sold to the Verster Company for £6,000. He would be responsible for the prospectus of the Verster Company, and he bought from his brother for the Verster Company. He did not look at the title deeds of the property. He did not know where the extent of the place came from; he, Mr. Earp, and Dr. Petersen must have signed the declaration of seller.

Re-examined: He had for the last 25 years been residing in Cape Town, where he had a flourishing butchery business. The transactions between the Verster and Federal Companies took place when cold storage business was flourishing. He got £30,000 for the goodwill of his business. He knew the extent, but did not inquire if there were servitudes. He got a clear title deed, but he never looked at it. When he bought he did not know whether they were getting clear title or not, but he was not buying for himself. He did not know exactly how many erven had been cut off, but he knew how many morgen they were getting. The prospectus said so many morgen.

Edmund Yolden Taylor, a broker, said that in 1903 he was interested in the deal between the Verster Co. and the proposed (now existing) Federal Co. He made out the broker's note. He was present at the negotiations; nothing was said about a servitude.

Cross-examined: The broker's note said nothing about the extent, and nobody ever looked at the title-deeds. He had no knowledge of the extent of the land.

Bassett Bisset, Government land surveyor, said that he made a plan of the land in question. Malherbe's fence actually enclosed one whole street and portion of another and the commonage.

Cross-examined: Malherbe's fence took in a small piece of the commonage. Outside erven, about $\frac{3}{4}$ morgen, had been cultivated above the railway line, and about 48 morgen below the line, plus a piece of about three morgen inside an old fence. On reference to the general plan, it would be discovered that there was a servitude of commonage.

Mr. Close closed his case.

Mr. Searle said that there were few, if any, material facts in dispute. In fact, if it were not for the claim for damages, the matter might be decided upon exception. The facts alleged in the declaration had been substantially proved and the question was whether, upon these facts, the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief claimed. Counsel, in arguing the legal questions, quoted the cases of Hiddingh v. Tops (4. Searle's Reports, 107); Ohlsson's Cape Breweries v. Whitehead (9 Juta, 84); and Estate of Gardiner v. Town Council of Port Elizabeth (Supreme Court Cases, 507), as authorities in regard to general plans. He also quoted the case of Dryer v. Ireland, 1874 (Buchanan, 193); Steele v. Thomson (13 Moore's Privy Council Reports, 280); Hirsh v. Gill (10 Juta, 156); and referred to 10 Cape Law Journal, 20; 22 Cape Law Journal, 161; and 23 Cape Law Journal, 37, in regard to the validity of plans and diagrams. Counsel further quoted the cases of Ex Parte Kotze (22 Supreme Court Reports, 170); Colonial Orphan Chamber v. Marnitz (9 Juta, 47); Ex Parte Dutch Reformed Church of Heidelberg (15 C.T.R., 598); Richards v. Nash (1 Juta, 312); and Judd v. Fourie (2 E.D. Reports, 41). He submitted on the authority of the cases quoted that the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration of rights claimed.

Mr. Close quoted the case of Hofmeyr v. De Waal (1 Juta, 424), in support of the contention that evidence to vary a transfer deed was inadmissible unless the certain varying condition said to be made was endorsed by the parties on the transfer deed. On the question of the effect of filing in the Deeds Office, counsel quoted the case of the Steyler- ville Management Board v. Bosman (10 Juta, 67). He also referred to Voet, 8, 2, 2; 2 Maasdorp, 145; and Foster on Practice of the Deeds Office; and to the cases of the London and South African Exploration Company (8 Juta, 96); Leitjes v. Ollerendraw (3 Searle, 268); Clayton v. Metropolitan and Suburban Railway Company (10 Juta, 301); Johnson v. Fincham (9 Juta, 292); Pienaar v. Van Zyl (16 Supreme Court Reports); and Stegmann v. Bam (20 Supreme Court Reports, 1). He contended that the bulk of the authorities showed that the onus was on the plaintiffs to prove, first of all, that there was any agreement at all, and, secondly, that the defendants had express notice of it.

Mr. Searle having replied,

Cur. Adc. Full.

Postea (May 10th).

Maasdorp, J.: It is alleged in the plaintiffs' declaration that in 1875, Oloff Bergh, the owner of the farm Nooitgedacht, had a village called "Eerghville" laid out upon his farm, of which a general plan was made, showing the subdivision of the ground into a number of lots or erven, and also showing a certain piece of ground adjoining the said lots as commonage for the benefit of the lots or erven. Thereafter, in 1875, some of the erven were sold at public auction in accordance with the general plan, which was duly filed in the office of the Registrar of Deeds; and at the sale the following condition, amongst others, was announced, "that the buyers of erven and their successors in title, would all have equal rights of grazing and general commonage rights over the portion of ground reserved as commonage on the said plan." And it is further stated that all the purchasers of erven at the said sale purchased on these conditions. The plaintiffs were either purchasers at the sale, or are successors to such purchasers, and the defendants are the owners of some of the erven sold at the sale, or sold subsequently, and also of the remaining extent of the farm. It is stated that in 1903 and 1904, the defendants encroached on the commonage rights of the plaintiffs by cultivating and appropriating to their exclusive use certain portions of the commonage, and thus depriving the plaintiffs of grazing for their stock; and the defendants also enclosed certain portions of the commonage and some of the streets with a wire fence, excluding thereby the stock of the plaintiffs from the commonage. The plaintiffs allege that they have sustained damages in the sum of £50 each, and two of them, Malherbe and Caplin, specially claim damages in the sum of £250 each. They further pray for a declaration of rights, and an order compelling the defendants to remove the fences, and interdicting them from enclosing and cultivating the commonage and streets. The defendants admit that the village was laid out in accordance with the general plan which was filed in the office of the Registrar of Deeds, and which contains the words, "village commonage," in a portion of the farm not cut up into lots, but they deny that these portions were reserved as commonage for the benefit of the erven, and they also deny that the plaintiffs, or their predecessors in title, bought their erven upon the conditions contained in paragraph (4) of the declaration. The defendants further state that a village was laid out as consisting of 214 erven, but of these only 39 were sold and deducted from the extent of the farm, and of the 39 erven 18 belonged to the plaintiffs, seven to the defendant, and 14 to other persons. They admit that portions of the ground claimed as commonage, and some of the streets, have been enclosed by them, and their predecessors in title, and they claim the right to retain these enclosures, but deny that they have interfered with streets upon which the erven of the erf-holders abut. It appeared at the trial that the plaintiffs recognised the fact that the defendants had not interfered with, and did not claim the right to interfere with, streets to the use of which they were entitled, and that part of the issue was, by common consent, dropped out of the case, and the only issue that remains is in respect of the rights to the commonage claimed by the plaintiffs. In their pleadings the parties appear to have refrained from committing themselves to any clear and definite statement of their legal position. Upon the plaintiffs' declaration it is questionable whether they base their case upon a duly registered servitude, or upon contractual conditions, apart from registration, which are in some way binding upon the defendants. The declaration contains the allegation that the erven were sold in accordance with a general plan, bearing the words, "village commonage," which was duly filed in the office of the Registrar of Deeds. That this filing amounts to registration of the servitude the pleader is careful not to allege. That the plan was filed is admitted by the defendants, and they again on their part do not boldly allege that no right of servitude was registered in manner required by law, but in a general way traverse the claim made by the plaintiffs. Then again there is a statement in the declaration of the conditions upon which the erven were bought some twenty-eight years before the defendants became the owners of the remaining extent, without in any way connecting the defendants with the conditions, by alleging either registration or actual knowledge thereof on the part of the defendants. And on defendants' part no exception is taken to this inconsequential character of the declaration, nor do they set up want of registration, or want of notice, but they deny the existence of the conditions. Then we have in the plea some information given about the existence of a line of railway on the farm and the position of the erven, without its being indicated how these circumstances affect the case. My object in dwelling upon the state of the pleadings is to point out that it was difficult to ascertain from them whether the plaintiffs proceeded upon a registered right of servitude or upon the actual knowledge on the part of the defendants of the existence of an unregistered right of servitude created by a contract, of the conditions of which the defendants were aware at the time they acquired the property for valuable consideration. It became, however, quite clear during the argument, that the plaintiffs' contention was that they possessed a right of servitude, which was duly registered according to law, and their counsel said the plaintiff claim was based upon such registered rights and not upon knowledge on the part of the defendants of an unregistered right. This I now take to be the main issue which has to be decided by the Court. A great deal of evidence was given of the incidents at the sale, to which the defendants' counsel took exception, but which was allowed on the ground that it was a direct issue raised between the parties whether those incidents did occur without their relevancy being questioned upon the pleadings. And it was also considered likely that, in case a registered servitude was established, its extent and locality might be fixed by such evidence. In so far as this evidence bears upon the question of notice to the defendant of the creation of a servitude at the time the erven were sold, it would now appear to be irrelevant, because it is admitted that the issue is not before the Court. The sole question in respect of the creation of the servitude that has to be determined is whether the servitude in question was duly registered according to the provisions of our law. That such registration was necessary to the constitution of the servitude was admitted, and is established by a series of decisions of this Court. The matter therefore resolves itself into an examination of the title deeds of the property of the defendants, upon which the plaintiffs claim the servitude. This examination must embrace the title deeds of Bergh, who laid out the village of Berghville upon the property, and sold the erven now held by the plaintiff, together with the title deeds of the successive owners, down to the defendants. It will be discovered, upon making this inquiry, that there is endorsed upon Bergh's transfer a concession to the Government of a right to take a certain quantity of water from the property. Isaac Verster succeeds Bergh as owner of the property, and there is no servitude specially registered against his title deed, but the property is transferred to him, subject to such conditions as are mentioned in Bergh's transfer. The Verster Cold Storage Company then became the owners, and they take subject to the conditions mentioned in the transfers of Bergh and Verster, but in addition there is a servitude of water leading registered against their transfer in favour of a number of erf-holders of the village of Berghville, whose names are given. The defendants took their transfer from the Verster Company, and their title is subject to the conditions mentioned in the preceding transfers. Anyone perusing the body of the transfers, together with the written document annexed to them, will discover only two servitudes as created upon the property after Bergh became the owner, and they consist of two servitudes of water rights granted to the Government and the erf-holders. This, I say, is all that will be discovered in the shape of servitudes upon reading the transfer deeds. It is, however, contended that we should not stop there, but should also examine the diagrams attached to the transfer, and the general plan of the village of Berghville, which is filed in the Deeds Office, and is expressly referred to in the transfers. It appears that when the erven were sold by Bergh, a general plan of the projected village was filed in the office of the Registrar of Deeds. It seems to be a practice of that office to require the filing of such a plan, whenever the diagram attached to a deed of transfer is so small that it is impossible to represent upon it the deductions of erven from the remaining extent. And with this general plan of the village a folio is kept, in which are entered the sale and transfer of erven appearing upon the general plan. In ordinary cases deductions are specially mentioned upon the deed of transfer, and shown upon the diagram, but in the case of a village the number and smallness of the erven render it impossible to do this, and necessitate recourse to a general plan and folio, a general reference being made in the deed of transfer to the general plan, which in its turn refers to the folio. For the purposes of these deductions this general plan, according to the evidence of the Registrar of Deeds, is regarded as a subsidiary diagram, as is taken as embodied in the diagram. It seems, therefore, that we must take the entries in the folio as corresponding to the endorsement of deductions upon the seller's deed of transfer, and the general plan to form part of the diagram attached thereto. In accordance with the above-mentioned practice a general plan of the village of Berghville was in this instance filed by Bergh in the office of the Registrar of Deeds, and a folio was opened for entering the sales and deductions of erven. The following endorsement was made upon Bergh's deed of transfer: "For subdivisions vide general plan filed." This endorsement also appears upon the transfer deed of Verster, to whom Bergh sold the remaining extent, and in the body of Verster's transfer deed appearing the words: "The remaining extent (including streets, etc., as shown in the general plan of the village of Berghville)." This remaining extent is sold and transferred by Verster to the Verster Company, and by the Verster Company to the defendants, both the last transfers bearing the words: "The remaining extent measuring—including streets, etc., as shown in the general plan of the village of Berghville)." Now, upon referring to this general plan it will be found that it is described: "The general plan of the projected village called Berghville and adjoining village commonage situate at Tulbagh-road railway station." Upon the plan references are made to certain transfer deeds and to the folio containing deductions of erven. Upon the figure representing the remaining extent of the farm surrounding the erven the area is described by the words, "village commonage," written in three different places in large letters. The plan itself, therefore, purports to be in express terms a plan, amongst other things, of the village commonage, adjoining the village, and the position of the commonage is given upon the figure representing the farm and village. Now, the question arises whether the fact that the words above mentioned appear upon the registered general plan of the village amounts to a registration of the grant of a servitude of common pasturage in favour of the erf-holders of Berghville against the remaining extent of the farm. I may say that in my opinion the presence of these words upon the general plan is equivalent to of the remaining extent of the farm attached to the title deeds of that property. In order to decide the question raised, it is necessary to ascertain how the Court has in the past regarded these general plans. The earliest case bearing upon the point is that of Hiddingh v. Tops (4 Searle, 107), in which the direct effect of the plan itself upon the decision of the Court is somewhat obscured by the admission of evidence of conditions of sale announced on the day of sale, the admissibility of which has been questioned in so far as it affects subsequent purchasers without notice. Hodges, C.J., said in that case: "There was a representation at the sale by the seller that the purchaser of each lot should have the use of roads leading to the public road over and into the estate, and the claim of the defendant, who purchased at the sale, must be limited to that." Consequently this judgment did not rest mainly upon the registration of a right of servitude, as it was evidenced upon the general plan filed in the office of the Registrar of Deeds. But some of the reasons given by Watermeyer, J., for his decision, are of great importance. He said: "I look upon the general plan as a contract in writing, because it would be understood by the parties in a more simple way than if words had been employed in describing all the streets and lots." Applying this view to the present case, we have this result, that a written contract was exhibited to the purchasers at the sale of erven, which was subsequently registered against the title deed of the sellers. This document upon the face of it intimated that the land surrounding the erven was village commonage, and I take it it was intended to convey, and did convey, to the purchasers that this village commonage was for their use. This very document was registered against the title deeds of the defendants in this case, and to any person perusing it the idea must be conveyed that the ground indicated upon the plan, upon which the words, "village commonage," appears, is ground intended to be village commonage for the use of the erf-holders; but I do not intend to base my decision, or to build too much, upon this single observation made by Watermeyer, J., and I shall consider the other cases dealing with this subject. Briefly stated, I think the case of Ohlsson's Breweries v. Whitehead (9 Juta, 84), amounts, in so far as it touches this point, to a decision that where a street is marked upon a plan as adjoining a lot sold, it is an indication that the street is intended for the use of that lot. Consequently a servitude is created over that street by the mere indications in the plan, without any mention of such servitude appearing in the transfer deed, further than such as is involved in a general reference to the plan; and I think we may deduce from the case of the Estate of Gardiner v. Town Council of Port Elizabeth (19 S.C.R., 514), the conclusion that where an open space is shown on a plan exhibited at the sale, there is an intimation to purchasers that it is intended for the use of such purchasers as buy lots to which it may, from its locality, be a convenience. Here again the condition of sale constituting the servitude is taken from the plan alone. And in that case the Chief Justice said that in his opinion the filing of the plan with the title deeds, would constitute registration, which would be effectual against subsequent purchasers. It was not, however, necessary to deal with the question of registration in that case. Here, again, we find a servitude created by registered general plan, without express mention of it in the deed of transfer. The effect of a representation in the diagram is also dealt with in the case of Garret v. Andries (11 C.T.R., 672). The conclusion I come to is that the general plan in this case, which must be taken as part of the diagram attached to the defendants' title deeds, indicates and was intended to indicate that the erfholders of Berghville are entitled by grant to a servitude of pasturage on the remaining extent of the defendants' farm. I am of opinion that the servitude has been effectually registered, but I am also of opinion that the registration, as regards formalities, has not been executed in a satisfactory manner. It has not been registered in the manner at present insisted upon and rightly insisted upon by the Registrar of Deeds. It has been registered in a way which cannot be safely adopted in future because of the uncertainty it gives rise to. A servitude to be certain in its character and perfectly secure, should be clearly set out in the body of the registered deed of transfer. The way in which this servitude is indicated upon the general plan, although it establishes the erfholders' right of grazing, leaves the extent of the right doubtful. There is nothing to indicate that the whole of the remainder of the farm is subject to this servitude. If the general plan is to be taken as indicating the servitude, then the servitude should not be extended beyond what is indicated on the plan. The words "village commonage" appear in three places on the plan, and there is no indication that they were intended to affect the land lying beyond the Waterval River, which, both as to its physical character and title deeds seems to be distinguishable from the rest of the farm. I think the plaintiffs are entitled to rights of common pasturage over the remainder of the farm Compagnie's Post or Nooitgedacht, with the exception of the land laid out as erven; of portion C; and of the land lying to the north-west of the Waterval River, as marked upon the general plan; and a declaration of rights is made accordingly. The defendants are ordered to remove all fences placed by them upon the Commonage as above described. I am satisfied that the action of the defendants did cause some damage to the plaintiffs, but that damage was estimated by the latter on the basis that each could run as many head of stock as he pleased. The Court has not the material to decide, and is not asked to decide how many cattle each is entitled to run. That must be matter of arrangement. Twenty pounds damages will be awarded to the plaintiffs jointly. The defendants claim in reconvention damages from the plaintiff Malherbe for enclosing a small portion of the remaining extent of the farm. Malherbe lays no claim to the ground, he admitted the trespass, and offered to remove the fences. No damage was proved, and no extra costs could have been incurred in respect of this claim. Malherbe is ordered to remove the fences off the defendants' land, and to pay them one shilling. No order is made as to costs of this claim in reconvention. As to defendant's claim against Samaai. I can only say there is not satisfactory proof either of trespass or damages, and absolution from the instance is granted, without costs. The defendants are ordered to pay the costs of the claim in convention.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

REX V. SWARTS. { 1907.
May 10th.

Master and Servant—Justice of the Peace—Neglect of Servant to commence work on the date for which he is hired—Act 18 of 1873, Sec. 7—Sub sec. 1.

S., a hired servant, was prosecuted before a justice of the peace for having neglected to commence work at the date agreed upon. He was convicted, sentenced to imprisonment with the option of a fine and ordered "to return to his master's service" after serving his sentence.

Held, on review, that as he had never been in the service of this master and as the J. P. would have had no power to order him to return to it if he had, the latter part of the sentence must be struck out.

Buchanan, J.: This case came before me for review from the Special Justice of the Peace of Porterville. The accused was charged with contravening sub-section 1 of section 7 of Act 18, 1873, the Master and Servants' Act, in that he did wrongfully and unlawfully and without sufficient cause fail or refuse to commence service at the stipulated time. He pleaded not guilty, but was found guilty and sentenced to pay £1, or in default, one month's imprisonment with hard labour. The Special Justice of the Peace added this: "On expiration of service (I suppose he means service of sentence) to return to his master's service." This man had engaged himself, according to the evidence, to join the prosecutor for the ploughing season, but instead of doing so he engaged himself to another master. The conviction and sentence will be confirmed, but the latter clause of the sentence must be struck out for two reasons, viz: (1) that the Special Justice of the Peace has no authority to order the prisoner, on the expiration of his imprisonment, to return to his master, and (2) the prisoner was never in this person's service, so he could not return to the master, seeing that he had never been there. He was punished for not going there.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

GENERAL ESTATE AND ORPHAN CHAMBER V. SAFIERDIEN.

Mr. Toms moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £300 with interest.

It appeared that the matter had previously been before the Court, and had been ordered to stand over sine die.

In the absence of proof that notice had been given to defendant of the present application, the matter was again ordered to stand over.

FIELD AND CO V. KLAAS.

Mr. De Waal moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

NEUKIVEL V. LACEY.

Mr. Struben moved for judgment under Rule 319 for £98 0s. 7d., balance of account for work and labour done, and materials supplied, with interest à tempore morar, and costs.

Order granted.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. Gutsche moved, under the 117th section of the Insolvent Ordinance, for the discharge of Wm. Henry Lloyd.

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

WARD V. WARD. (1907.
(May 10th

Mr. De Waal moved, on behalf of petitioner, for a decree of divorce, with forfeiture of the benefits under the ante-nuptial contract, by reason of defendant's non-compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte BRAUDE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved, on the petition of Nische Braude, for an interdict restraining her husband, Aaron Braude, of Matjes River, Oudtshoorn, from interfering with, or molesting her and her child, pending result of an action now being instituted by her for a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that no notice of the present application had been given to the respondent.

Rule nisi granted, to operate as an interim interdict, rule returnable on the 14th June, or at the trial of the action, should the same be heard previously thereto.

Ex parte ESTATE STEPHAN.

Dr. Greer moved for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent certain minors in a special case to be heard in the Supreme Court, between the executors of Estate H. R. Stephan and the executors of Estate J. C. Stephan. It was stated that the secretary of the Board of Executors was curator nominate of the minors.

Order granted appointing the Board of Executors as curator ad litem of the minors interested under the will.

DOOVEY V. CASIMALI.

This was an application calling upon respondent, in his capacity as executor testamentary in the estate of applicant's late husband, to show cause why he should not pay over to Mrs. Doovey a sum of £150, being six monthly payments at the rate of £25 per month, as stipulated under the will.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin applied for a postponement.

Dr. Greer said he thought his learned friend would not press that application after he (Dr. Greer) had explained the position of his client. Mr. Casimali had failed to pay her anything from the estate for a certain number of months, and he had now filed certain affidavits. On the strength of those affidavits he (Dr. Greer) was not prepared to go on with the case. Mr. Casimali showed—and he (counsel) thought—it was pretty clear that the estate was practically insolvent, and that he was unable to pay these moneys. He contended, however, that as the applicant had not been furnished with an account of the estate, she was justified in bringing this application, and that it would only be fair that the costs should come out of the estate.

Mr. Benjamin said he was not instructed to consent to any such proposal, and he submitted that in the interests of the creditors the costs should be paid by the applicant, who was not justified in bringing the application.

Buchanan, J., said that he would hear the application.

Affidavits were read, from which it appeared that the executor intended to surrender the estate as insolvent.

Buchanan, J., said he was satisfied that the applicant had a prima facie case, and judgment would be granted for costs, and applicant would, therefore, appear as a creditor against the estate.

FRIEDLANDER BROS. V. ESTATE GILLET.

This was an action brought by Friedlander Brothers, of De Aar, against the executors of the estate of Nicolas Joseph Gillet to recover the purchase price of certain land, and quitrent which had accrued thereon.

Plaintiffs, in their declaration, said that defendants were sued in their capacity as executors testamentary in the estate of the late Nicolas Joseph Gillet, in his lifetime of Cape Town, who died on May 11, 1905. On December 17, 1902, the said Gillet purchased from plaintiff at a public auction, held at De Aar, certain 12 lots of ground in the Friedlander township, for £264. It was provided in the conditions of sale that the purchase money should be paid on the day of sale, or one-fifth on account, and the balance should be accepted on mortgage of the property purchased, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. The said Gillet failed to pay any portion of the purchase price, and to pass a bond, and under the conditions of sale the whole of the purchase price, together with interest at 5 per cent. from date of sale, had become payable. Plaintiffs had tendered, and hereby again tendered transfer against payment of the purchase price, and they prayed for judgment for £264, with interest thereon at 5 per cent., and £108 quit-rent, which had accrued on the land.

Defendants, in their plea, said that they had no knowledge of the alleged sale, and they did not admit that the said Gillet had purchased under the conditions of sale the pieces of ground in question. No conditions signed by the said Gillet had been produced to them. They had no knowledge of any such conditions, and they craved leave to refer at the trial to the original conditions of sale upon which plaintiffs sold on the 17th December, 1902.

Mr. Benjamin was for plaintiffs; Mr. Inchbold was for defendants.

Petrus Stephanus Cillie, attorney and auctioneer, Britstown, said that in December, 1902, he held a sale of erven at Friedlander township, De Aar. The late Mr. Gillet was present, and on the 17th December he bought twelve lots, as shown in the vendu roll (produced). On that particular day there was only one other buyer. The prices of the erven sold ranged from £500 or £600 to about £20. Before Mr. Gillet bought there were negotiations between him and Mr. Friedlander with regard to the erven near the outspan place, and it was arranged between them that Mr. Gillet, whatever the bids amounted to, should pay £20 per lot, and that he should pay cash. Witness did not actually see Mr. Gillet signing conditions. He had seen conditions that had been signed. At the time witness held the sale the hotel had been burned down. He got a few rooms from the military. Between Christmas and the New Year the papers were removed from his office. Information was given to the police, but he had not been able to recover his papers. Amongst the missing papers was the form signed by Mr. Gillet. Witness had erroneously stated in an affidavit he had sworn that Mr. Gillet bought q.q.

Cross-examined: Witness was under a misapprehension when he said that Mr. Gillet bought q.q. The mistake arose in the copying of the vendu roll. He admitted that he had also stated on affidavit that Mr. Gillet did not sign the conditions, but explained that when his memory was refreshed by his clerk he remembered having seen the conditions that Mr. Gillet had signed.

Daniel C. Steyn, formerly employed by Mr. Cillie as clerk, said that after the sale Mr. Gillet signed two copies for each lot sold to him. The papers were put by witness among other papers in the office. Witness and his principal went to Britstown for the New Year. On returning to De Aar they found that the papers had disappeared. He had seen Mr. Cillie occasionally since, but this matter was not again mentioned to him by Mr. Cillie until about a month ago.

By the Court: Witness was not aware whether the purchase price was paid to Mr. Cillie.

Otto Adler, who attended the sale, said he remembered Mr. Gillet purchasing a block of erven at the sale.

Percy S. Dale, surveyor, also spoke to seeing Gillet buying the plots.

Wolf Friedlander (one of the plaintiffs) said that after the sale he saw the late Mr. Gillet. Mr. Gillet said that he had bought the ground to use it for wagon-making, blacksmith's shop, and engineering. Mr. Gillet talked about paying cash. He had not seen Mr. Gillet since that time. For a considerable time he was unable to ascertain Mr. Gillet's address.

By the Court: Witness did not press the claim for interest beyond the date of demand on the 3rd February last in view of the delay which had occurred. He left the matter in the hands of the Court. He was prepared to take judgment for the purchase price at £20 per lot.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

Harry Gibson (one of the executors) said that he knew a good deal about the late Mr. Gillet's Prince Albert-road business, but he knew nothing about the transaction in question.

By the Court: Witness was acting in the interests of the widow and children, because he did not think he was justified on the information before him in admitting the claim.

After hearing counsel on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: In this matter I think the executors were quite justified in the interests of the estate in not admitting this claim until it had been further investigated, seeing that the correspondence shows that the statements at first made by the executors were contradicted afterwards by the facts, and that the recollection of Mr. Cillic, who was the auctioneer, was not very clear about the circumstances. In such a case, and, in the absence of any written document signed by Gillet, they had hardly any option but to contest this case. However, I think, on the evidence that has been led, it is clear that the sale did take place to Gillet, and I think it is also clear, according to Mr. Friedlander's evidence, that the price agreed upon between them was £240 for these 12 lots. Mr. Friedlander is very fair in this matter, and he leaves the amount to be awarded to the Court, and is willing to accept judgment for this amount, and not for the sum appearing on the vendu roll, with interest from the date of demand, on 3rd January last. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for £240 with interest from the 3rd January, 1907, including the quitrent for the year 1907. The estate, under the circumstances, unfortunately, must pay the costs.

On the application of Mr. Benjamin, Mr. Friedlander was allowed his expenses as a necessary witness.

MARTIN V. ZULUZWENI. { 1907.

Magistrate—Judgment in excess of plaintiff's claim.

Z. summoned M. in the Court below to defend an action in which he sought to have it declared that certain goats attached at the instance of M. were his, Z.'s, property and had been wrongfully attached. M. consented to judgment in terms of the summons but the Magistrate ordered, failing return of the goats, the payment of their value and also payment in respect of some of them which had died while under attachment.

Held, that the Magistrate's judgment must be amended so as to bring it into accord with the terms of the summons.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Kentani, in an interpleader action relating to the ownership of certain goats.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for appellant, who was respondent in the Court below; there was no appearance for the present respondent.

Mr. De Villiers said that appellant was summoned in the Court below to appear in a certain action to determine whether eleven goats valued at £4 were the property of Zuluzweni. The appellant consented to judgment. He now said that the Magistrate allowed 15s. per head for the goats, while 7s. 3d. only was claimed, and that certain of the goats died, for which he had been held liable, though there was no evidence that the goats died through any fraud or negligence on his part. Counsel submitted that the Magistrate's judgment was wrong, inasmuch as it had gone beyond the consent. On the question of liability for the goats that died, he cited Voet (6, 1, 34).

De Villiers, C.J.: The only question raised in the summons in the R.M.'s Court was whether or not the goats which had been attached at the suit of Martin (the respondent in that case) were or were not the property of Zuluzweni (the claimant in that case). In the record appearing in the Magistrate's Court, he seems to have treated it as a question of a claim for 11 goats, or their value, £4; the question of the value of the goats was not raised at all in the summons. It was incidentally mentioned that that was their value (£4), but their value was not claimed. The sole question was, were these goats the property of Zuluzweni or were they not? The respondent in that case, through his agent, admitted that he could not claim to issue execution in respect of these goats, and what the Magistrate then ought to have done was simply to have declared that the goats attached are the property of the claimant Zuluzweni, and are not liable to execution at the suit of the respondent, who shall pay the costs in the Magistrate's Court. That should have been his order. Instead of that, he went further, and added, "and any that have died in the pound must be made good by the payment of 15s. each by the respondent." There was no claim for making good any loss. The Court will allow the appeal, with costs in this Court, and order the judgment to be amended so as to read as follows: "Declared that the goats attached are the property of the claimant (Zuluzweni), and are not liable to execution at the suit of the respondent, who shall pay costs in the R.M.'s Court."

REX V. DU PLESSIS.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of the Cape, who had convicted appellant of the theft of a horse, and sentenced him to four months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

From the record it appeared that the appellant had brought the horse to Cape Town, and had it sold by public auction. At the trial he said he had bought it from a Jew at Maitland, and he produced what purported to be a receipt.

The ground of appeal was that the conviction and sentence were not supported by the evidence given in the Court below, and were contrary to law.

Mr. Upington was for appellant, Adrian du Plessis, of Rustenberg, division of Stellenbosch; Mr. Nightingale was for the Crown.

Mr. Upington said that the appellant's version was that he bought the horse from a man, who apparently was the thief, and he produced at the trial a receipt purporting to have been given to him by the man from whom he bought. Although there might have been circumstances of suspicion, there was such an element of doubt in the matter that accused should have been given the benefit of it, and acquitted. Appellant was well connected, and there was no reason why he should become a thief for the sake of a paltry £8.

Mr. Nightingale submitted that on the evidence the Magistrate was quite justified in disbelieving the story told by the accused.

De Villiers, C.J.: There can be no doubt in the present case that the horse was stolen, and that possession of a recently stolen horse was traced to the accused. Then it lay upon him, when charged with the offence, to give a satisfactory explanation as to how he got possession of the horse. His explanation is that he bought the horse from a Jew, and he produced a receipt, which he said he had got from that man. Unfortunately it appears that he only mentioned this receipt at the time when he was charged in court. When he was arrested he said nothing about it, nor did he say anything about it before the Magistrate at Stellenbosch when first he was brought before him. That in itself raises some doubt as to the genuineness of that receipt. Then the matter does not end here. When he saw Mr. Stamper (the auctioneer) about this horse, he gave his name as C. du Plessis, whereas it is A. du Plessis, and he said he came from the Paarl, whereas he came from Stellenbosch. Mr. Stamper was cross-examined upon the point, but he was positive that the man said his name was C. du Plessis, and that he came from the Paarl. When the accused gave evidence himself, he denied having given his name as C. du Plessis, but he did not deny the statement of Mr. Stamper that he said he had come from the Paarl. The Magistrate must have credited Stamper's statement that he also said his name was C. du Plessis. That is a double misrepresentation. Well, these are circumstances which the Magistrate was bound to take into consideration, and if he was satisfied that the witnesses for the prosecution were stating the truth, and was not satisfied that the accused was telling the truth, and that the document was a genuine one, he was bound to find the accused guilty. The only argument that can be raised in the case was that he was the son of a respectable well-to-do farmer and that there is an extreme improbability that he would steal the horse, if he could have got a horse from his father. Well, these things very often are done by people in good circumstances; they have temptations, and they commit a crime of this kind. The evidence is very strong against him, and he must suffer punishment for the offence. The appeal must be dismissed.

REX V. BOOI.

Game Laws—Trespass.

It is an offence under the Game Law Amendment Acts of 1886 and 1891, to trespass with dogs upon land on which shooting or hunting of game is prohibited, even if the trespasser did not actually shoot or hunt game.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Beaufort West, who had convicted appellant and another boy of a contravention of section 7, Act 36, 1886, as amended by Act 38, 1891, in that on the 25th March they did kill, catch, capture, and pursue game and trespass upon the commonage of the Municipality, without obtaining the permission of the Municipality. Appellant was fined 10s.

Dr. Greer for appellant (Antonie Booi); Mr. Nightingale was for the Crown.

Dr. Greer submitted that it was clearly the intention of the Act that it was to be applied to persons in pursuit of game, and that there was no evidence in this case that the boys were on the commonage with the intention of hunting game.

De Villiers, C.J.: The decision of the Magistrate was perfectly correct. These two boys were upon the commonage with eight dogs. It is suggested by them that the dogs followed them against their will. If they knew they were going to the commonage, it was their duty to go back and lock up the dogs, and not allow the dogs to accompany them, and go on land where they had no business to be. The proper notice was given by the Municipality that persons who trespassed on the commonage with gun or dog would be prosecuted, and, in spite of this notice, the accused went upon the commonage with eight dogs, two of them being greyhounds. It appears to me that the Act was intended to meet a case of this kind. In the Act of 1886, it is said that "no person shall at any time, either with or without a game licence, kill, catch, capture, pursue, hunt, or shoot at any game." It stopped there. Then the Act of 1891 added these words: "Or with gun or with dog trespass," so as to make it clear that it is not the hunting or the shooting alone, but also the trespassing with gun or dog that is punishable under the Game Preservation Act. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

GILPIN V. FYNN. } 1907.

Fencing Act, 1883 — Cost of repairs.

The plaintiff whose land was separated from the defendant's land by a dividing fence which was in a dilapidated condition, gave notice to the defendant that the repairs would be executed under the 14th section of Act 30 of 1883. In executing such repairs the plaintiff raised the height of the fence by affixing a barbed wire 9 inches above the height of the old fence and he also affixed several iron posts between the old posts, which were all of wood.

Held, affirming the judgment of the Magistrate's Court, that the plaintiff could not, under the claim for expense of repairs, claim from the defendant a share of the expenses incurred in altering the nature of the fence, but should be confined to the expense incurred in restoring the fence to its original condition.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Stutterheim, in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover £15 15s. 3d., in terms of sections 13, 14, and 15 of the Fencing Act (No. 30, 1883), being half costs of repairing a certain joint boundary fence between their respective farms Campagna and Redlands. The Magistrate had granted absolution from the instance, and ordered each party to pay his own costs.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said: The defendant denies having received the notice marked (a) from the plaintiff. Admitting that he received it, there is no intimation in it that he (plaintiff) intended making what is practically a new and different description of fence at very considerable cost. According to the notice, the defendant had the right to assume that he intended repairing the old fence, that is, putting in new poles and wires where necessary. Instead of this, he makes it not only a foot higher, but fixes in iron standards which were not in the original fence. The bulk of the account is for standards and fixing them in position. I maintain the defendant had the right to be consulted before this additional expense was incurred, and that he was deprived of his right to have the matter, in case he protested, settled by arbitration. I think, however, he must have known that the plaintiff was working at the fence, and he should have made it his business to see or inquire what was being done. For that reason, I decided that he must bear his share of the costs.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for appellant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff has treated this case throughout as if it were a case of repairing the fence. I take it that notice was given in terms of the 14th section of the Act, and that notice was that he was going to repair the fence, and the summons claims the sum of £15 15s. 3d., being half the cost of repairing a certain joint boundary fence between the farms Campagna (belonging to the said plaintiff) and Redlands (belonging to the said defendant). Then the plaintiff puts in an account according to which he has not only repaired the fence, but he has altered the fence and erected a different fence from the one which was there before. He has placed in iron standards which were not there before, and he has raised the fence 9 inches by placing another barbed wire above the wire of the previous fence. In my opinion, that is not repairing a fence. The plaintiff could only, under these circumstances, claim the costs of actually repairing the fence, that is, placing it in the condition in which it was before. Repairing is to restore to a sound or good state any injury, dilapidation, or partial destruction. It does not include a work such as was done here. The mistake the plaintiff made was that he did not keep the account of the cost he incurred for the purpose of repairing, and if he had done so I have no doubt the Magistrate would have considered the claim for such portion as amounted to repairing. But the plaintiff was unable to give an answer as to how much was expended on the actual repairs, and the Magistrate was compelled to dismiss the case. However, this judgment will enable the plaintiff still to bring his action for the half of the costs incurred for the purpose of repairing the fence. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the Magistrate's judgment was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

LAZARUS V. INSOLVENT { 1907.
ESTATE SWART. { May 13th.

This was an application to have a certain writ of execution, issued against the property of the applicant by the trustees of the insolvent estate of J. J. Swart, in pursuance of a judgment given at the Circuit Court, Oudtshoorn, set aside.

The judgment of the Circuit Court was that Swart must give to Lazarus transfer and delivery of a certain farm on 1st October, 1906, and if Lazarus failed to pay the purchase price on that date, then he should have to pay £4,000. Lazarus elected to take the farm instead on transfer. The time was extended on a deed amending the judgment, and there it was stated that Lazarus should attend at Robertson and there delivery of the farm should be made to him by Swart, and £1,750, less £800, should be paid; on transfer being passed, Lazarus was prepared at that time to make payment. He had prepared for the payment in Cape Town on transfer and possession being given. On the 9th October Lazarus was present at Robertson. He went to the farm, it having been understood that Swart should be present at Robertson, but he was not there.

The respondent took up the position that he never refused to give possession.

Mr. Louwrens (with him Mr. Howes) was for the applicant, and Mr. Burton (with him Mr. M. Bisset) was for respondent.

Voluminous affidavits were read on both sides, and Mr. Louwrens having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: In the judgment given in this case the defendant was ordered to pay two instalments of the purchase price of the farm he had bought from the plaintiff upon 1st October last, upon which date also transfer was to be given by the plaintiff to the defendant. Some difficulty arose upon the 1st because of the time it required to prepare the necessary documents, and the parties agreed that the judgment should be carried out in its terms on the 9th. Upon the failure of the defendant to carry out the judgment, a writ of execution was taken out. The applicant now prays that the execution may be set aside on the ground that the plaintiff was not prepared on the 9th October to give him possession of the property. If it appeared upon the evidence that that allegation was true, the Court would have refused to allow execution to proceed, because it was the duty of the seller not only to give transfer of the property, but also to give possession. The question arises whether the respondent was not able to carry out his obligations by giving the necessary possession. It is stated that a Mr. De Villiers had set up a claim to remain in possession, based upon a lease which had been entered into between him and the plaintiff in this case. Referring to the affidavit made by De Villiers and put in in this motion, it would appear that he at present sets up no such claim. He made a clear statement that he does not realise, and that he only remained upon the property because the applicant requested him to do so. There is therefore at present no obstacle in the way of the applicant taking possession, because, if in the face of this affidavit resistance is offered by De Villiers, he would upon the production of this document be ejected without any trouble. But the question arises whether at the time when the execution was issued De Villiers refused to give up possession, and set up an agreement which he had made with the plaintiff as granting him a right of occupation. Now, upon the statements as they appear upon the affiavits, I think it will not be difficult to arrive at the conclusion that as a matter of fact Swart never entered into an agreement of lease for a period of ten years for this valuable farm, or half of this valuable farm with a young boy of the age of 17 years or 18 years, but the question is not whether the agreement was actually made, but whether it was alleged by De Villiers that it had been entered into, because if De Villiers set up that agreement as a genuine contract between him and the plaintiff, then it became the duty of the plaintiff to eject him, and put Lazarus in possession. The question, therefore, arises whether at any time De Villiers set up this contract as a bar to the occupation of the applicant. If this affidavit of his is true, then it is clear that he never refused to give Lazarus possession. Looking at all the affidavits before the Court, we have abundance of evidence that upon the 9th October the applicant proceeded to the farm, exercised rights of ownership, stated to the witnesses who have made affidavits that he was there to take possession, and that he there dealt with De Villiers as a person under his control. De Villiers was simply carrying out his directions, and he at that time, to the knowledge of the parties, was merely obeying the applicant in whatever he did upon the farm, and was not treated as a lessee at all. I come to the conclusion, without going into the details and without stating plainly what might be thought of the statement made in some of the affidavits of the applicant himself in the matter, that it has been proved to my satisfaction that De Villiers never set up any claim to keep the applicant out of the property. There is, however, clear evidence that the real person who exercised some rights of a tenant upon the property was the father of young De Villiers, and that during the indisposition of his father the young man continued in occupation for some time. When his father came back upon the property he regarded himself as being there by leave of the applicant, his son never took over the rights which he obtained from the applicant, and De Villiers, sen., never said whether the applicant took possession. Under the circumstances, the application will be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

SIMPSON AND MARWICK v. } 1907.
SWINTON. } May 14th.

This was an action to recover £108 4s. 8d., for professional services rendered and disbursements made on behalf of the defendant.

The declaration was as follows: (1) The plaintiffs are James Simpson and David William Marwick, carrying on business as Writers to the Signet at Edinburgh, Scotland, under the style or firm of Simpson and Marwick. Defendant is Edith Swinton, married out of community of property to Frederick William Swinton, and duly assisted by him as far as need be. Defendant is resident at Plumstead, near Cape Town. (2) From time to time, between January, 1903, and August, 1904, plaintiffs, at the special instance and request of defendant, rendered professional services and made disbursements in Scotland for and on behalf of defendant; (3) Defendant is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £60, as being the fair, reasonable, and customary charges for the professional services so rendered, and is further indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £58 4s. 8d., as being the amount of the disbursements so made, or in all the sum of £108 4s. 8d. A specified account has been duly furnished to defendant. (4) Of the said sum of £108 4s. 8d. the sum of £68 19s. has been duly taxed, and allowed as a bill of costs as between attorney and client in the suit of Swinton v. De Meyer by the Auditor of the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh, Scotland, and a copy of the said bill of costs so taxed has been served upon defendant. The balance of the said sum of £108 4s. 8d. consists solely of disbursements made as aforesaid. (5) Despite demand duly made, defendant wrongfully and unlawfully neglects and refuses to pay to plaintiffs the amount of her said indebtedness or any part thereof, wherefore plaintiffs pray for judgment for: (a) The sum of £108 4s. 8d.; (b) interest a tempore morae on the sum of £108 4s. 8d.; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

The defendant filed a plea as follows: (1) Defendant admits clause 1 of plaintiffs' declaration, but says as to the remainder that James Simpson, one of the plaintiffs, rendered her certain professional services as a friend, and she denies owing the plaintiffs the sum of £108 4s. 8d. claimed. (2) Defendant has received the account and bill of costs as stated and also the demand, and she admits that she has not paid the sum claimed.

In the replication the plaintiffs denied the allegations of fact and conclusions of law in the plea contained, joined issue thereon with the defendant, and again prayed for judgment.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for the plaintiffs, and there was no appearance on behalf of the defendant.

Judgment as prayed, with costs, including costs of a commission.

ESTATE VAN ECK AND { 1907.
ANOTHER V. VAN NIEKERK { May 14th.
AND ANOTHER.

Will—Construction.

The late E. had married a wife by whom he had seven children, all still surviving. After her death he married a second wife (the first defendant) by antenuptial contract which contained no provision for her support in the event of her surviving him. He had also issue by her, she survived him and subsequently married N. After his second marriage E. made a will by which he bequeathed to his second wife "a share in the farm named 'De Panne,' together with the children born of his former marriage, as also a wagon and span of draught cattle and 300 head of sheep (or goats), including house furniture, the half of everything." The executor (plaintiff) contended that by this clause (a) Mrs. N. and each of the children of the first marriage were entitled each to one eighth share in the farm (b) that she was entitled to one half share in the wagon and oxen, in the 300 sheep and in the furniture, (c) that as regards the residue of his estate, E. died intestate.

The first defendant (Mrs. N.) contended (a) that under the said will she was entitled to a half share in the farm the remaining half to go to the children of the first marriage, share and share alike, (b) That she was entitled to a half share in the wagon and oxen and in the 300 sheep and the household furniture.

The second defendant (issue of the second marriage) contended that the above clause of the will was void for vagueness and uncertainty.

The Court gave judgment in terms of the contention (a) of the first defendant and (b) and (c) of the plaintiff. Costs to come out of the estate.

This was a special case, to have the meaning of a certain clause in the will of the testator interpreted, and was stated as follows: The plaintiffs are: Petrus Johannes van Eck, in his capacity as executor testamentary in the estate of the late Hendrik Philippus van Eck, of De Pannen, in the district of Aberdeen; Petrus Johannes van Eck, in his individual capacity; Hendrik Phillipus van Eck; Louis J. van Eck, married in community of property to Christina van Eck, daughter of the late Hendrik Philippus van Eck. The defendants are: Johanna Catharina van Niekerk, formerly the second wife of the late Hendrik Phillipus van Eck, now married without community of property to Petrus Johannes van Niekerk, and the curator ad litem to the minors. The late Hendrik Philippus van Eck (hereinafter called the testator), was married on or about 24th January, 1870, in community of property to Christina Swanepoel. There were born of the said marriage seven children, all of whom are still alive. The said seven children by themselves or by their curators are plaintiffs in this action. The said Christina van Eck, wife of the testator, died on or about 3rd May, 1893. On or about 16th October, 1896, the testator was married out of community of property to Johanna Catharina Bothma (now Van Niekerk), the first defendant. The testator and the said Johanna Catharina Bothma executed an ante-nuptial contract bearing date 16th October, 1896, copy of which is hereto annexed marked A. There were born of the said marriage two children, both of whom are alive and still minors. The said children by their curator ad litem are defendants in this action. On or about 13th September, 1897 (prior to the birth of either of the said last two children) the testator executed a will, copy of which is hereto annexed marked B. On or about 6th January, 1904, the testator died, and the said will was valid and unrevoked at the time of his death. A copy of the inventory in the estate of the testator is hereto annexed marked C. The plaintiffs contend: (a) That according to the terms of the said will the farm De Pannen should be divided in equal shares among the seven children of the testator's first marriage and the first defendant. (b) That according to the terms of the said will the first defendant is entitled to receive one half-share in the wagon and span of oxen and 300 head of small stock and household furniture. (c) That as regards the residue of his estate the testator died intestate.

The first defendant contends: (a) That by the said will there was bequeathed to her one half share in the farm De Pannen, and to the children of the first marriage aforesaid the remaining half share therein; (b) That by the said will there was bequeathed to her one half share in the said wagon, in the span of oxen, and in the 300 head of small stock and household furniture.

The second defendant contends: (a) That the said clause of the said will whereby the testator purports to make a disposition of certain of his property is void for vagueness because of the testator's true intention with regard to the subject and object matter of his intended disposition being uncertain; (b) alternatively in case the foregoing contention be not upheld that the testator died intestate as to one half of his movable and immovable property.

The portion of the will for the interpretation of the Court was as follows: "That whereas the testator is married by ante-nuptial contract to Miss Johanna Catharina Bothma, he therefore leaves to her, when he shall come to die aforesaid, a share in the farm named 'de Panne,' division of Aberdeen, together with the children or heirs born of his former marriage, as also a wagon and span of draught cattle complete and three hundred head of sheep (or goats), including house furniture, the half of everything."

Mr. Watermeyer for plaintiffs, and as curator ad litem to the minor plaintiffs. Mr. Upington for the first defendant. Mr. Sutton as curator ad litem to the children of the second marriage.

Counsel having been heard in support of their respective contentions, Maasdorp, J.: It appears in this case, the testator was married in 1870 to his first wife, by whom he had 7 children, all of whom are still alive. She died in 1893, and in 1896 he married the first defendant by ante-nuptial contract executed by them. Each party retained his or her own property, and no special provision is made for the wife by the husband. In 1897, the testator executed the will in question. I shall refer in full to the clause which is now in dispute between the parties. The will is in Dutch, and this is a translation of that paragraph: "That whereas the testator is married by ante-nuptial contract to Miss Johanna Catharina Bothma, he therefore leaves to her, when he shall come to die aforesaid, a share in the farm named 'de Panne,' division of Aberdeen, together with the children or heirs born of his former marriage, as also a wagon and span of draught cattle complete, and three hundred head of sheep (or goats), including house furniture, the half of everything." It is contended by the executor on behalf of the children of the first marriage that the intention of the testator was that the farm "de Panne" should be divided into equal shares amongst the seven children of the testator's first marriage and the first defendant. Upon that point the first defendant's contention is that by the will there was bequeathed to her one half share in the farm "De Panne," and to the children of the first marriage the remaining half share. The contention with reference to the movables mentioned in the clause is on the part of the plaintiff that according to the terms of the will, the first defendant is entitled to receive one-half share in the wagon and span of oxen, of 300 head of small stock as well as furniture. The contention on behalf of the first defendant is the same. The second defendant contends that the will is wholly void through vagueness, as it is of such a character that it is impossible to construe the intention of the testator with certainty. All the parties are agreed that after the property disposed of under this clause is accounted for that there will be some property left, with reference to which there is no distribution, and with respect to which the testator must be regarded as having died intestate. As the contention now stands with reference to the movables, there is no dispute between the parties, and it is unnecessary for the Court to express an opinion, except in so far as the construction of the will in that respect may affect the rest of the will. But it seems that the parties are agreed now as to the disposal of the movable properties. They are not of very great value, and in the face of the fact that there is some doubt attached to the meaning of the testator, it is well that the parties should have a family understanding as to the division of that property, and I take it there is no dispute, and a fair distribution will be arrived at by the parties themselves. With reference to the disposal of the farm, it seems to me that the testator, in disposing of the farm, left a share to his wife, together with the children born of the former marriage. Now, a doubt is created as to the exact share which he left to her. Upon the construction of that portion of the clause taken by itself it is possible that he intended that she should share in half of the farm, while the children took the other half. It is also possible he might have intended by that clause that she should only take an equal share with each of the children in the division of this farm, and if nothing further had been said with reference to the division of the farm, then the Court would have had to deduce from the clause by its interpretation together with the rest of the will, the probable intention of the testator; but it seems to me that the difficulty is cleared up by the testator himself. After providing that there should be left to her a share of the farm he proceeds to say that he also leaves to her a wagon, span of oxen, and some small stock and furniture, and then he specifies that in making this provision for her, the provision shall amount to the half of "everything." Now, the Court must give full effect to the words by means of which he here specifically defines his intention in the former part of the clause. He states that he leaves to her the half of "everything." "Everything" would include all the property that he possessed, whether movable or immovable, if taken in the plain sense. "Everything" would refer to whatever has been specified before in the clause, and amongst the things specified in the clause is the farm. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the meaning of "everything" must be restricted, and that everything only refers to what immediately precedes, but it seems to me that that would create a worse difficulty, because it would be difficult to ascertain to what exactly the words should be restricted. It is contended by Mr. Watermeyer that they should be restricted to the sheep and furniture, and not extended to the wagon and a span of draught cattle. Why exactly a line should be drawn there I cannot understand. It certainly seems to have been the opinion of the plaintiff, in the first instance, that "everything" should at least apply to all the movables. Then a difficulty arises for the plaintiff, as the wagon stands in the same position as the farm, and consequently Mr. Watermeyer finds himself obliged to give up the wagon at least and withdraw the application of "everything" from the wagon. As a matter of fact, there seem to have been two wagons amongst the property when he died, and 600 small stock. Now, I made the suggestion during the argument that when he disposed of his wagon and small stock he intended that they should be regarded as half of what he actually possessed, and he did not then intend that there should be a further division of the moveables mentioned. I was inclined to think when he mentioned the moveables he specified them as the half he intended his wife to have, and that she should take half of the farm also. But as I have said, the parties themselves are agreed that the moveables specifically mentioned should be distributed and divided between the widow and the children. My opinion upon that part of the case is not so clear that I should suggest that that arrangement should be departed from. The conclusion I come to is that the testator in making provision for his wife, whom he seemed to be mainly thinking of when the will was made, bore in mind that no provision was made for her by the ante-nuptial contract, and he was determined to secure her in as comfortable circumstances as he could. And not only that, but it may be taken he expected there would be a family by her also, and the division amounted to a division between the two families. A declaration will be made in terms of contention (a) of the first defendant, in terms of (b) of the plaintiffs and the first defendant, and in terms of (c) of the plaintiffs' contention, the costs to come out of the estate.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte LEWIS. { 1907.
 { May 14th.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for a certain rule nisi, under the Derelict Lands Act, to be made absolute.

ALEXANDER V. PRESTWICH AND OTHERS.

This was an application to make absolute certain rule nisi interdicting respondents from disposing of a concession obtained from King Lewanika, in Barotsiland.

From the petition upon which the rule was granted, it appeared that applicant claimed that he was interested as to one-eighth share in a certain concession obtained from Lewanika by an expedition, called the Dreadnought Expedition, sent up to Barotsiland. Petitioner said that he had advanced £30 to aid the expedition, and that he had incurred other expenses in connection therewith, amounting to £1 3s. 4d. Respondents, he alleged, would not recognise the rights of himself and others in relation to the results of the expedition. He proposed to institute an action for a declaration of rights, and an order authorising the endorsement of the names of himself and others entitled to share in the concession. Petitioner apprehended that, unless respondents were interdicted, he and others would be deprived of a chance of enforcing their rights under the concession.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for the respondent, F. Z. S. Peregrino. The other respondents did not appear.

Dr. Greer said that inasmuch as the respondents, Frank and Robert Prestwich, were not in the Colony, he would ask for an extension of the return day of the rule as against them in order that the notice should be served upon them. As against Peregrino, he moved to make the rule absolute.

The respondent Peregrino, in an affidavit, denied that he in any way intended to act adversely to the interests of the applicant. He was prepared to meet the applicant in any action he might bring. He denied the applicant's allegations, and said that the rule obtained by him was vexatious and unnecessary. He prayed that the rule might be discharged, or, in the alternative, that it should be ordered to stand over pending the arrival of the Prestwiches.

In a replying affidavit, the applicant said that the concession was now in the name of Peregrino only, and he (deponent) was not protected at all in the matter. He had no knowledge that the Prestwiches had left the Colony.

until he was so informed by Peregrino. The concession had been withdrawn from the bank without applicants' knowledge.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose, Mr. Jones, Peregrino can't object to being restrained from parting with this concession?]

Mr. Jones: Our case is that it is wholly unnecessary.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the applicant's allegations are true, it is necessary.]

Mr. Jones said there was a further affidavit by Peregrino showing that the latter had tried to get the applicant to sign a document so as to get the agreement between the parties from the bank. It was important that this deed should be before the Court, and in its absence he submitted that there were no facts before the Court to justify this application. Before the Court could grant an interdict, there must be proof of clear right on the part of the applicant.

De Villiers, C.J., said that all the applicant said was that he had an interest in a certain document which Peregrino was in possession of, and which the plaintiff had an interest in. Then why not submit to the rule?

Mr. Jones said that if the rule were made absolute, he would submit there should be no order as to costs.

De Villiers, C.J., said that if all the statements made by the petitioner were correct, then it qualified him in asking the Court to restrain Peregrino from parting with the concession. There had been a prima facie case made out for an interdict, and the Court would make the rule absolute against Peregrino, but no order would be made as to costs.

Er parte WILLEM AND BOTHA.

Mr. Bisset moved for an order confirming a certain agreement of sale. Petitioners were bequeathed property which the testator provided should only be disposed of to one of the other legatees. The Master approved of the agreement, subject to security being given.

An order was made in terms of the Master's report.

Er parte LUCHERON.

Mr. Long moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to register certain transfers. Consent papers had been filed by all interested persons, but as the petitioner was the executor in the estate of his deceased brother, from whose estate the property was sought to be transferred, the Registrar had refused to pass transfer, holding that an order of Court was necessary.

Order granted.

Er parte VERMAAK.

Mr. Roux moved for leave to mortgage certain property in order to raise money to improve property in the estate of the petitioner's deceased husband, in which the petitioner had been bequeathed the life interest. All the legatees consented.

Order granted.

In re GOLDEN MILE GOLD MINING AND DEVELOPING SYNDICATE, LIMITED (IN LIQUIDATION).

Mr. Roux moved for confirmation of the first and final report of the official liquidators. The report stated that there were no assets, the directors paying the cost of liquidation.

Order granted in terms of report.

Er parte WORDON AND PEGRAM.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for an order authorising the reduction of the capital of Wordon and Pegram, Limited, from £60,000 to £20,000.

Order granted.

ROBEIN V. ROBEIN.

This was an action brought by John Robein, a coloured labourer, of Stellenbosch, against his wife, Maria Robein, also of Stellenbosch, for a decree of divorce, on the ground of her adultery with one Willem Hendricks.

Dr. Greer was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

Evidence was given to the effect that the parties were married at Stellenbosch on the 19th May, 1890. In October last plaintiff received a certain communication from Hendricks, and in consequence he spoke to his wife, who admitted having miscondacted herself with Hendricks. Amongst the witnesses was Hendricks, who is a married man, and who admitted that he had had illicit intercourse with defendant in 1903. He said that there had been a quarrel between Hendricks and defendant. The secret of their relationship only came to plaintiff's ears last October.

Decree granted; no order as to costs.

CORREIA V. CORREIA AND ANOTHER.

This was an action brought by Joseph Nicolas Correia, of Cape Town, against his wife, Mary Christina Correia, of Maitland, for a decree of divorce and forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage on the ground of her adultery with one Levett Mantonhorpe Shamon, against whom £200 damages were claimed.

Mr. Struben was for plaintiff; defendants did not appear.

Mr. Struben stated that defendants had filed affidavits, in which they made certain improper allegations against the plaintiff. They admitted, however, that they were living in adultery, and that the first defendant had given birth to two children, of whom the second defendant was the father.

Plaintiff said that he was married to defendant in community of property at the Roman Catholic Church, Somerset-road, Cape Town, in June, 1884. In 1891 his wife was sent to gaol for obtaining goods by false pretences. In 1893 she became very friendly with a butcher at Rochester-road, Salt River, and he spoke to her about her conduct. In 1898 his wife left the house, taking a good deal of the belongings with her.

By the Court: Witness was now informed that his wife lived with the second defendant at Maitland.

Georgina M. Dobson, niece of the first defendant, gave evidence to the effect that at various times in 1900, 1903, and 1905, she had visited her aunt, and found her living at Salt River and Maitland with the second defendant. Her aunt had during that time given birth to two children.

By the Court: Shannon was a signalman, and earned about £11 or £12 a month.

Mr. Struben (in answer to the Court) said that he did not press the claim for damages, but he asked for costs against the second defendant.

Decree of divorce granted, with declaration of forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage. The second defendant to pay costs. No order as to damages.

GABRIEL V. GABRIEL.

This was an action brought by Janet Gabriel, of Diep River, against her husband, Stephanus Gabriel, for a decree of divorce, on the ground of his adultery with one Asa Slamedene, a Malay.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for plaintiff, who sued in forma pauperis; defendant did not appear.

Plaintiff said that her husband was living with the Malay at Diep River, and he also had turned a Malay. Formerly he lived with the woman at Salt River. Defendant passed witness's house regularly with the other woman.

Mr. C. Stent, plaintiff's attorney, said that the defendant had admitted to him that he was living in adultery.

Decree of divorce granted, with declaration of forfeiture of benefits of the marriage, and costs. Plaintiff to have custody of the minor children.

HOWES V. HOWES.

Mr. Pohl moved for a decree of divorce in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights. An affidavit of non-return was read.

Rule absolute with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

KLEINBOOI V. TAYLER. { 1907.
May 15th.

Fire — Injury to Veld — Negligence—Responsibility.

K., a transport rider, in outspanning for the night kindled a fire which either went out or was put out the same night. On the next morning the servants of one J. kindled another fire in close proximity to that which had been kindled by K. K. having made use of this fire inspanned his oxen and drove off leaving the fire still alight and in charge of J's servants, who, apparently, did not extinguish it before leaving. The fire spread and did considerable damage to T's veld.

Held, on appeal, that the fact that K. had made use of this fire did not render him responsible for the damage or for any part thereof.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matatiele in an action brought against appellant by respondent to recover £20 damages for loss caused by a fire through the negligence of appellant.

The summons alleged that plaintiff was the owner of certain two farms in Matatiele district, and that on the 13th August last two wagons, one under the charge and control of defendant and the other the property of Gideon Joubert, junior, and under the charge of his servants, outspanned near the farm Alwin Rein, and lighted a fire, and through the negligence of defendant and the servants of Joubert the fire escaped, etc.

The Magistrate, in finding for plaintiff for £20 damages, said there was not the slightest doubt that plaintiff had proved damages. It appeared to him that the two wagons were mutually responsible for the fire.

It appeared from the record that the fire spread to Mr. Tayler's two farms and did an immense amount of damage to his veld, the result being that he had to remove his cattle to other grass. The cattle died from poverty.

Mr. Tayler had also sued the other servant, Mohosi, and had obtained £20 damages against him.

Mr. M. Bisset was for appellant; Mr. Sutton was for respondent, James A. E. Tayler.

Mr. Bisset submitted that appellant was not responsible for the spreading of the fire and that there was no proof of damage. Kleinbooi had his fire in the evening, and the other driver had his fire next morning, and it was this latter fire which spread to Mr. Tayler's veld.

Mr. Sutton submitted that this was a joint fire for the mutual benefit of the drivers, as shown by the records in the respective cases, and that there was joint responsibility upon the natives to extinguish the fire.

Hopley, J.: In this case the facts proved and placed on record are quite simple, and it is for this Court to say whether the Magistrate has drawn the correct conclusions of the legal position from the facts which he heard in evidence before him. It appears that the present defendant and the servants of one Joubert had reached a spot in the course of their journey, which was one undertaken for the conveyance of grain, where they outspanned for the night, and in the evening the defendant made at his wagon a fire, to which Joubert's servants came and warmed themselves, cooked their food and ate it, and went to bed. That fire went out, or was put out by the defendant, and no harm originated from it. In the morning Joubert's servants made a fire at their wagon, and defendant in his turn went and sat and cooked and ate at that fire. He then inspanned his wagon and went off, leaving the outspan before the servants of Joubert, and presumably leaving the fire burning at their wagon. They, it appears, did not take pains to put out the fire as carefully as they should have done. There must still have been something in the nature of sparks or live coals, and, in all probability, a wind was blowing. They left very shortly after the defendant. Some time after they had gone, an adjoining farmer, Van Straaten, saw that the veld was alight. He went down to the fire, and, according to his evidence, there seemed to be little doubt that the fire which had been used that morning had set the veld alight. He pursued these people, and got something in the way of damages that had accrued to him, out of the defendant. Now, this is one of the things which has been taken by the Magistrate as an admission by the defendant of his liability for the damage, but, as I read the evidence, it was nothing of the kind. Van Straaten, in the manner of the white man when dealing with natives, took the matter strongly into his own hands, and said to the native: "You are responsible; you will pay me for that; if you do not pay me so many bags of mealies from what is on your wagon, I will detain you, the wagon, oxen and all." Under such duress as that the defendant paid, but I do not consider that payment, under such circumstances, involves the least admission of liability. I do not think the Magistrate ought to have taken that into account at all.

Then it is argued that because benefits in common were derived from this fire that was burning in the morning, therefore all the parties who used that fire and derived any benefit from it are responsible for the proper control of that fire, and must be held liable for any damage caused by it. It is a startling proposition to advance, and yet it is one upon which the Magistrate has founded his judgment. I know of no principle of law which would go to that length, and it is startling because, if it goes so far, everybody who goes to a fire and warms his hands at it, or takes a cup of coffee there, might be singled out and held equally responsible for all that arises by reason of the fire.

The evidence clearly shows that the fire was lighted by Joubert's people, and that it was at Joubert's wagon. It was their fire, whatever benefits the defendant may have derived from it by reason of having gone there and cooked his food at it. After all we must look at this matter in a commonsense way, and see under whose control that particular fire was, and whose was the responsibility for it. Now, I think the responsibility was with Joubert's servants. They built the fire near their own wagon, and it was their duty to put it out. I think that the defendant, when he left the fire, had every right to suppose that they would put it out. He left the fire, went on with his inspanning, and departed with his wagon. What more could he have done under the circumstances? Was it his duty to deal with the fire at the other people's wagon before they had left the outspan? It may be that they would have resented any such interference. I cannot see that there was any negligence on the part of the defendant. The whole of the action was founded on negligence, and no negligence had been proved. Therefore the appeal must be allowed, and the judgment changed to one of absolution from the instance, with costs in the Court below and in this Court also.

HARMENING V. FARO. 1907.

Cattle trespass—Cultivated and uncultivated lands—Act 15 of 1892, Schedules C and D—Recovery of trespass money overpaid—Mistake of law.

Certain cattle, the property of respondent had trespassed upon H.'s unenclosed cultivated land. They also trespassed upon his uncultivated land, which was also unenclosed. H. demanded payment in respect of both trespasses, 9d. for the first mentioned trespass and 3d. for the second, per head. F. paid the demand and there was no evidence to show that he did so under protest. He afterwards brought an action to recover back a portion of the money paid on account that it was an overcharge. The Magistrate gave judgment in his favour for a small sum.

Held, on appeal, that as F. had paid without protest under a mistake of law, he was not entitled to recover anything.

Seemingly, it is very doubtful whether a land holder can lawfully charge for trespass by the same cattle committed on the same occasion upon both cultivated and uncultivated land, or whether rather the minor trespass is not merged in the greater.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matabele in an action brought against appellant by respondent to recover £1 0s. 3d. alleged to have been overpaid for trespass of cattle.

The summons called upon defendant (Harmening) to show cause why he should not repay to plaintiff £1 0s. 3d. alleged to have been overpaid in respect of trespass by plaintiff's cattle on the farm Hermitage. Plaintiff said that he paid £1 7s. under protest, that the correct charge was 6s. 9d. (27 head at 3d.), and that defendant refused to refund the overcharge. Defendant's plea was that 29 head of cattle trespassed on the cultivated ground of Hermitage, and that the money was not paid under protest. Defendant said, further, that his manager (De Klerk) only received 22s. 6d., and he denied liability.

The Magistrate found that 27 cattle only trespassed, that they trespassed on defendant's cultivated land, and plaintiff was liable to pay 9d. per head and 9d. for herding, and that plaintiff paid under protest 27s. 9d. He gave judgment for plaintiff for 6s. 9d., with costs, and allowed defendant 9d. for herding.

Mr. Bisset for appellant (defendant in the action); Mr. Gutsche for respondent (plaintiff).

Mr. Bisset submitted that the plaintiff had not sufficiently discharged the onus of clearly proving that he paid 27s., and not 22s. 6d., as alleged by the defendant's manager, De Klerk. The Magistrate's finding, as it stood, amounted to an allegation of fraud against De Klerk. Counsel also submitted that there had been no overpayment, since the cattle trespassed not only on the cultivated lands, but also the grazing lands of defendant. As to the question of whether the money was paid under protest, he contended that any overpayment had been made in mistake of law, and that it was not recoverable. He cited White v. Colonial Government (2 Juta, 350). In any case, Harmening was not bound by the tariff, and he had his common law rights.

Mr. Gutsche submitted that there was ample evidence on the record to support the findings of the Magistrate on the facts.

[Hopley, J.: What do you say as to the question of trespass money being due both on the cultivated and grazing lands?]

Mr. Gutsche contended that the intention of the Act would be defeated if trespass money were allowed to be accumulated in that way.

[Hopley, J.: It seems to me that a more important point is whether this money was paid under protest, and whether it is now recoverable?]

Mr. Gutsche submitted that it was clear the money was paid under protest. He quoted from the dicta of Mr. Justice Gibbs, referred to by the Chief Justice in White v. Colonial Government, at p. 352. He also cited Max Knapp and Another v. Loongaana (7 E.D.C., 61). If any mistake had been made by plaintiff, it was a mistake of fact, and not of law.

Hopley, J.: The Magistrate in this case has found, on evidence which is not very strong, but still he is justified in so finding if he likes, that the amount of £1 7s. 9d. was actually paid to De Klerk, who, if that were the case, does not seem to have accounted to his employer, the present appellant, for the whole of the amount. That is the finding of the Magistrate, and one cannot say that there is not sufficient evidence to justify it.

It would appear that 27 head of cattle belonging to Faro, plaintiff in the Court below, trespassed on defendant's land.

De Klerk, the defendant's servant, told plaintiff's messenger that 7s. 9d. must be paid. He says he thought the tariff was 3d. per head. The messenger went to his master and got the money, but on his return he was told that the charge would be 1s. per head and 9d. for herding the cattle, the defendant in the meantime having come upon the scene and pointed out that the cattle had been in his cultivated lands, and directed that 1s. be charged. The boy went back, but the plaintiff was absent from his house, and accordingly the messenger borrowed a sovereign from plaintiff's brother. This money he took to De Klerk, and the Magistrate has found that it was paid in addition to the 7s. 9d.

Now, the first question is as to whether that is an overpayment at all, in the circumstances. Mr. Bisset contends that there is nothing in the tariff to prevent a charge of 1s. a head, which would bring the amount to 27s. 9d., allowing 9d. for herding and 27s. for the trespass. He says that a man may charge 3d. for the trespass on the unenclosed land, which is proved here to have taken place, and a further 9d. for the trespass in the cultivated lands. I must say that I do not at present feel disposed to decide that point. My own impression has always been that when there has been a trespass on unenclosed and enclosed lands, there being a higher charge for the trespass on the enclosed or cultivated lands, the minor trespass was merged in the larger, and that no double charge or charge for both trespasses was ever made. I have not considered all the terms of the tariff, and it is not necessary for the decision of this case, but my own impression has been that if a man has charged upon the higher tariff, as a rule, he has to drop the lower rate.

Putting that point aside, the more important point comes, under what circumstances was the payment made, and can it, having been made under such circumstances, be recovered in an action at law? Now it is said that the payment was made under protest, and the Magistrate has found so, but there is not, to my mind, a little of evidence to that effect. The Magistrate seems to have found that there was a payment under protest, because after the payment had been made, when the defendant heard about it, he then wrote protesting against the charge which had been made, and subsequently instituted proceedings. But even then, when one goes on to analyse the evidence, the protest he made was as between the 7s. 9d., which he had been willing to pay, and the £1 7s. 9d., which he considered an overcharge, because he said that his cattle did not trespass save on the grazing land, and that whatever trespass they did commit afterwards was committed when they were in charge of the herd supplied by the defendant.

He was protesting against the extra sovereign, because he said the cattle never were upon the cultivated lands until the defendant took charge of them. There was no protest saying: "You are overcharging me. The cattle may have been on your cultivated lands, but you are overcharging me. To get my cattle back I am paying you, but I shall sue you hereafter for the amount." It seems to me that the Magistrate found that there was a protest, when there was no evidence upon which to found such a finding.

Without any protest, if it was a wrong payment at all, it was paid under a mistake of law. It was not a mistake of fact. On that point the Magistrate is against the respondent, because he has found that the trespass had been during the night on the cultivated lands. Can money paid under a mistake of law, without protest at the time, be recovered? There are many cases which have decided that money so paid cannot be sued for in the Courts of this Colony. Mr. Bisset goes further, and says that his client is not bound by the tariff in this case, that he might charge any arbitrary amount he chose to fix upon, and that if a person chose without protest to pay that amount he cannot afterwards come and sue. I think there is a great deal in that view, because a person so overcharged need not accede to the payment, he need not pay. He may say to the person holding his cattle, "Go and impound my cattle, and I am ready to pay the tariff charges to the poundmaster; I am not going to pay your exorbitant charges." At the same time, if he pays, as plaintiff did in this case, without protest, he is precluded from coming afterwards and saying he wants his money back.

There is good reason for this, because if there should be a protest at the time, the person detaining the cattle might refuse to accept the money under protest, and take the course provided by law of impounding the cattle, or might call in assessors to establish clearly his claim. The payment, if made without protest, would lead the injured party to believe that the other acquiesced in the position he had chosen to adopt. He hands over the cattle and loses the benefit of strengthening his case by evidence which he might have got whilst detaining the cattle. In any case, it seems a great pity that for so paltry a sum as this all this litigation should have been undertaken. Where a great principle is involved one can understand people spending money for the elucidation of the law upon the matter. In cases like this it seems to me that clients are sometimes advised to adopt risky procedure for small prospective benefits, even if they gain everything which they claim.

The appeal must be allowed, and the Magistrate's judgment changed to one of absolution from the instance, with costs in his Court; respondent to pay costs in appeal.

SYNDICATE, LTD. { May 16th.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved on the petition of H. M. Arderne and other co-proprietors of ground at Newlands, for an order cancelling and declaring void the sale of certain lots to John Talanda. The petitioners stated that Talanda had failed to carry out the conditions of sale, having neither produced sureties nor paid any part of the purchase money. Both the petitioners and Talanda had treated the sale as void. Talanda had left the Colony, and was now believed to be in German South-west Africa. Petitioners said it was impossible to obtain a declaration in terms of section 20, Act 5, 1884. A question had been raised as to whether petitioners were liable to pay transfer duty on the sale to Talanda. The matter had been before Mr. Justice Buchanan, who had referred the petition to the Registrar of Deeds for report. The report had now been obtained, and it appeared that no opposition was raised to the proposed order. Mr. Jones quoted several sections of the Act 5, 1884.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The petitioners should proceed by a rule nisi. The Registrar of Deeds does not represent the Treasury of the country, and in any case the Treasurer would have to be made a party to the application. The 32nd section provides the machinery for a case like the present.]

Mr. Jones, in further argument, cited Ex parte Stevens (6 C.T.R., 150), Scott v. Isaacs and Another (12 C.T.R., 791), and Owen's case (16 C.T.R., 79). He submitted that it would be very hard upon petitioners if they had to pay transfer duty both upon the sale to Talanda and the subsequent sales to other people, seeing that they had received no payment from Talanda.

Rule nisi granted, calling upon John Talanda and all other persons concerned to show cause on the last day of next term why the sale should not be cancelled as prayed, rule to be published once in a Cape Town newspaper and to be sent by registered letter to John Talanda, German South-west Africa.

In re CLARKE AND CO., LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION.)

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for confirmation of the second report and liquidation account of the official liquidators. The report had lain for inspection as directed, and no objection had been raised. Since the first report was presented, the liquidators had received the first dividend from the Transvaal estate amounting to about £13,500, and they now applied for an order authorising (1) payment of a further sum of £15,750 to debenture holders; (2) a compromise proposed to be entered into with the landlord with regard to rent, and (3) payment of liquidators' commission upon assets realised in Cape Town.

Order granted in terms of the report.

Ex parte ESTATE GRESSE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved, on the petition of the surviving spouse and executrix testamentary, for an order varying the order granted by the Circuit Court at Beaufort West, on the 6th March last, and allowing the petitioner to pay the debts of the estate out of the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the farm Spitzkop, and repair the village properties, and pay any balance remaining in to the Master. The will provided that, at the death of the surviving spouse the property should go to one Cornelis Foord, adopted son of the old folks, and at his death, to his children. Foord consented to the present application, which, it was stated, was absolutely necessary to save those interested from beggary.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he could not alter the judgment of the Circuit Court upon an application of this kind, unless all the parties were before him. The petitioner had not appealed against the previous judgment.

Mr. Bisset said that under the proposal which petitioner made, the creditors would be duly protected.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear that it will be quite impossible to carry out the wish of the testator that the properties mentioned in the will, the farms, should go after the death of his wife to Foord and the children of Foord. The property had to be sold for the payment of the debts of the estate. An order has been made for the sale of the pro-tion, and I cannot say that that was an improper heaping up of costs. The plaintiff has withdrawn the action, and I think it is only fair that he should pay all the costs that had been legitimately incurred by the defendant. The order, therefore, will be that the costs of the application for commission, including costs of the present application, be paid by the plaintiff in the action, now respondent.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

MULLER V. LOVE.

Executor—Jurisdiction—Res judicata—Master of Supreme Court.

The plaintiff claimed in a Transkeian Magistrate's Court from the defendant, as executor, a sum of money alleged to be the proceeds of certain crops belonging to her and wrongfully paid into the estate and the defendant pleaded res judicata on the ground that the account furnished by the defendant had been approved and signed by the Master of the Supreme Court, and the Magistrate held that his Court had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the defendant had received his appointment from the Master of the Supreme Court.

Held, on appeal, that the plea of res judicata was bad and the fact of the defendant having been appointed by the Master did not oust the jurisdiction of the Magistrate.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of St. Mark's, sitting at Cofimvaba, in an action brought by appellant against respondent, in his capacity as executor in estate Katrina J. Haller, to recover the value of a certain crop of forage and damages.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for appellant, Louisa Muller; Mr. McGregor was for respondent, John Thos. Love.

The summons claimed £50, value of a good crop of forage, with interest from date of reaping, plaintiff's lawful property, which defendant maliciously caused to be reaped, the forage being the yield of two bags sown by plaintiff while she was in charge of K. J. Haller's estate. There were other small claims for damages.

Defendant excepted that the matter was res judicata, by reason of the fact that the Master had confirmed the account in the estate.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the executor had been appointed by the Master of the Supreme Court and no claim could be brought against him except through the Supreme Court. He upheld the exception to his jurisdiction with costs.

Mr. De Villiers said that there was no such thing as confirmation of account in a deceased estate. The matter could not have been res judicata, and it should be sent back to the Magistrate to be tried on its merits. Counsel cited Liquidators Union Bank v. King's Trustee (1 Juta, 101).

Mr. McGregor said that the respondent no longer held the position of executor. He had filed his account, he had been discharged from his appointment, and he was functus officio.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Res judicata seems to be a wrong term to use. The defence really is, what is called in English law, plene administravit.]

Mr. McGregor said that that was so. He cited Brink v. Esterhuysen (1 Menzies, 473). He also submitted that the summons did not disclose any cause of action. Unless special grounds were shown, a party who had obtained benefits from the estate should not be allowed, after the administration had been closed, to rip up the whole of the administration.

Mr. De Villiers said there was nothing to show that there were no assets in this estate. It lay on the executor to prove that not only had he paid out all the assets but that he had no assets to pay any part of this claim. He cited Liquidators Paarl Bank v. Roux and Others (8 Juta, 205).

Mr. McGregor cited Kotze v. Mostert and Another (1869, Buch., 199).

[De Villiers, C.J.: The summons in this case is a somewhat peculiar one, and certainly the second, third, and fourth counts of the summons appear to be so vague that it would be impossible for any Court to give judgment upon them. In regard, however, to the first count of the declaration, I think, although it is very inartistically worded, the Court can ascertain what the plaintiff really meant. Her complaint is that whilst she was in charge of the estate of Katrina Haller, she had for herself and on her own behalf sown certain crops, and that defendant, in his capacity as executor, had made use of that crop which she had sown, and had used the proceeds on behalf of the estate. Well, that would be a substantial ground of action. If she had lawfully sown the crop on her own behalf and the executor had possessed himself of the crop afterwards and reaped it, and paid the proceeds into the estate, then it would be an amount which she could recover from the estate. The defence is that the matter is res judicata, inasmuch as the account had been duly confirmed. Now, in my opinion, that defence wholly failed. The plea of res judicata does not apply at all; there had been no confirmation of the account, there may have been an approval by the Master, by his signing it, but there had been no such confirmation of the account as to make it a judgment of the Court. The Magistrate does not seem to have supported the plea as it stood. He did not treat the matter as res judicata, but his decision was that, inasmuch as the executor had been appointed by the Master of the Supreme Court, any action against the executor must be brought in the Supreme Court. Now, that, clearly, is a position that cannot be maintained. The executor, although appointed by the Master of the Supreme Court, can still be sued in any other competent Court in respect of debts owing by the estate. The Transkeian Magistrate would have had full jurisdiction to decide this case; at all events, the first claim which I have mentioned. Now, the only question is whether the plea might be taken to mean that the executor has fully administered and no longer has any funds belonging to the estate in his possession, but, reading over the plea carefully, I do not see how that can be inferred. It is quite consistent with the plea that he may still have sufficient funds in the estate to pay any other claims that were made. It is also quite consistent with the summons and with the plea that the plaintiff may have made a demand before the final liquidation of the account for the amount of this claim. The only doubt I had about the case is whether there is a sufficient prima facie reason for believing that the plaintiff will succeed on her first count. It is possible that the woman may have a good claim, and I do not wish by any judgment of mine to prevent her from asserting and making good that claim. The only course open, therefore, is that the Court should allow the appeal and remit the case to the Resident Magistrate to decide on the first count of the summons—because, as to the others, I should think they would not be brought forward—with leave to the defendant to amend the plea, if so advised, by pleading that he has fully administered the estate, without knowledge of the plaintiff's claim, and that he has no funds as executor to meet such claim, defendant to pay the costs of appeal, but all other costs, including costs already incurred in the Resident Magistrate's Court, and to be incurred, to abide the result of the decision of such Resident Magistrate's Court.

Mr. Louwrens moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Mr. Toms moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court.

Defendant appeared and said that he admitted having contracted the debt, amounting to £32, for rent and board and lodging in Johannesburg. Witness was now secretary of the Civil Service Club in Cape Town, and earned £25 a month. He was married, and was unable to make any payment to plaintiff. Witness was paying £8 a month upon other liabilities. He had made two payments of £2 a month to plaintiff since he came to Cape Town.

Decree granted, execution suspended pending payment of £2 a month, first payment to be made on the 1st June.

Defendant thereupon stated that he was leaving his position on the 31st July on account of this action having been taken against him. He had had a request from the committee of the club to resign.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ADMISSION. { 1907.
May 21st.

Mr. De Waal moved for the admission of Willem Daniel Bosman as an attorney and notary.

Application granted and oaths administered.

BROWN V. WARD AND CO.

Mr. Louwrens moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Final order granted.

LEWIS V. DAVIS.

Mr. Toms moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court.

Defendant appeared and said that he admitted having contracted the debt, amounting to £32, for rent and board and lodging in Johannesburg. Witness was now secretary of the Civil Service Club in Cape Town, and earned £25 a month. He was married, and was unable to make any payment to plaintiff. Witness was paying £8 a month upon other liabilities. He had made two payments of £2 a month to plaintiff since he came to Cape Town.

Decree granted, execution suspended pending payment of £2 a month, first payment to be made on the 1st June.

Defendant thereupon stated that he was leaving his position on the 31st July on account of this action having been taken against him. He had had a request from the committee of the club to resign.

Maasdorp, J.: The order must stand, and if you can't pay at the end of July you may apply for relief, and may surrender your estate.

ADLER V. STAPLES.

Dr. Greer moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £40, together with £8 2s. 7d. taxed costs. Counsel said that defendant had pointed out certain property, which, he said, would realise £70, but which had been sold, and had only realised £7 odd, of which about £3 had been absorbed by expenses, leaving due £35 12s. 8d. on the judgment.

Defendant said that only a portion of the goods had been sold by the plaintiff. There were fixtures in the possession of the plaintiff, and also two vases, which he found were still on plaintiff's premises.

The matter was ordered to stand over until later in the day to enable defendant to inquire into the position of the property, which he claimed to have left with plaintiff.

Defendant later on gave evidence, and said that he had formerly had an interest in the Germania Hotel. The only things he had seen in the premises to-day were two vases which had cost him ten guineas. He was out of employment, and was unable to make any offer. He had lately been in German South-West Africa, where certain debts were owing to him.

The Court declined to make an order.

HOFFMAN AND CO. V. COOKE.

Dr. Greer moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court, Woodstock, for £59 15s., with £1 10s. 10d. taxed costs. The Messenger of the Court had made a return of nulla bona.

Defendant said that he admitted the debt, but was without means. The only property he had was a little furniture. He formerly had an hotel business, and had contracted the debt for goods supplied. The furniture might realise £20. Witness owed £400 to other creditors. He thought that he ought not to give up the furniture to this creditor so long as he had other creditors. Witness had a salary of £16 13s. 4d., and was employed as a commercial traveller. He had to support a wife and three children.

By Dr. Greer: The reason why the return of nulla bona was made was, he supposed, because his wife had moved from the house where she had been staying. He was away in the country at the time. He thought he would be able to pay 10s. a month.

Maasdorp, J.: A decree will be granted, execution to be suspended upon payment of £1 a month. If at any time it is found that you cannot pay, you must consult your legal adviser to see by what means you can get relief. For the present you must pay £1 a month; you admit you have some property and you earn a salary. The first payment must be made on the 1st of next month.

GEDDES V. GALLOWAY.

Dr. Greer moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of the Magistrate's Court, Cape Town, for £7 5s., with £2 7s. 4d. taxed costs.

Defendant appeared, and said that she admitted the debt, but was unable to make any payment. Witness was married without community of property. She did not know why the plaintiff had not sued her husband. The judgment debt arose out of medicine supplied by plaintiff, who was a chemist. Witness's sister had made an offer of £25 a month to all the creditors, the total amount of witness's debts being £520 or £300. Mr. Geddes refused to accept the offer.

By Dr. Greer: Her sister had received a large bequest under her father's will. Witness was living at Turf Hall, Wynberg. Her husband had no means.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that this lady has no means. Why steps were not taken against the husband I don't know. I am not aware, however, that that would make any difference, because it appears that he also has no means. There will be no order.

INSOLVENT ESTATE ALLY V. 1907.
KRIEL, ROUX AND CO. (May 21st.

Mr. Louwrens moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £30 6s. 4d. for goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs.

MICHAU AND DE VILLIERS V. THERON.
Rule 329d—Debt not yet due—Liquidated demand.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £12 6s. 9d., fees due for professional services and moneys disbursed, and for £175, with interest from the 1st August, 1906, being the balance of purchase price of certain property in the division of Fraserburg, for which the plaintiffs became sureties for the defendant to the seller. The defendant had, the summons alleged, broken the conditions on which the plaintiffs had become sureties, inasmuch as he had mortgaged the property without first obtaining their consent. Plaintiffs wanted some indemnity. Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that the debt would not become due until the 1st August next; but the plaintiffs were, he submitted, entitled, as sureties, to protect themselves even before the debt became due. He cited Voet (46, 1, 34), and Van Leeuwen (Kotze's Trans., 2, 4), and submitted that the demand had been sufficiently liquidated to entitle plaintiffs to their discharge from suretyship or to some indemnity.

Maasdorp, J.: The only question the Court has to decide here now is whether the plaintiff can proceed under Rule 329d, which provides that, where the defendant is in default after the summons has been served upon him, in certain cases the plaintiff need not proceed further to file declaration, but can pray for judgment upon the summons. But it is said that that can only be done in case his claim is for a debt or for a liquidated demand. The question, therefore, would arise here whether, upon the face of the summons, it is alleged that a debt is due, or that he is entitled to make a demand upon some liquidated amount. Now, there is no allegation in the summons which would substantiate such a position, and all the Court can say now is, not that the plaintiff is not entitled to some relief under the circumstances, but he has taken the wrong course in proceeding under Rule 329d. If he thinks he has a claim against the plaintiff, he can proceed further in the ordinary course. Judgment will be given in the first claim for £12 6s. 9d., with costs.

PROVIDENT LAND TRUST V. FYNE.

Mr. Russell moved, under Rule 330, for leave to sign judgment against plaintiff (Fyne) for not proceeding with his action within the time stipulated by Rules of Court.

Order granted, with costs.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte BADENHORST. } 1907.
} May 21st.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to petitioner, as guardian of his minor daughter, to mortgage certain property situate in Colesberg, to enable repairs and alterations to be effected, and to pay costs of transfer duty, etc. Petitioner had waived his usufruct to the estate. Counsel read a report by the Master on the application.

Maasdorp, J.: It is quite clear that the Master disapproves of the proposal made by the applicant in this matter. He is the usufructuary of this property, and it is his duty, under ordinary circumstances, to keep the property in repair. Nothing appears upon the affidavits to explain his neglect to have done so in the past, and it would seem that the child would obtain no benefits by the steps which it is here proposed to take and, as is suggested by the Master, the applicant would be relieved of the responsibilities of the usufructuary, and still retain the full benefit of the property if the prayer, as made here, is granted, and nothing more is provided for. There is not sufficient information before the Court to grant this application, and there will be no order.

STEER V. THOMAS.

This was an application to make absolute a certain rule nisi interdicting respondent from disposing of his interest in certain property pending an action, to be instituted by applicant to recover £237 18s., balance of account.

Mr. Benjamin was for applicant; Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for respondent, who consented to the rule being made absolute, conditionally on the applicant proceeding with his action without delay.

Mr. Benjamin said that the declaration had now been drawn.

Rule absolute, costs to be costs in the cause.

FEDERAL SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE CO., LTD., V. OFFICIAL LIQUIDATOR, BUFFALO SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE CO., LTD.

Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones) moved for leave to appeal to the Privy Council from a judgment given by the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Hopley, for respondents for £1,635 and £1,707, less £4.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) appeared for respondents, to consent to leave being given.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp said that the usual order would be granted.

Mr. McGregor said he took it that the usual order meant that execution would be stayed on proper security being given by the applicants.

Mr. Burton said that that was where he joined issue with his learned friend, because he submitted that the execution should issue, and that respondents should give security.

Mr. McGregor said that the matter was in the discretion of the Court, and that the simpler course would be for execution to be stayed on security being given. In this case they had on one side the liquidation of a moribund concern. He cited Reiners, Von Luer and Co.'s case (9 Juta, 266).

Mr. Burton submitted that the usual course had been for execution to issue, and for security to be given by the party in whose favour judgment had been given. There were circumstances in this case which especially made it desirable that the usual course should be followed. Applicants admitted on the pleadings liability for practically one-half of the debt.

Mr. McGregor having been heard in reply,

Maasdorp, J.: Under Rule 39 it is quite within the discretion of the Court, upon good grounds being shown either way, to order, upon leave to appeal being given, either that execution should issue or that execution should be suspended. Now, as a rule, the order takes the form that execution shall issue, the plaintiff having obtained his judgment is, under ordinary circumstances, entitled to execution, and the Court may leave that ordinary course to be pursued, or it may stay the hand of the successful party, but it is, as a matter of fact, the case that, generally speaking, the execution is issued, and the applicant receives the necessary security from the successful party in the Court below. I do not think that any good reason has been shown why the plaintiff in this case should not be allowed to issue execution. It is pointed out that if funds were paid over to the defendant, who is the respondent in this matter, and is the liquidator of a company that is being wound up, those funds could not be made use of with safety by the defendant. Well, that is a question for the respondent to consider. The only thing that the applicant is entitled to is to be properly secured, and I suppose it will be seen that proper security is given in this case. Leave to appeal is granted, execution to issue, and respondent to give security. As to the question of costs, I think, when these applications are before the Court, the question is generally raised one way or the other what shape the order of the Court should take as to the issue of execution. Although there may not be any specially strenuous opposition raised, still, as a rule, the question is raised for the consideration of the Court. Consequently, the shape this order takes is practically, I consider, the usual shape, and the usual order will be granted, i.e., that the costs of this application be costs in the cause.

Mr. Payne moved for leave to the Registrar of Deeds to amend the petitioner's name in certain deeds of transfer, mortgage bond, etc.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte THERON.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to issue a certified copy of a certain mortgage bond hypothecating property in the town of Beaufort West. The original bond had disappeared from petitioner's office under mysterious circumstances.

Rule granted, returnable on the 12th July, and to be published once in the "Beaufort West Courier" and the "Cape Times."

Ex parte ESTATE HARE.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved, on the petition of the executor dative, for leave to mortgage certain property in Cradock, in order to effect necessary repairs. It was estimated that a loan of £250 was required.

[Maasdorp, J.: In these applications very often it does not seem to be remembered that the person who has a life interest has a duty to keep the property in repair.]

Mr. De Villiers: The usufructuary consents that the interest should be deducted from the rent.

Leave granted as prayed to raise a loan of £250.

Ex parte SCHMIDT.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an extension of the return day and for an order for substituted service of a certain edict calling upon applicant's wife to show cause why he should not sue her for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. Counsel read an affidavit, from which it appeared that efforts to serve the citation personally upon respondent in Glasgow, Scotland, had failed. Respondent's sister knew where she lived, but refused to disclose her address.

Return day extended until the 15th August, service to be effected upon Mrs. Dittrich (respondent's sister), and one publication to be given in the "Glasgow Herald" and the "Gazette."

Ex parte BROWNELL.

Mr. Russell moved, in the petition of M. W. Brownell, for leave to sue in forma pauperis and by edictal citation her husband, Alonza Aaron Brownell, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Petitioner said that her husband was believed to be at present in North-West Canada, having deserted her in 1903.

Petitioner appeared, and said that she was employed at Worcester as a dress-maker at a salary of £6 a month. She was without means to institute an action. Respondent left her without making any explanation.

Mr. Russell said that he was prepared to certify.

Rule nisi granted, returnable on the 17th September, calling upon respondent to show cause why the petitioner should not be granted leave to sue him in forma pauperis, and leave to sue by edict granted, returnable on the 17th September, personal service if possible, failing which, one publication in "Gazette" and a Canadian paper to be mentioned later.

Postea (May 22nd).

Mr. Russell applied for an addition be made to the order to the effect that the publication in a Canadian newspaper be made in the "Calgary Herald."

The Court directed that substituted service in Canada be made in the "Calgary Herald."

Ex parte ATTWELL.

Dr. Greer moved for an order declaring petitioner of sound mind and capable of managing her own affairs, and superseding the appointment of Mr. J. E. N. Roos as curator of her property. Petitioner had been discharged from the Valkenberg Asylum as recovered. An order had been granted on the 11th May, 1906, declaring her of unsound mind and incapable of managing her own affairs, and appointing Mr. Roos as curator of her property.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ESTATE CONNOR.

Mr. Long moved, on the petition of the executors, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent two imbecile sons of the testator in an application by their brothers (Thomas and John Connor) for leave to mortgage landed property in the division of Somerset East.

From the petition, it appeared that the late Mrs. Connor, who died at Somerset East, bequeathed her farm, situate in the division of Somerset East, to her two sons, Thomas and John, on condition that they supported and maintained their two brothers, Mathew and Morris, and did not dispose of the farm without making due provision for the said brothers. There was a deficiency in the movables of £1,774 10s. 6d. In the event of a sale of the farm, there would not be a sufficient balance from the proceeds to enable Thomas and John to maintain their brothers, and they therefore proposed to raise a mortgage on the property.

Maasdorp, J.: The brothers should be parties to the application. Without saying anything as to the nature of the application which is intended to be made, the Court will appoint George Magnus Stahl, as curator ad litem for the purposes of the application to represent Mathew and Morris.

Ex parte ESTATE NEL. { 1907.
May 21st.

Will (mutual-Massing-Fiduciary heir—Usufructuary—Transfer—Deeds Office practice.

N. and his late wife, married in community, made a mutual will by which each instituted the survivor as joint heir with the children of the marriage. there was only one child, a minor. On the death of the survivor a certain farm, part of the joint estate, was to pass to the child. N. now asked for transfer of the whole farm into his own name in order that he might pass transfer to a third person who had purchased all his rights therein.

Held, (1) that N. was entitled to transfer of his own half share, subject to the reversionary rights of the child being recorded on the Deed of Transfer (2) That the question of transfer of the quarter share bequeathed to himself as fiduciary heir, not having been raised, the Court would give no decision thereon. But (semble) it is the practice of the Deeds Office to allow transfer to a fiduciary, but not from him to any third person. (3) That transfer could not be given to N. of the remaining fourth share, bequeathed to the child, of which N. had only the bare usufruct: and hence the application in its present form must be refused.

Mr. Close moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer of certain property in the division of Ladismith, in the estate Nel, in accordance with certain powers of attorney granted in favour of Johannes P. C. Nel by his late wife. Counsel stated that the survivor wished to get transfer passed to him as executor and individually, in order to pass transfer simultaneously to one Solomon, who had purchased his rights in the property from him. The Registrar wished to record as against the transfers the fact that the survivor had ceded his rights to the purchaser. He was prepared to allow the transfer to the survivor as a fiduciary heir, but the survivor wished to go further, and at the same time as he got transfer, he wished to transfer to Solomon. The only child of the marriage was a daughter, aged 20 years. Counsel read a report by the Registrar of Deeds, setting out his attitude at some length.

[Maasdorp, J.: What is it you ask for? Transfer out and out of the whole property to the fiduciary?]

Mr. Close: Yes, subject to the terms of the will.

[Maasdorp, J.: You want the whole of the properties transferred in both transfers?]

Mr. Close said that that was so. He contended that the child would be fully protected if the fiduciary were granted out-and-out transfer, subject to the terms of the will.

[Maasdorp, J.: That would take the child's portion away from her.]

Mr. Close submitted that there could be no prejudice to anyone in case the survivor were given transfer out and out. He cited In re Zondack's Will (19 S.C., 24), and sections 2 and 4 of Act 5, 1884.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case it appears that the applicant made a joint will with his wife, who is now deceased, and under that will each institutes and appoints the other as joint heir with the children. It appears that in this case there is only one child. There is a further provision in the will that, upon the death of the survivor, the landed property shall pass to the child. Now, the result of this would be that in a certain farm, which forms part of the estate, half the property would still belong to the survivor. To the other half the survivor and the child are made joint heirs, and, upon the death of the father, the whole of the farm is to pass to the child. As to one quarter, consequently, the father having been made an heir, is now in the position of a fiduciary heir. With regard to the other quarter, the child is the heir, and the father is the usufructuary. There are, therefore, three parts of this farm standing in different relationships to the property of the applicant. As to half, he is full owner of the property, of a quarter he is fiduciary heir, and of the remaining quarter he is only usufructuary. He wishes to obtain transfer of the whole of this farm into his own name, and it appears that, under the circumstances, no difficulties will be raised in the Registry of Deeds Office to allow such transfer to pass to him. Without entering into the question as to what right the father might have to get transfer into his own name of that portion to which his child has been made heir and of which he is only usufructuary, I may say that, so far as the father himself is concerned, the Registrar of Deeds states that there will be no difficulty in passing transfer to him, having all the rights upon the property recorded in such transfer. The question is not now whether, if any opposition is made to that portion which the child is entitled to and of which the father is only usufructuary being required for purposes of transfer to the father, the Court would allow such a transfer to pass—as I say, that question is not now raised, and the Court, therefore, expresses no opinion upon it. But the applicant in this matter contemplates, after he gets transfer of this property, to pass transfer to a third party, who has purchased all his rights in the property. Now, with reference to his own half share, there may have been no difficulty in respect of his dealing with it by means of transfer, with the rights upon it being recorded in the office of the Registrar of Deeds. With that portion of which he is fiduciary heir there might or might not have been difficulty, but I certainly think that as far as the child's share is concerned, it is quite clear that he is not the owner—he is merely the usufructuary—and he is not entitled by transfer to pass ownership to a third party, when he himself is not entitled to such ownership, and that would be the effect of a transfer of the property to the purchaser of his rights. It would appear in the Registry of Deeds Office, if transfer were allowed, that the ownership in a certain farm has been transferred to this purchaser, and that would include one-quarter of the farm, in which the seller himself had no right of ownership. This application can, therefore, not be granted, because it involves that difficulty which I have mentioned; it would involve the transfer also of the child's share, which, in my opinion, cannot be effected. The Registrar of Deeds goes further, and it may be that that is the correct position—that, even with regard to the property of which he is fiduciary, though he is allowed to obtain transfer in his own name, it is not the practice of the Registry of Deeds Office to allow transfer to be passed to any third person, but if rights are acquired in respect of such property those rights would be registered in the Registry of Deeds Office in such a way as to protect such rights. How those rights are to be protected, and what the effect would be of any deed that might hereafter be registered, it is not for the Court now to express an opinion, but the application, as it is made now, must be refused in so far as it has reference to the transfer of the property to the purchaser of the applicant's rights.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

JANSEN V. VAN DER MERWE. } 1907.
May 22nd.

Servitus viae—Non user—Change in course of river—Interference with natural flow of water—Damage to neighbour's property.

This was an application to make absolute a certain rule nisi interdicting the respondent from going on to applicant's property at Bethesda, district of Graaff-Reinet, and proceeding with certain works in raising the river bed, and causing damage to the applicant's furrow and land.

It appeared that the applicant is the owner of the farm Wiljebosch, and the respondent owns the adjoining farm Leeuwwlei. Respondent had commenced certain works in the tributary adjoining applicant's farm so as to enable him to use a road from his farm to the Bethesda-road railway station, notwithstanding applicant's remonstrances that these works would interfere with his furrow and render his land liable to damage from flood waters. It was clear that the road in question had not been used for some years, no repairs having been carried out since a freshet washed the road away and changed the course of the river. Respondent's position, as disclosed on the affidavits, was that the works he proposed to carry out would not be prejudicial to applicant's rights.

Mr. Burton was for applicant, Johannes Jochimus Jansen; Mr. McGregor appeared for respondent, Jacobus Johannes Bennie van der Merwe, to show cause against the rule.

Mr. McGregor said that apparently respondent did not admit that the owner of Leeuwwlei was entitled to this road.

[Maasdorp, J.: I think for the purpose of this application that might be taken.]

Mr. Burton: We assume that he is entitled to the road.

Mr. McGregor said that the respondent, if he were entitled to a road, must be entitled to a road he could travel by. That road was traversed by a certain stream. In 1901 a freshet came which intercepted the road. Respondent had a right to repair. It could not be that as a result of the flood he had lost his road. He had had a road to the railway station. In his repairs the Court watched that he did not do damage to his neighbour. Voet on Servitudes (8, 4, 16) pointed that out. Counsel cited Maasdorp's Institutes (pp. 118-990).

[Maasdorp, J.: That is very clear. You are entitled if you have that road to put it in such a state that you may use it. The only question is whether, in doing so, it would not be necessary in certain circumstances to get the consent of the owner as to exactly what might not be done, and not take it upon yourself to do exactly as you please.]

Mr. McGregor: The applicant has taken a non possumus attitude throughout.

Mr. McGregor: Applicant does not take up the attitude that the work shall be done in a certain way. We say we have satisfied the Court on these affidavits that we are doing it in a way that is most helpful to him. Counsel submitted that applicant's consent was not necessary, but the respondent must do the work in such a way that it would not cause unnecessary and gratuitous damage to the land. Applicant had not taken up a fair attitude; he had evaded the point, and had made an attempt to secure a technical victory, which would give him a great advantage in a matter of really big substance between the two farms, viz., the closing of the road. Counsel cited Voet 43, 19, 2, Assman v. Rautman (12 S.C., 279), and Steyn v. Zeeman (20 S.C., 221).

Mr. Burton said that he did not see how the applicant could have acted more fairly than he had done. Applicant was never consulted about these works; he was never given an opportunity to say what he would do. He declined to accede to a deviation. The next thing was that he received a notice from respondent that he was going to erect certain works upon the river bed. Respondent had had a drift, he must use that drift as he had used it before, but he had never at any time had any sort of construction in the river bed by way of forming a causeway or a roadway. Respondent wanted to make a street through the river in the same condition, as he said, as the streets in Graaff-Reinet. He wanted to put in works 6 feet high to give him a causeway across this stream. Respondent had hitherto had a servitude of a drift, but he had never had a causeway. He was now proposing to provide something that he had never previously had.

Mr. McGregor having been heard in reply,

Maasdorp, J.: It appears from the affidavits that have been put in that the respondent, who is the owner of the farm Leeuw Vlei, is entitled to the use of the road running across the farm of the applicant to the Bethesda-road Railway Station. Some years ago, during the heavy rains, the road, where it passes through the river, was washed away, and the course of the river was partially diverted there. After that the road was impassable at that spot for a considerable time. It is admitted on the part of the respondent that this occurred in the year 1901. There are statements in the affidavit that it is for a longer period that this road has been disused, and that for a considerable period it has been in such a state that it was not fit for use. It is not contended on behalf of the applicant that the respondent is not now still entitled to use that road. A non-user for the period from 1901 or longer has not been set up as actually destroying the servitude over the property along that road but still this non-user becomes of considerable importance. In this matter, it would seem that during the time that this drift has been left in a neglected condition that the banks of the river on the right side, where the lands of the applicant lie, have been gradually worn away, until they have assumed a very considerable height, and not only that, but as the bank of the river was wearing away, the water followed the bank, and has therefore considerably deviated from its original course. The difficulty the respondent has now to contend with is this, that after the lapse of years, he finds that the course of the river has been somewhat altered, and the formation of this high bank on the road in the river has made it absolutely impassable, and rendered it necessary that very extensive works should be made in order to render it passable again. This neglect, therefore, has considerably altered the nature of the locality there, and it now becomes necessary to enter upon the construction of the road, so as to make it passable. It will be necessary to construct very extensive works, which may or may not seriously affect the applicant's property, and the difficult question, therefore, now arises, whether what the respondent now proposes to do is of such a character that it will seriously affect the property of the applicant. The affidavits seem to be mainly directed to that point. On behalf of the applicant, a number of persons have made affidavits to establish the view that if the work should be carried out in the manner in which it is now being done by the respondent that they will seriously some years ago, and he wished to restore that surface by making a substantial causeway of masonry. Now, it is quite clear that when such causeways are constructed in the bed of a river they may have extensive effects on the bed of that river in scouring it out, because of the manner in which it caused the water to flow over the embankment, and that may have a serious effect on the bed of the river and on the banks in the immediate neighbourhood. I am not satisfied that this extensive work, which has been undertaken without consulting the applicant, is of such a nature that it is not likely to cause damage to the applicant, as is alleged by those who are supporting with their affidavits the cause of the applicant. Now, the change of the river has caused a flow along the curve of the present bank, and the applicant now claims the right to alter the course of the river. As the river has run for some years, it has made a course for itself around this curve, and the alteration made by respondent caused the water to impinge upon quite a different part of the bank, on the applicant's side; who alleges that this alteration, throwing the direct impact in that way, is causing a serious change in the bank on the opposite side, and I am quite satisfied from the plan put in by one of the witnesses for the respondent that that is the case. The respondent is interfering with the ordinary course of nature in wearing away the bank and interfering with the course the river has taken for this past six or seven years, by this causeway which he has put up, thus throwing the water with great force in quite another direction, and from the plan which he has put in one finds the natural result on the opposite bank, which is of soft material, being worn away. That alone establishes this position, that the alterations which the respondent is making are having some serious effect on the property of applicant. The respondent is not entitled to construct any works which will be injurious to the applicant. It does appear to me that the applicant on his part has not been prepared to make sufficient concession in order to enable the respondent to effect works which might be necessary for him to restore his servitude, but if he has been unreasonable the respondent can compel him by legal means to take a reasonable course. The respondent having himself in a high-handed manner undertaken works which he is not entitled to do without the consent of the applicant, must be stopped from proceeding with the work further. Now, it seems to me that the very gentlemen who have come forward to give their opinion as to what should be done may be very useful friends in advising the parties hereafter in the course to take in establishing and preserving their rights on both sides. It is by going to arbitration only that affect the lands of the applicant by throwing the water against the bank in a manner in which it has not been accustomed to flow. From the respondent's side we have the opinion of a number of witnesses that, so far from the alterations now being made being injurious, they will be beneficial to the applicant. The only thing I can say is, that after reading all the affidavits, I am not satisfied on the opinion there given in view of the conflicting statements there expressed that the work will not be of serious detriment to the applicant. If the respondent wishes to establish that position he will have to do it in some other form. If he has the right which he wishes to assert, he will have to establish that right by proceeding at law in another way. To my mind the course he is taking will be of very serious import, whatever it may be. He proposes to construct a very high embankment in the bed of the river, which appears to be of very soft material, from the manner in which it was washed away in the past. It has been reduced to a depth of six feet lower than it was the matter can be settled. No litigation in Court can put a final settlement on the point. Whatever litigation takes place in this court, the matter will have to be referred to some independent man of skill and experience in these matters. I think the position is this: That the respondent is entitled to exercise his rights of servitude if they can possibly be exercised by making structures which, without damaging the applicant, will restore this drift. Upon arbitration it may be found that at this very spot, without damage, the drift may be made, or it may be found that it cannot be there made, but that it can be made in the immediate neighbourhood. I think I can express the opinion which will not be a final opinion, because I do not know the course they may take, that if the drift cannot be made at this particular locality then in law it may be made in the immediate neighbourhood, as something must be done to allow the servitude to be exercised by respondent. The rule was made absolute, with costs.

Ex parte ESTATE SLABBERT.

Mr. Howes moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to register certain mortgages against the estate property. It appeared that the late Johannes Slabbert in August, 1905, obtained leave to mortgage the property for £250, but died before a mortgage was passed. The executrix in February last applied for leave to mortgage the property in a sum of £363 5s. 7d., in order to liquidate the estate debts. She had, it seemed, been under the impression that she could also avail herself of the leave formerly given by the Court to mortgage the property for £250, and raise a mortgage for the combined sums. The Registrar, however, declined to sanction this proposal, and petitioner applied for a supplementary order authorising a mortgage to cover the amounts mentioned in both applications, as well as costs of this application. The matter was recently before Mr. Justice Buchanan, and was referred to the Registrar of Deeds for report. The Registrar now said that he saw no objection to the application.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ESTATE
MEINTJES.

{ 1907.
June 10th.

Will (mutual) — Massing — Usufructuary — Sale of portion of the inheritance — Usufructuary's debts.

The late M. and his wife, the present applicant, married in community, made a mutual will, providing, inter alia, that in the event of M. predeceasing her she should, so long as she should not remarry, enjoy the use and usufruct of the entire joint estate as her own absolute property with power to sell and dispose of the movable and immovable property and to purchase other property in lieu thereof. Should she remarry, the administration of the estate was to pass to her co-executor and co-administrator who was to pay over to her the rents and profits of the joint estate and, if need be, he might in his discretion sell and dispose of the landed property . . . and on her death was to transfer the property to the children of the marriage, subject to any fidei-commissum. Mrs. M. might impose by will. She had not re-married, and there was one son, issue of the marriage, now a major. The applicant contended that it was only in the event of her re-marriage that the son would inherit the estate, and she now applied for leave to sell certain of the landed property in order to pay certain debts contracted for her own maintenance and in respect of certain accommodation notes signed by her for her son. The son consented to the application and the applicant was willing to renounce her usufruct.

Held, that as she was only a usufructuary of an estate which had been massed, and as no rights had, as yet, vested in her son under the will, the Court had no power to allow anything to be taken out of the corpus of the joint estate, even with the son's consent, in order to pay the aforesaid debts.

This was an application on behalf of the executors of this will of the late Buyert Meintjes, and of his only son, leave to sell part of the estate property, of which Anna S. Meintjes, the widow, held the life usufruct, in order to pay the debts of the estate. Anna S. Meintjes waived her right to the usufruct of the estate. By the terms of the mutual will of Buyert Meintjes and Anna Meintjes, it was provided that "in the event that the testator shall be the first dying of us, then the survivor, the said Anna S. Meintjes, shall, so long as she shall not re-marry, have and enjoy the use and usufruct of our entire joint estate, property and effects as her own absolute property, with power to continue the farming operations of the joint estate, and to sell and dispose of the movable and immovable property, and to purchase other property in lieu thereof, and to administer the joint estate in such manner as she may deem meet, but in the event of the said A. S. Meintjes entering into a second marriage her disposal and control of the joint estate shall cease and determine, and the joint estate shall forthwith be vested in and be assigned and set over to and be claimable by the secretary for the time being of the Midland Fire Insurance and Trust Co. (altered in a codicil to the secretary of the Graaff-Reinet Board of Executors) . . . in trust . . . that he shall administer the said joint estate, and if need be in his discretion sell and dispose of the landed property . . . and also in trust that he shall receive the rents and profits of the joint estate . . . and apply the same for the use and benefit of A. S. Meintjes for her natural life . . . with this proviso—that the said A. S. Meintjes shall and may retain the use and occupation and usufruct of the dwelling-house and certain two erven at Pearston . . . and on the decease of the said A. S. Meintjes, then upon further trust that the trustee shall pay, assign and transfer the property . . . to the lawful issue . . . of the said A. S. Meintjes in equal shares, subject to any entail of fidei-commissum which the said A. S. Meintjes may make or direct by will. And in default of any such lawful issue or descendants her surviving, then to the heirs of us the testators one-half to the heirs of the testator and the other half to the heirs of the testatrix, unless the testatrix shall otherwise direct."

Mr. McGregor moved.

Mr. McGregor, in argument, cited Zondack's case (19 S.C., 19), Castleman v. Stride's Executors (4 Juta, 28), Brown v. Richard (2 Juta, 314), Cloete's case (5 Juta, 59), Voet 36, I., 54, and 56, and Van der Keessel, Theses, 372, 374, and 375.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (June 10th).

Maasdorp, J.: Burgert Meintjes and Anna Meintjes, who were married in community of property, made their last will on 26th of September, 1893, by which they directed, amongst other things, that in the event of the testator being the first dying, the survivor, Anna Meintjes, so long as she shall not re-marry, shall have and enjoy the use and usufruct of the entire joint estate, property, and effects as her own absolute property, with power to continue the farming operations of the joint estate, and to sell and dispose of the movable and immovable property, and to purchase other property in lieu thereof, and to administer the joint estate in such manner as she may deem meet. But in case she should re-marry, the administration of the estate is taken out of her hands and placed in the hands of her co-executor and co-administrator, who is nevertheless to pay over to her all rents, issues, and profits of the joint estate, while she continues to enjoy the usufruct of certain of the immovable property. The will further provides that upon the death of Anna Meintjes, the properties held under the trust shall be transferred by the trustee in full and free property to the lawful issue of Anna Meintjes or their lawful descendants by representation. It was contended, on behalf of the petitioners in this case, that under the terms of the will the widow had full power to dispose of the property, and that it was only in the event of her marrying again that she lost that power. And, further, it was contended that it was only in that event that the power to administer passed into the hands of the co-administrator, who, upon her death, was to transfer the property to her heirs. It was argued that if she did not re-marry the trust would not pass into his hands, and he could not transfer to her heirs, and the conclusion drawn from this was that if she did not marry again the clause of the will appointing her issue heirs under the will would not come into operation. But it is quite clear that the will after making all the property of the joint estate, conferred upon her only the usufruct of that property, and while she is allowed to administer the estate as she may deem meet, she is not allowed to diminish it. She is expressly directed, should she sell any of the property, to buy other property in lieu thereof. This is not a case in which the free disposal of the estate is left to the survivor, with directions as to the disposal of anything that might remain over upon her death. The usufruct having been left to the widow, it is natural to expect that the will would proceed to dispose of the joint estate when she died, and that is what, in my opinion, the will actually does. It provides that the whole of the joint estate, as administered by the widow, or her co-administrator, shall in the event of her death, whether she shall have married again or not, be transferred to her lawful issue or their descendants by representation. In 1893, Burgert Meintjes died, leaving him surviving the widow and one son, Johannes Meintjes. He adiated under the will, and has ever since enjoyed the usufruct of the joint estate in terms of the will. She now alleges that she has incurred debts in connection with the estate, and for his maintenance, amounting to £1,800, and she applies for leave to sell certain of the landed property in the estate in order to pay off this debt, offering at the same time to renounce her usufruct. In whose favour she is prepared to renounce her rights is not stated, but it seems to be taken for granted by all the parties to the petition that her son Johannes is heir to the property with some vested rights, and that upon his becoming a consenting party to these proceedings, all difficulties are removed. The co-executor in his affidavit states that Johannes Meintjes is the sole heir under the will; and Johannes Meintjes in his affidavit also claims the position for himself. As a matter of fact, no right is now vested in him under the will, and in case he dies before his mother, no rights will become vested in him, but others may then inherit the estate. The Court cannot, even with the consent of Johannes, give such a direction respecting the disposal of the property as will injure the future heirs. The Court may allow the usufructuary to be reimbursed for expenses already incurred in the preservation of property belonging to the estate, or allow her funds out of the estate for expenses to be incurred for the preservation of such property, but that is not the application here. A vague statement is made that owing to heavy expenses in the administration of the estate, including her own maintenance, she has become indebted in the sum of £1,800. As a general rule, a usufructuary is herself responsible for ordinary expenses connected with the usufruct, and must take her maintenance out of the profits. There is nothing here to show that the expenses and maintenance in this case are such as the Court will allow to come out of the capital of the estate. The petition in this case is dated as far back as July, 1906, and the indebtedness as to which she asked for relief was then £1,800, but it now appears from the affidavit of the co-executor and of Johannes that it is intended to raise enough money to pay off the sum of £3,000, the balance of about £1,200 being made up of a debt incurred in respect of certain accommodation notes signed by the widow for the accommodation of her son Johannes. It is clearly beyond the power of the Court to allow anything to be taken out of the capital funds of the joint estate for the payment of that debt. The Court will make no order in this case.

Mr. Pohl moved for the admission of Louis Reginald Pago Fennell as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Griquatown.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for the admission of Oloff Marthinus Smuts Bergh as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Malmesbury.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SUTCLIFFE V. BARRON.

Mr. Roux moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. From the petition, it appeared that Sutcliffe alleged that defendant owed him £289 for wages, tram fares, and interest, Sutcliffe having been employed by defendant as a painter on day wages. Defendant was a builder and contractor, of Woodstock. Applicant claimed a preference over other creditors. He alleged that defendant was hopelessly insolvent, and that it was in the interests of the creditors that his estate should be sequestrated.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan (for defendant) opposed the application, and read an affidavit by his client, who denied that he was insolvent. He entered at some length into the position of his affairs, which it appeared, had for some time been administered under the control of a committee of inspection on behalf of the creditors. It was against the interests of the creditors, especially those who were concurrent, that his estate should be sequestrated. The greater part of the assets would be sacrificed in case of a forced sale. Counsel also put in a declaration by a number of the creditors, representing bonds amounting to £21,000, that the sequestration of the estate would be prejudicial to the interests of the creditors. He read a further affidavit by Mr. Orpen, of E. R. Syfret and Co.

Mr. Roux read a replying affidavit by applicant's attorney.

Mr. Buchanan said that the application was brought under the Act 38, 1884. Applicant must conclusively prove that the estate of the defendant was insolvent, and that it would be for the benefit of the creditors that the estate should be sequestrated. In this case a majority in number and value of the creditors said that it would not be for the benefit of the creditors that the estate should be sequestrated. Furthermore, sequestration would not be in the best interests of the applicant himself, because all the available assets would go to the mortgagees, and the applicant and the other concurrent creditors would get nothing.

Mr. Buchanan said that that was so. Counsel went on to point out that there was nothing to show that defendant had no disposable assets to meet this claim. He submitted that it had not been clearly proved that the defendant's estate was insolvent. What was behind the whole thing was the applicant's mistaken impression that he had a preference over the other creditors.

Hopley, J.: This is an application founded on Act 38, 1884 (section 3). The summons alleges that the defendant is insolvent, and that it would be for the benefit of his creditors that his estate should be sequestrated, and those are really the points that the Court has to consider. Now, it seems to me, on looking into the affidavits, that there can be no doubt that at the present time this estate is insolvent. It is admittedly unable to pay the claims upon it, it is doubtful whether the mortgagees are getting their full amount of interest, and, if they are not, sums of interest, and large sums of interest, must be accumulating against the estate, thus making its position worse. It is perfectly clear that the concurrent creditors, although they are nominally secured by a general mortgage bond, are not able to get anything at all, and have not for over a year received anything out of this estate, and it is forcibly put upon paper by the gentlemen who are managing the estate, and who say, in writing to the present plaintiff, that if they persist in his action, they will not be able to pay him anything, and he will probably lose the whole of his claim. If that means anything at all, it must be taken to mean that the estate is insolvent. It is suggested, however, that there is a "corner" for this estate which may be turned at some future time. It may be a sanguine view to take, and people, in their own interests, are justified in looking into the far future, but when it comes to a matter before the Court, it appears to me that the only sane view that the Court can take is to look absolutely at the present time. One cannot speculate as to what may happen in the future, matters, instead of getting better, may get worse, we have had so many bitter lessons of hoping and hoping, and on the present valuation, it seems to me that the estate is actually insolvent. The only other question is, is it for the benefit of the creditors that the estate should be sequestrated? It is shown that, on the present-day valuation, there is only a small deficit, £300 or £400, on this large estate. It would be for the benefit of the creditors to utilise the present times, and probably, although they would not get 20s. in the £1, still, according to Mr. Buchanan's argument, they would get something like 17s. or 18s. Are the creditors to wait for ever? It may be all right for the bondholders to sit on their bonds, as it were, but the unsecured creditors are not supposed to wait indefinitely, and if this estate be so good, and there be only this small deficit, it will, at all events, be for the benefit of these creditors that there should be speedy realisation of these assets, so that they may get whatever they can out of the estate. Their waiting longer may jeopardise their claims. I think that both the necessary portions of the 3rd section have been satisfied, that it has been proved to my satisfaction that the estate is insolvent, and that it would be for the benefit of the creditors that it should at the present moment be sequestrated and realised, so that they may get whatever they can out of it. Final order granted as prayed.

BOTHA V. DE KLERK.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £500, with interest from the 1st July, 1906, less £80 paid, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest and notice having been given; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. Roux appeared for defendant, and opposed the application.

Plaintiff is the late owner of the farm Haasjeskraal, district of Sterkstroom, and defendant is an attorney and auctioneer, of Sterkstroom.

Affidavits having been read,

Mr. Roux, in argument, submitted that plaintiff should be ordered to go into the principal case.

Hopley, J.: In this case I think there should be provisional sentence. It is not denied that the defendant owes £500 on a mortgage bond, and that he would be liable for the amount, less £30, which it is admitted that he has accounted for, but for a certain agreement which he alleges was made in February of this year, whereby the plaintiff agreed not to sue him if he fulfilled certain conditions, i.e., if he settled a certain action that was then pending between the parties in the Supreme Court, which has been done, if he paid the interest up to date, which may or may not have been done, and if he paid off the principal, an amount of £100. Now, he has not done this except on paper. He has not brought any sum in hand and said "Here is the £100 and here is the interest that I promised to pay," but he affects to have done it, and he alleges that he has done it by showing that there were these figures omitted from previous accounts. Now the whole of the defendant's case, as far as the due fulfilment of these obligations is concerned, hinges upon the question whether or not he is entitled to a sum of £150 13s. 9d. for commission for the sale of the plaintiff's farm, which he had undertaken in 1905, and which he carried through. He alleges that this farm was put into his hands for sale, and to this plaintiff then and there agreed, irrespective of anything else that he might get in the way of commission out of anybody else, to pay at the rate of 2½ per cent. on the purchase price of the farm. Plaintiff says he did put this matter into defendant's hands, and that he understood that 2½ per cent. was the auctioneer's charges for selling immovable property, but he also says that he understood, and that it was agreed, that all such commission should come out of and be paid by the purchaser, whoever he might be, and in this the plaintiff is corroborated by the fact that the conditions of sale and purchase clearly set forth that the auctioneer's charges must be paid by the purchaser, and corroborated by the fact that the purchaser (Mr. Peacock) did pay the auctioneer's charges of 2½ per cent., and further corroborated by the fact that in the first two lots of accounts between the parties, which must have been written up from the ledger, none of this charge was brought up against the plaintiff in the present case. It would be a most unusual, and, it seems to me, a monstrous idea, that an auctioneer, in this case an attorney acts as an auctioneer, as is often the case in the country, should try and get double commission, that is, 2½ per cent. from the purchaser and 2½ per cent. from the seller, that he should by way of an afterthought, when he is accounting for moneys and hard pressed by the seller, discover that, although he has been paid 2½ per cent. by the purchaser, as agreed upon, he is also entitled to come with a charge against the seller of the property. I think the probabilities are altogether against him. If he thinks he can establish a case of that kind, the onus would be very strongly upon him to establish anything of the sort; he has his remedies, he can still go into the principal case, but it seems to me that I should give provisional sentence and declare the property executable, with costs against defendant as prayed.

Mr. Pohl moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £750, with interest from the 1st July, 1906, and insurance premiums, less £25 18s. paid on account, bond due by reason of the non-payment of interest: counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. Roux moved for a certain rule nisi to be made absolute calling upon respondents (three in number) to show cause why the proceeds of the sale of a certain cart belonging to petitioner should not be interdicted in the hands of one Marcus, an auctioneer, pending an action to be brought by petitioner.

Ex parte LOUW.

Ante-nuptial contract—Donation.

By an ante-nuptial contract L. had given to his future wife a half share in the farm M. The sale of this farm to him having been afterwards cancelled, the Court now granted leave to substitute the farm Z. in the ante-nuptial contract, saving the rights of all creditors up to the date of the registration of the so amended contract.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order authorising the amendment of a certain donation in an ante-nuptial contract in favour of petitioner's wife by the substitution of a certain farm for a share in another. Petitioner's wife consented to the amendment prayed for. Louw had been unable to fulfil his obligations so as to secure transfer of a certain farm in the district of Albert, half share in which was settled by him on his intended spouse under the ante-nuptial contract. The sale of this farm to petitioner had been cancelled, and he now proposed to substitute a farm in the district of Aliwal North. Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Hopley, J.: This is, as far as my experience goes, an unprecedented application. It would appear that the petitioner was married about the beginning of this year, having, under an ante-nuptial contract, given to his wife half of a farm which he had purchased for slightly over £1,000. This purchase he seems to have been unable to fulfil, and after the marriage the sale to him was cancelled, so that he has not fulfilled the obligations which he undertook in the ante-nuptial contract, namely, the ante-nuptial donation of the half of this farm, Margaret's Vale. He now wishes to rectify the position, and do the right and equitable thing, as far as possible, by giving the lady whom he married on those conditions, something exactly equivalent, or as near as may be, to the landed property which he gave and settled upon her by ante-nuptial contract. It appears that he owns in the adjoining district of Aliwal North a small farm called Zuurbron, which is worth just about £650, but is encumbered to the extent of £150, thus leaving a net value of just about the amount of the value of half of Margaret's Vale, and he wishes to substitute his farm Zuurbron for the half share of Margaret's Vale in the ante-nuptial contract. It is obviously the fair and proper thing for him to do, and I think the Court should help him to effect this object, nor do I, as between the petitioner and the world at large, saving only the creditors, see that there can be any objection on the part of anybody to petitioner fulfilling his contract in this way. I think, therefore, that the Court should help him to place the farm of Zuurbron in the ante-nuptial contract as if it had been placed there originally, instead of half the farm Margaret's Vale, which it is not possible for him now to deal with. The Court will order that the substitution be made as prayed, saving, however, the rights of any of the creditors of the petitioner, who may be his; creditors now and up to the time of the registration of this contract. After the registration of the contract, of course, the creditors must look after themselves. It will then become the farm of Mrs. Louw. An order will be granted substituting the farm Zuurbron for and instead of the half-share of Margaret's Vale, as a donation from petitioner to his wife prior to marriage, with all reservations in favour of any creditors up to the date of registration of the contract as amended.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent one J. S. Celliers in an action to have him declared unfit to manage his own affairs, and a curator appointed of his property.

BATE AND CO. V. BRITISH STEAM LAUNDRY LTD.

Mr. Wallach moved for an order for the winding up of the respondent company, the removal of John B. Hobday from the office of voluntary liquidator, and the appointment of J. M. P. Muirhead as official liquidator, with the powers under the 149th section of the Companies Act, 1892. Petitioners said that they had a claim against the company for £88. They had no security for this claim. On the 14th February last the company resolved to go into voluntary liquidation, and appointed J. B. Hobday, accountant, St. George's-street, to be liquidator. The assets of the company had been sold by Hobday for £350. Hobday had in March last left for Durban, Natal, and had not since returned. Certain attachments had been made of the furniture in his office.

Rule nisi granted, calling upon the said company and the said Hobday to show cause why the voluntary liquidation of the company should not be annulled, and why (1) the said Hobday should not be removed from the office of liquidator; (2) the said company should not be wound up by this Court; and (3) Mr. J. M. P. Muirhead should not be appointed liquidator, and it was further ordered that the said J. M. P. Muirhead be the provisional liquidator, with power to collect all amounts due to the company.

Postea (May 29th).

Hopley, J. said that he had omitted to make any directions as to publication of the rule. There would, of course, be personal service on the voluntary liquidator, Hobday. The rule must also be published once in the "Cape Times."

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

DU PLESSIS V. MASTER, { 1907.
SUPREME COURT. { May 29th.

This was an application for an order directing the Master to issue letters of administration confirming petitioner in her appointment as tutrix of the minor children by her marriage with the late A. C. Lombard.

Mr. Benjamin was for petitioner; the Master appeared in person.

Mr. Benjamin said that the question raised in this case was whether it was necessary for the Master to issue letters of administration confirming the petitioner in the appointment under the will as tutor of the children, or whether, as natural guardian, it was competent for her to act as tutrix. The Master, it appeared, considered that it was unnecessary to issue letters of administration, inasmuch as she would be natural guardian of the children. The minors were entitled to certain property from the estate of their grand-parents. Petitioner's first husband died on the 16th December, 1904, and on the 28th February, 1906, she entered into a second marriage. Counsel went on to say that the provisions under which Mrs. Du Plessis thought it was necessary that she should apply to the Court were embodied in sections 2 and 3 of Ordinance 105, 1833. He cited Voet 26, 4, 2, and 26, 4, 4.

The Master (in answer to the Court) said that, in case a woman re-married, she was not entitled to be tutrix. Petitioner had herself become a ward. In such cases a tutor should be appointed from the male relatives. The matter was raised with the Law Department about eleven years ago, but no decisions of the Court were available. The Law Department, at that time mentioned Grotius, 1, 7, 11, and Van Leeuwen, 1, 16, 11. He added that when he wrote to the petitioner, he was not aware that she had entered into a second marriage.

Mr. Benjamin said he had hitherto understood that the Master's objection was not to the petitioner acting as tutrix, but simply to the issue of letters of administration. On the question of a woman's right to act as tutrix in the event of re-marriage, he cited Maasdorp's Law of Executorship and Guardianship (p. 92), Greby v. Wiid (3 Menzies, 73), Van Rooren v. Werner (9 S.C., 425), Van der Linden, 1, 5, 1, Van der Keesel, 122, Grotius, 1, 7, 11, Schorer, Note 33 (Maasdorp's Trans., p. 384).

Hopley, J., suggested to counsel that in all the circumstances it might be desirable to withdraw the application, leaving it open to have some person or Board that the Master approved appointed as tutor to the children, together with the applicant. He added that he did not wish to disturb what had been the practice of the Master's Office for a long time.

Mr. Benjamin acquiesced.

The Master (in answer to the Court) said that the course he would suggest would be that application should be made to the Master to convene a meeting of maternal relatives of the minors for the election of a tutor.

[Hopley, J.: Then you would join her with this tutor?]

The Master: Not necessarily. We could, if she likes, but it is not customary to do so. There would be no objection if a tutor dative is appointed, and he likes to take the responsibility. He would have to give security. Your lordship will observe that this is not property coming from the parents, but from the grand-parents of the minors, over which the mother would have no control except she were tutrix.

Mr. Benjamin said that he would advise applicant to adopt the course suggested by the Master.

[Hopley, J.: By consent, the matter will stand over, and then you can withdraw it entirely if you come to the arrangement which the Master thinks is the proper one, or you can mention it again if the lady persists.]

Mr. Benjamin: After the expression of opinion from the Master, I think the best course would be to adopt your lordship's suggestion. In case the matter is not mentioned again, I would ask your lordship to direct that the costs of this application come out of the minors' property.

Hopley, J.: I think this is a bona fide application, and it is in the interests of the minors that the point should be settled. If the matter is settled without again coming before the Court, costs may come out of the estate of the minors.

DU PISANI V. DIVISIONAL COUNCIL, WILLOWMORE, AND DIEDERICKS.

Divisional Council Act (40 of 1889)—Rejection by Magistrate of duly nominated candidate.

A Magistrate as returning officer at a Divisional Council election has no power to reject a duly nominated candidate even if he has reason to believe him to be ineligible but must proceed as directed by Secs. 4, Subsec. (b) 56 and 71 of Act 40 of 1889.

A candidate need not resign any office of profit he may hold under the Crown before nomination but only before election.

This was an application upon notice calling upon the Civil Commissioner of Willowmore and Jacobus Johannes Diedericks to show cause why the said Diedericks should not be declared to have been improperly elected or appointed a member of the Willowmore Divisional Council for the Rietfontein ward, and why the Civil Commissioner should not be directed to take proceedings to have a fresh election taken.

From the applicant's affidavit, it appeared that he held office as Field-cornet in the division of Willowmore, and was also in charge of a small post office. A vacancy had occurred in the Divisional Council for the Rietfontein ward. Nominations were called for, but none were forthcoming. Then the Civil Commissioner called for nominations a second time, and applicant and Mr. Diedericks were nominated before the day fixed. Applicant had determined to resign the offices in question so as to enable him to qualify for membership of the Council, and on the 18th January he went in to Willowmore for the purpose of resigning the offices. On his arrival, he found that the Council was sitting, that the Civil Commissioner had at that meeting declared Mr. Diedericks duly elected, and that the latter had taken his seat. Deponent had since ascertained that the Civil Commissioner had endorsed the following note on his nomination paper: "Person nominated is a Field-cornet and postmaster; ineligible under section 30, Act 40, 1889." Applicant said that he was aggrieved by the Civil Commissioner's action, and that it was his intention to remove his disqualification and stand as candidate if again nominated on a fresh election being ordered.

An affidavit by the Civil Commissioner was also read, in which he explained the reasons of his action, and said that he acted conscientiously under the belief that he was correctly interpreting section 30 of Act 40, 1889.

Mr. Upington for the applicant. No appearance for respondents.

Mr. Upington submitted that the Civil Commissioner had gone wholly wrong in the course he had pursued on two grounds, viz.: (1) That the applicant was not disqualified for nomination by the fact that he held the two offices, and (2), even if he were ineligible, the C.C. had not followed the procedure laid down in the Act. Counsel quoted sections 28, 29, 30, 34 (b), and 35 of the Divisional Councils Act (No. 40, 1889), and submitted that, so long as a candidate resigned his place or office of profit under the Crown before he was elected, or before he became a Councillor, he was entitled to be nominated whether he held that office or not at the time of nomination. Furthermore, the C.C. had no power, without any procedure whatever, to disqualify a candidate. He should have taken the proceedings set out in sections 56 and 71. A fresh election should, counsel submitted, be ordered.

Hopley, J.: This is an application on notice to the Civil Commissioner of Willowmore and to Mr. Diedericks, who appears to be using and exercising the rights and duties of a Divisional Councillor there at present, to show cause why his election should not be declared to have been improperly made, and why it should not be set aside, and also to show cause why the respondents should not pay costs of this application. It would appear that the present applicant and Mr. Diedericks were, after an abortive call for nominations, on a second call for nominations for the Divisional Council, duly and properly nominated as candidates for the Divisional Council for their ward. At that time Mr. Du Pisani was a Field-cornet, which is an office under the Government, and was also a postmaster of a small country office, having a small emolument in the said district. He was, therefore, in terms of the Act, incapable of being a Councillor or sitting as a Councillor so long as he held these offices. But there is nothing in the Act that I know of which says that anybody, so long as he holds such offices, is incapable of being nominated for office as a Divisional Councillor. Mr. Du Pisani says it was his intention to qualify himself by resigning the two offices that he held in time for the election, and he goes further, and says that he was actually on his way—in fact that he did go—into Willowmore to resign these offices so as to put himself on the right side of the provisions of the law for the purpose of election for his ward. On his arrival, however, he found that the Magistrate had peremptorily struck off his name from the nominations, and, moreover, had declared his rival, Mr. Diedericks, duly elected, and he found that Mr. Diedericks was sitting and attending the meeting as a member of the Council, and he says that Mr. Diedericks has ever since been exercising the functions of a Councillor. In taking this course the Magistrate was wrong. Section 34 (sub-section b) of Act 40 of 1889, says that "although the Civil Commissioner may deem a candidate to be ineligible, he shall nevertheless receive the said nomination, and make a record in writing of such reception, and his reasons for deeming the candidate to be ineligible." That is all he can do. Now, if he had done that in this case, his reason would have been that Mr. Du Pisani was holding offices under the Crown. That reason would, before the date of the election, have vanished, because Mr. Du Pisani would have resigned these offices, and he would then not have been ineligible as a Councillor. The Magistrate, however, by his precipitate action, in striking him off and declaring his rival elected, put it out of his power to qualify himself, and consequently he is left no course but to petition this Court to have the proceedings set aside. The 71st section sets forth what should have been done if Mr. Du Pisani had not resigned his offices in time; if he had not resigned and had been ineligible under the Act, and if in good time objection had been taken, then certain procedure would have had to be taken as set out in the Act, but the whole of that procedure has been rendered nugatory by the action of the Magistrate. It follows that the relief asked for must be granted in the present case, so as to allow the Divisional Council Act as it stands to be worked. An order will be made, declaring the election of Mr. Diedericks to have been improper, and setting aside that election. As to costs, it seems that the Magistrate, though mistaken, was acting bona fide, and the person to suffer in such a case is the candidate, Mr. Diedericks, who was improperly placed in the position in which he has been placed, and for whose removal it has been necessary to come to this Court. The respondent, Diedericks, will, therefore, be ordered to pay the costs.

provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £110, hypothecating certain property in the township of Molteno. Respondent had been last heard of in Johannesburg in 1898. Interest on the bond had not been paid since 1892.

Leave to sue by edictal citation granted, citation returnable on the 11th July. Personal service, failing which, one publication in the "Times of the Frontier" and the "Government Gazette."

Ex parte THEUNIS.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, or the petition of the executor and executrix, for leave to raise a loan of £50 upon the security of landed property in Caledon-street, Cape Town, to enable petitioners to take cession of a certain mortgage bond of which deceased had become surety and joint principal debtor.

Hopley, J.: It is clear that this estate is liable for the amount of the bond, and that there is not enough property, besides the Caledon-street property, which is specially bequeathed to the minor Magdalena Sarah Perus, to meet the amount of the bond, and the estate will have to find funds out of this specially bequeathed property. It is true that the estate is really only surety for a man called Neil Perus, but the bondholder prefers to go against the executor of the estate for his money, rather than against Perus, the co-principal debtor, leaving the executors to recover from Perus after having paid the bondholder. There seems to be no way of protecting the estate, or keeping the minor's property free from this charge, which, it is hoped, will be a temporary advance, and it seems, therefore, in the best interests of everybody, to grant an order as recommended by the Master. It is, therefore, ordered that the executors be allowed to raise £60, which sum shall be handed to the Master, and disbursed as may seem to him necessary for the purposes of the estate.

Ex parte MYLES AND WIFE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to petitioner to register an ante-nuptial contract, excluding community of property. The parties were married in Cape Town on the 18th November, 1906. The first petitioner had been in the Colony since 1899, and the second petitioner arrived here from England a few days before the marriage. They had been in ignorance as to the state of the law. Counsel cited In re Houghton (15 S.C., 8), Ingall's case (20 S.C., 323), and Fricker's case (2 C.T.R., 312).

Hopley, J.: It appears that the Court has granted similar applications on similar lines, previously, and we cannot distinguish the present application from Houghton's case (15 S.C., 8). Ingall's case (20, S.C., 323) also seems to be very much on the same lines as the present case. Here the parties expressly state that they never intended to marry in community of property, and the intention was, in fact, that they should be married as if by ante-nuptial contract, in this country, excluding community of property and the marital power. Therefore, in accordance with previous decisions, it is ordered that a notarial contract in terms of annexure "a" to the petition be drawn, and that it be registered, saving all rights of creditors of either of the parties prior to the date of such registration.

Ex parte WORDON AND PEGRAM, LTD.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for an order approving of a certain minute adopted by the petitioning company in the following terms: "That the capital of Wordon and Pegram, Ltd., henceforth is £20,000, divided into 20,000 shares of £1 each, instead of the original capital of £60,000 divided into 60,000 shares of £1. At the time of the registration of this minute the sum of £1 shall be deemed to have been paid upon each of the said 20,000 shares." Petitioners stated that on the 14th May last the Court, on petition of the company, made an order confirming reduction of the capital to 20,000 shares of £1 each. Thereafter the said order, together with the minute of meeting of the 8th May, was tendered to the Registrar of Deeds for registration, when it was pointed out that a minute approved by this Court, in terms of section 41 of the Companies Act, No. 25, 1892, was required. The aforesaid petition contained the necessary information required to be inserted in the minute referred to in section 41 of the Companies Act, and petitioners caused to be supplied to the Registrar of Deeds a certified copy of the said petition, together with a certificate under the hand and signature of the managing director, setting out that the 20,000 shares of £1 each in the reduced capital were fully paid up. Upon such information being supplied, the Registrar of Deeds had granted a certificate under section 41, in terms of copy annexed, marked "c," from which it would be observed that the following words had been deleted: "And a minute approved by the said Court, and containing the particulars specified in the above section." For all practical purposes the said certificate of the Registrar might be sufficient, but petitioners desired to fully comply with the provisions of section 41, and to obtain the approval of the Court of a minute to be filed with the Registrar of Deeds, and annexed to and made part of the memorandum of association.

Order granted as prayed.

APPEAL CASES.

REX V. PHILLIPS. { 1907.
June 8rd.

Transkeian liquor proclamation —Native—Permit—Glass.

A Transkeian proclamation enacted that no intoxicating liquor shall be supplied to a prohibited person unless he should produce a permit signed by a Magistrate authorizing the bearer of such permit to obtain such liquor and specifying the quantity and description of such liquor. A native chief, being a prohibited person, obtained a permit from a Resident Magistrate to purchase a glass of brandy and purchased from the appellant a half pint of brandy in addition to a small glass-full, described by him as a mouth-ful and a half. The appellant having been convicted of a contravention of the proclamation;

Held on appeal, that inasmuch as the quantity supplied was not more than could be contained in a good sized glass the proof of such contravention was insufficient.

This was an appeal upon notice to the Attorney-General against a decision of the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Mount Fletcher. The appellant (James Henry Wildemere Phillips) was charged on the 30th April with contravening the Proclamation 104 of 1903 and section 30 of Proclamation 2 of 1907, being an amendment of the former. He was sentenced to pay £50, or undergo a term of imprisonment for two months, with hard labour, all liquor in the possession of the accused to be forfeited, with no renewal of the licence for a period of five years.

The appeal was brought on the grounds that the decision was not supported by the evidence, and was contrary to law. The section under which the accused was charged reads as follows: "No intoxicating liquor shall be sold, given, or supplied or delivered by the holders of any such licence, or by any other person, to any prohibited persons as hereinafter defined, unless he shall produce a permit signed in duplicate by a magistrate, authorising the bearer of the permit to obtain such intoxicating liquor, and specifying the quantity and description of such intoxicating liquor." For the first offence, the penalty was a fine not exceeding £500, or in default, six months' imprisonment, and for a second or subsequent offence, the offender was liable to imprisonment, with hard labour, for a period of not less than one month and not exceeding six months. The charge was that James Henry Wildemere Phillips, European, was guilty of contravening the Proclamation, in that, about April 23, 1907, near Mount Fletcher, the accused, being a licence-holder for the sale of intoxicating liquor, supplied, or caused to be supplied, through his barman in his employ, certain intoxicating liquor—half a pint of brandy—to a prohibited person, a native named Moiketai, who did not produce a permit signed by a magistrate authorizing him to obtain the liquor. The attorney for the defence in the Court below put in certain preliminary objections, which, however, were overruled. The accused annexed a permit given to the native to obtain one glass of F.C. brandy, but it did not specify the quantity, and the accused, it was contended, was not responsible for the omission. The appeal on the merits were two-fold: (1) That there never was a completed sale, and (2) that if there was, the terms of the permit were sufficiently wide to cover the quantity of liquor that was actually sold.

Mr. Upington was for the appellant, and Mr. Howel Jones appeared for the Crown.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is meant by a glass?]

Mr. Upington: That is defined by the Crown witnesses, including the Magistrate, as being a mouthful and a half.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It depends upon the size of the mouth, then.]

That is what one feels, my lord. How can one define what the size of a glass is? I think it is necessary to state the quantity.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The evidence shows that he got a glass.]

A small one, with which he was dissatisfied.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then he got half a pint, and you say that the word glass is too vague. Would a tumbler contain more than he ought to have got or less?]

That I really could not say.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The half pint would not be more than a tumbler full.]

I should say a good-sized tumbler would contain more. It really is a somewhat difficult thing to say where so vague a description is given in a permit that there has been a contravention.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What did the Magistrate give him that permit for? Was he ill?]

No, it will be shown on the record there are various permits annexed. He has had a quantity as much as a bottle and a half, and just a short time before this.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The penalty is a terrible one.]

Yes, a most severe one, and therefore I would submit in order to convict a person under this Act, it is necessary that the Magistrate should give some definite measure, and then the licence holder could be held to that. It simply states one glass of F.C. brandy, and brandy is not necessarily to be taken in a wine-glass.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing he got a large tumbler of brandy, it would be more than he had?]

Yes, it would probably be a pint. This is only half such a quantity, and that is, as I say, one of the substantial grounds of appeal. Of course, one has to direct the attention of the Court to the fact that a contravention of this section is absolutely ruin to the man. There is also a certain amount of dispute as to whether the transaction was ever concluded. The liquor in the bottle did not pass into the possession of Moiketsi.

Yes, according to him, he had, but the barman said Moiketsi was fumbling with his pocket. Where there is a criminal offence involving such a severe penalty there must be a clear and substantial infringement of the penal statute. The object of the penal statute, I take it, would be that the man could not get the liquor. In order to render a person liable permits should be issued setting out the quantity by some known method. The size of the mouth and the capacity a man has for swallowing liquor is far too vague. Persons have been known to drink a glass of beer without taking a breath. Counsel, in conclusion, submitted that the Legislature intended that the Magistrates should make use of some well-known method of measurement, so that a person should not unwittingly contravene the section. Nothing would be simpler than to specify the quantity.

Mr. Jones said the point had entirely been raised by the agent in the case and not by the defendant or his barman. It was never suggested by the barman or the accused himself that Moiketsi did not get everything he was entitled to. He had had a permit for a glass of liquor, and he had that, and the sale of the bottle was a distinct transaction. It was well known by the Magistrates what a glass of liquor meant. If the accused was in doubt as to the quantity specified, he should have refused the glass in the first instance. He put himself in the position of a person who knew exactly what was meant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you say is a glass?]

For brandy, I should have thought a liqueur glass would be a glass.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The liqueur glass would be less than a mouthful and a half.]

They probably mean a wine glass.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why not a liqueur glass?]

I take it there is a common meaning given to the term glass for brandy. In these permits I take it everyone knows what is meant. A glass probably about the size of an ordinary sherry glass.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Not a tumbler?]

I should not think so. I take it if Moiketsi had got less than he was entitled to he would have refused it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is the native a chief?]

Yes, I believe so.

De Villiers, C.J.: The accused was found guilty of a contravention of the Proclamation of 1903, and he was sentenced to pay £50, or, failing payment, two months with hard labour, and further, on this conviction, ipso facto, all liquor in the possession of the accused was declared forfeited and also his liquor licence, and no renewal allowed to be granted in respect of these premises for a period of five years. What actually took place was this: The man Moiketsi, who seems to be a native chief, had received from Mr. Brownlee, the Magistrate, a permit to purchase a glass of brandy. That permit was given under the 30th section of the Proclamation, which says that "no intoxicating liquor shall be sold, given, or supplied, or delivered by the holder of any such licence, or by any other person to any prohibited persons as hereinafter defined, unless he shall produce a permit signed in duplicate by a Magistrate, authorising the bearer of the permit to obtain such intoxicating liquor, and specifying the quantity and description of such intoxicating liquor." The quantity filled in the permit here was a glass. The chief first got apparently a small glass, which he says was only a mouthful and a half, and then he got in addition to that half a pint of brandy in a bottle. And this was held to be a contravention of the Act, for which a severe penalty is specified. I cannot agree with the counsel for the appellant that there had not been in the present case a delivery of the brandy to Moitekisi. The Magistrate was justified in coming to the conclusion upon the evidence that Moitekisi had paid the money and that the barman had placed the half-pint of brandy before him, so as to enable him to take it away if he chose. To all intents and purposes, in my opinion, there had been a delivery, and if the appeal had been entirely upon this point I should certainly dismiss it. But the further question still remains whether there is clear proof in the present case that more liquor was supplied to Moitekisi than he was entitled to receive under this permit. The counsel for the Crown has mentioned the case of a bottle. In the case of a bottle he says it would be perfectly clear what was meant. I am inclined to believe that the term bottle has a fairly definite meaning, and no difficulty would have arisen in the present case if a bottle had been authorised to be purchased. But a glass of brandy was authorised, and it is impossible to know what size of glass was intended to be covered by the permit. The Magistrate was bound under the proclamation to specify the quantity, but he specified the quantity in such vague terms that it would have been quite impossible for the appellant to know the precise quantity which he was justified in giving. A glass may mean anything from a liqueur glass to a large beer glass or a soda water glass. It appears that this chief had on several previous occasions received permits from the Magistrate for the purchase of brandy, and on some occasions he had even received a permit to purchase a bottle and a half of brandy. The accused may have thought that in the case of this man he would be justified in placing the largest possible construction upon the word glass. The quantity sold was not large; it was a small glass and half a pint. Now, it would not take such a very large glass to hold all the liquor that would be contained in this small glass, and in this half-pint. The proclamation is a very stringent one, the penalties are very severe, and a court of law should be perfectly satisfied that there has been a distinct contravention of the Act before being justified in finding a person guilty. It is the Magistrate's own fault if he gave a permit which is so exceedingly vague. Under all the circumstances, I am of opinion that there is not sufficient proof in the present case of a contravention of the proclamation. Consequently the appeal will be allowed, and the conviction quashed.

STADLER V. SCHAIFF. { 1907.

Pledge — Delivery — Execution.

A writ of execution having been issued against a judgment debtor, the appellant paid the amount due and the debtor executed a pledge in his favour of a stack of unthreshed wheat. Thereafter appellant threshed out the wheat and removed it to his own adjoining land, leaving some on the land of the debtor.

Held, that, in a subsequent execution against the same debtor, the messenger was not entitled to seize, as part of the debtor's property, the threshed wheat removed to the appellant's land.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Gordonia, held at Keimoes. It appeared that the appellant had claimed certain 40½ bags of wheat attached by the Messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court in satisfaction of a judgment in favour of the respondent against one Nicolas M. Smit, sen. The Magistrate declared the wheat executable, and ordered the claimant to forthwith deliver it or pay the value thereof at the rate of £1 7s. 6d. per bag.

Mr. De Villiers for the appellant. Dr. Greer for the respondent.

Counsel said the Magistrate had devoted almost the whole of his reasons to knocking down a case which was never set up by the appellant. The Magistrate was at great pains to show that this stack of corn was not the property of Smit (jun.). Now that was not contended by the appellant, who had never set up that case. He stated most clearly in his evidence that the corn-stack belonged to Smit (sen.), the execution debtor. Counsel submitted that his client was at least entitled to the thirty-four bags. On the question of the landlord's hypothec, counsel referred to Justice Maasdorp on Institutes of Cape Law (vol. 2, p. 265), and In re Stillwell (1, Menzies, p. 537).

Dr. Greer said there was no such delivery in this case as to render the pledge effective. The possession to be effective must have been continuous, and it was clear that the wheat was left in the possession of Smit (sen.). As to the point raised by his learned friend of the landlord's lien being effective, even though the property was attached in execution of a debt, the position of the claimant was that the whole of the stack belonged to Smit (sen.).

De Villiers, C.J.: It would appear in this case that there were two executions against the judgment debtor. On the occasion of the first execution, the present claimant paid the money, the amount of the execution debt, and the execution debtor then executed a pledge in favour of the claimant for the amount of the money so advanced to him, the property pledged being a stack of unthreshed wheat. The claimant thereafter proceeded to thresh the wheat, and when he had nearly finished the threshing, there was a second execution, and the question now is whether any portion of the threshed wheat belongs to the claimant or whether it belongs to the debtor. The Magistrate admits that on the occasion of the second execution, a certain proportion of the threshed wheat was removed some little distance from the bulk of the stack, and that it was upon land belonging to the claimant. Now, in my opinion, it is perfectly clear that there had been delivery to the claimant as a pledge of the 34 bags of wheat, which he had threshed and placed upon his own land. As to the remainder, it is not perfectly clear, and I do not think the Court need now enter into the question as to the right of the claimant as the lessor of this property. The whole of that portion of the evidence is exceedingly doubtful. The lessor himself was not the owner, and the evidence upon that point is very vague, and, therefore, I do not wish to base my judgment on that. I am satisfied as to the 34 bags of wheat that there had been delivery to the plaintiff. The result, therefore, is that the appeal must be allowed, with costs in this Court and the Court below, and judgment entered as follows: It is declared that 34 out of the 40½ bags wheat removed by the claimant are the property of the claimant, and that only the 6½ remaining bags of wheat are executable.

Ex parte Vos.

Parliamentary voter—Registering officer—Claim to be registered as voter—Provisional list.

The Registering officer in P. Fieldcornetcy omitted the name of the petitioner from the list of voters framed by him although such name appeared on the then existing list and the petitioner omitted to lodge with the Registering Officer his claim to have his name inserted within the time required by Act 9 of 1892.

Held that, whatever power the Revising Officer might thereafter have to rectify the omission, the Supreme Court could not compel the Registering Officer to insert the name.

This was an application as a matter of urgency, for an order authorising the Registering Officer for Prieska division, Frans Willem Steenekamp Duncker, to place the petitioner's name on the Voters' Roll for 1907, and authorising the Revising Officer, James Harris Veale, to allow such addition with costs against the Registering Officer.

The petition of Henry de Luke Vos set out that petitioner was a justice of the peace for the division of Prieska, a member of the School Board for the Fiscal Division of Prieska, and an executive member of the Chamber of Commerce of Prieska. When the Registering Officer for Fieldcornetcy No. 1 of the division of Prieska was compiling the list of qualified voters for the division of Prieska, petitioner, on four different occasions, approached him, and instructed him not to omit his name from the roll, to which he replied that petitioner need not worry as it would be all right. On one occasion, petitioner offered to send him a written application to have his name put on the voters' roll, to which he replied, that it was unnecessary, as he based his list on the old roll. On the 27th April last, petitioner was subpoenaed as a witness in a case to be heard before the Supreme Court. On the 3rd May, 1907, he left for Cape Town, and only returned on the 14th May, and he was, therefore, unable to ascertain whether his name was on the voters' roll or not before the time within which applications for enrolment would be entertained was closed. Petitioner was the owner of three properties, and a tenant of two further properties, all of which were situated in the village of Prieska. Petitioner was registered in the voters' roll for 1905, No. 124, as qualified to vote in the election of members of Parliament, as would appear from the voters' roll annexed. Petitioner's status had not changed since the compiling of the roll for 1905, and the only reason petitioner could give for the omission of his name from the present roll, was wilful and gross negligence on the part of Frans Willem Steenekamp Duncker, the Registering Officer, and petitioner craved leave to refer to sections 4, 5, 7, 9, and 12, as instructions to field-cornets, or other persons, who might be appointed registering officers under the provisions of Act 14, of 1887, Act 9 of 1892, Act 19 of 1893, and Act 48 of 1899, for the purpose of the registration of voters in the several electoral divisions of the Colony. Petitioner's name did not appear on the list of omissions, as would appear from the list annexed, and he prayed leave to refer to terms of section 12, instructions to Registering Officers. Petitioner had applied to the Revising Officer to allow his name to be placed on the voters' roll, but the Revising Officer stated he had no power to do so.

Mr. Wallach moved.

Counsel said that by section 7 of the Act 48 of 1899 it was the duty of the Registering Officer to insert all names of voters who were on the old register, with the exception of those who were dead or otherwise disqualified, and according to the old register Mr. Vos appeared as a voter, but his name did not appear on the new provisional roll, and by section 9 it provided: "That the Registering Officer shall frame separate list of the persons referred to in section 7 of the Act, and shall write opposite the name of such person his reasons for excluding his name from the said provisional list." The petitioner's name did not appear in this list either. The petitioner interviewed the Registering Officer and also the Civil Commissioner, who stated that he had no power to add petitioner's name to the final list. The Registering Officer led him to believe that his name would be on the voters' list. The only course open to the petitioner was to come to the Court and ask for an order directing the Registering Officer either to place his name on the provisional list or to make an order on Mr. Veale to allow Mr. Vos to appear and show cause why his name should not be placed on the final list on the 12th inst. Under the 20th section of the Act the Registering Officer was liable to a penalty for wilful or gross negligence. Counsel would like an expression from the Court as to whether the Magistrate could add the petitioner's name to the final list.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (June 5th).

De Villiers. C.J.: This is an application by the petitioner, who claims to be entitled to have his name placed on the voters' roll for the year 1907, and he moves for an order instructing the Registering Officer, Duncker, to place his name on the voters' roll for 1907, and authorising the revising officer to allow such addition, with costs, against Duncker the Registering Officer. The ground of the application is that the name of the petitioner was upon the list of voters framed for the year 1905, and under Act 48 of 1899, section 7, it was undoubtedly the duty of the Registering Officer to insert in the list the names of all persons on the existing register of voters within his field-cornetcy except the names of such persons who, on the day upon which the registration of voters shall commence, are dead, or do not reside or earn salary or wages in the said field-cornetcy, or do not possess the qualification required by law, or are subject to any disqualification. Then, by another section—the 9th—the Registering Officer is directed to frame a separate alphabetical list of the persons referred to in the sub-section that I have just alluded to, and to write opposite the name of each such person his reasons for excluding such person from the provisional list, and to post and affix such list at the same time, and place as the provisional list is required by law to be posted and affixed. It appears in the present case that the Registering Officer did frame such separate alphabetical list of persons whose names had been omitted, but the name of the petitioner does not appear there, from which I gather that it must have been a clerical omission on the part of the Registering Officer in not mentioning the name of the petitioner. And this view is confirmed by a telegram which has been placed in my hands. I directed inquiries to be made as to what was the answer of the Registering Officer to the petitioner as to the reason of the exclusion. In the telegram Duncker says, "Clerical error, forgetting Vos's name." Now, the question is whether this is a case in which the Court would be justified in giving a direction to amend this error. The Act gives no authority to the Court to make any amendment of this kind, and the Act 9 of 1892 expressly lays down what steps should be taken by a person whose name does not appear on the list framed by the Registering Officer. It is his duty to send in his claim to the Registering Officer. Apparently petitioner has not done that; he has not sent in the claim in the time allowed by law. His reason for not sending in his claim is that he understood from the Registering Officer that his name would be included, and that he left for Cape Town as a witness in a case, and he assumed that his name would appear on the list; but when he returned he found his name was not there, and that it was then too late for him to send in his claim. Now, either the petitioner is entitled to send in his claim, in which case he may still do so, or he is too late, in which case, if the Registering Officer has not the power to insert his name, this Court has not the power. The Court has no larger powers than those conferred upon it by the Act, and it is certainly the policy of the Act to require that any person whose name is omitted should send in his claim in time. The absence of the petitioner from Prieska is not a sufficient excuse. My opinion is that if once the Court were to allow such an amendment in one case it would soon be overwhelmed with applications from persons who neglected to do their duty. It continually happens that people do not send in their claims in time, through negligence or otherwise, and I do not think the Act contemplated that the Court should have power to relieve such persons who thus omit to do what the Act contemplates that they should do. It is not in my opinion a sufficient excuse for petitioner that he happened to be in town, because he ought to have appointed someone in Prieska to attend to the matter. In the petition, the petitioner suggests that the Registering Officer was influenced by malicious motives in not registering his name. Well, that may be so, or it may not be so. If there was malice in the matter, probably the petitioner would have his action against the Registering Officer for maliciously omitting his name. I express no opinion on that. But that does not relieve the petitioner from his duty of seeing whether his name is upon the list, and of filing his claim within the proper time. It is by no means clear to me that the time has elapsed. If the time has not elapsed yet, petitioner can send in his claim; but if the time has elapsed, I am afraid this Court has no power to relieve the petitioner. For these reasons, I am of opinion that there should be no order upon the petition.

Mr. Wallach (for petitioner) asked if the Court would give any direction to the Civil Commissioner, as the revising officer, with regard to the placing of the name on the final list. Counsel referred to section 18.

De Villiers, C.J., said it must be clearly understood that his decision was not to the effect that the Civil Commissioner had no such power under the Act when it came before him. That was a totally distinct matter. On the 12th of June, the matter would come before the Civil Commissioner, and it was entirely open for him to decide.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

HARMENING V. GAFNEY. { 1907.
 { June 3rd.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matabele in an action brought against Carl Harmening by Gerrard Stewart Gafney to recover two sums amounting to £20 13s. 6d. for grazing of cattle, and mealies and forage supplied.

From the record it appeared that plaintiff had had certain cattle belonging to defendant to graze at the farm Springs. He claimed £16 11s. for grazing, at the rate of 3s. per head per month for large stock and 2s. for calves, which he said was the rate agreed upon. He also claimed £4 2s. 6d. for mealies and forage supplied to the cattle. Defendant, in his plea, said that the rate agreed upon was 2s. per head for large stock and 1s. for calves, and that the winter feeding was to include mealie stalks and turnips. He said he did not agree to pay anything extra for mealies and forage supplied, nor was there any allegation in the summons that he did so. He also said that plaintiff neglected to feed the cattle as agreed, and that, in consequence of his negligence, nine head died. Defendant claimed in reconvention £90, value of the cattle that died, and £1 paid on account by defendant to plaintiff. Plaintiff, in his plea in reconvention joined issue on the rate of payment, and admitted that winter feed included mealie stalks and turnips. He said that no price was agreed upon for mealies and forage, but these were supplied at defendant's special request. He denied the allegations of negligence, and denied liability for damages. It had, he said, been expressly stipulated that he (plaintiff) should take no risk with regard to any of the cattle. He admitted having borrowed £1 from defendant, for which he was liable.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the weight of evidence seemed to be in favour of 2s. per head. He allowed for grazing £11 3s. 11d. For mealies supplied he allowed £2 8s., and for forage 15s., and gave judgment for a total sum of £14 11s. 11d., with costs. The Magistrate added that he considered that plaintiff took reasonable care of the cattle, and gave them all reasonable attention. He failed to see how plaintiff could be held liable for any loss through death. All he undertook was to give them grazing and feeding. He stipulated, further, that he would not be liable for any animal that died directly or indirectly through poverty. It had been shown that the cattle were in a half-dying condition before they went to plaintiff's farm. Absolution would be granted on the claim in reconvention.

Mr. M. Bisset was for appellant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Bisset submitted that the Magistrate should have made a deduction of 7s. 9d. on account of calves instead of allowing 2s. per head for the whole of the stock. A sum of £1, which was admittedly due to defendant, should have been allowed as a credit. Although this item was mentioned on the pleadings, the Magistrate made no reference to it. No amount should have been allowed for the extra feeding claimed, for inasmuch as (a) no proof was given of the amount of mealies and forage supplied, and (b) it was not alleged that any agreement was made as to extra payment. Plaintiff admitted that on the 15th October his winter food was exhausted, and he could not charge for winter food after it had been exhausted, and also for the extra food. Counsel submitted that on the claim in reconvention his client was entitled to succeed. There was evidence enough, on plaintiff's own admissions, to establish gross negligence on his part, resulting in the death of nine head of cattle.

Mr. Benjamin (in answer to the Court) said that plaintiff had all along admitted his liability for the £1 which he borrowed from defendant.

Maasdorp, J.: I do not think in this case any reasonable ground has been advanced for bringing this case in appeal, or for the Court interfering with the finding of the Magistrate. It is one consolation to think that the defendant appears to be a man who is well able to take care of himself, and that he has not merely blindly incurred the costs of appeal through the advice of his legal advisers. The only real point upon which there is any direct conflict of evidence was decided by the Magistrate in favour of the defendant. It appears that the plaintiff in charging for the grazing of the cattle claimed 3s. a head per month, whereas the defendant alleged that for the larger beasts only 2s. was due. The Magistrate upon that point found that the defendant was correct, and refused the plaintiff's claim. It seems that an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and defendant under which the plaintiff agreed to receive upon his farm a certain number of the defendant's cattle for grazing, and it was part of the agreement that the defendant's cattle should get winter feeding. That seemed to amount to extra feeding being given to the cattle of mealie stalks, turnips, and hay. The substance of this agreement clearly is that the cattle were to be allowed grazing on the farm, and were also to receive such feeding as could be obtained from the plaintiff's own land, that mealie stalks, turnips, and hay from the plaintiff's own land should, as far as available, be supplied to the cattle. Plaintiff appears on the finding of the Magistrate to have carried out this agreement in all respects, but it seems that, after the cattle had been on the place for some little while, it was found that the grazing was getting rather scanty, and that what is called winter feeding was beginning to fail. It is said this was directly brought to the notice of the defendant, and he was told that it might be advisable to remove his cattle. He replied that it would be no use taking that step, because there was no other place to which he could take his cattle. It seems that in all the neighbourhood there the country was in such a state that the defendant could not improve his position by removing his cattle from the plaintiff's land, and that seems, to my mind, to prove that the defendant's cattle got everything off the plaintiff's land that they were entitled to, or that the lands could at that time furnish. At the same time the plaintiff inquired from defendant whether it would not be as well that he should supply the cattle with some mealies and forage, and the defendant consented to this. This clearly amounts to an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that something more should be done for the cattle than came within the terms of the original agreement, and undoubtedly the parties intended that this further supply of food to the cattle should be paid for by the defendant. The Magistrate has found that that is the case, and he has allowed the plaintiff a certain sum in respect of the mealies and forage upon which he fed the cattle. Here, again, he somewhat reduces the plaintiff's claim. It is said that there is no positive evidence as to the correct amount of forage and mealies supplied, but it seems to me that it would have been difficult, when feeding apparently the cattle of the plaintiff and defendant jointly, to go within a narrow margin of exactly what was supplied to the defendant's cattle. A reasonable estimate has been made, and the Magistrate has accepted it, and I see no reason for differing with the Magistrate on his finding in that respect. The Magistrate, as a result, allowed the plaintiff £14 11s. 11d. in respect of his claim, which was £20 13s. 6d. There is a claim in reconvention by defendant for losses suffered by him through the death of some of his cattle upon plaintiff's farm. Under all the circumstances which have been narrated in this case, it is quite reasonable to expect that without any default on plaintiff's part some of the cattle might die. The country was in such a state and the poverty of the cattle was so great that some losses might naturally be expected without any fault on plaintiff's part. The Magistrate has found pointedly that there was no negligence or breach of contract on the part of plaintiff. The plaintiff himself during that period lost a number of cattle under similar circumstances to those under which defendant's cattle died. The defendant, as I have already said, was fully aware of the poor condition of the feeding on plaintiff's land after his cattle had been there some little while, and he might have removed them. I do not advance that as a ground upon which plaintiff should not be held liable for negligence, if, after that, there was negligence, but I advance it as a reason for saying that under all the circumstances the plaintiff had done his best, because the defendant, though he might have done so, could find no better way of obtaining grazing for his cattle. Under all the circumstances of this case, I come to the conclusion that no objection to the Magistrate's finding on the claim in convention or on the claim in reconvention has been established. It has been pointed out that there was a sum of £1, which was admittedly due by plaintiff to defendant, and the Magistrate made no allowance for it. I am quite sure if the Magistrate's attention had been called to it the matter would have been properly dealt with, and it has also been said, and I expect it would have been the case, that if respondent's attention had been called to it he would have settled that item with the defendant without coming into this Court. But, under the circumstances, the £1 which is admitted to be due by plaintiff to defendant must now be allowed to him, but the finding on that item cannot form any ground for allowing the appellant costs in this case. The judgment will be varied by allowing defendant £1 on his claim in reconvention, the judgment in other respects to stand, and appellant to pay costs in appeal.

DAWOOD V. MAHOMED.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Wynberg in an interpleader action brought against appellant by the respondent to have certain movables declared executable.

It appeared that the respondent sued under the Small Debts Recovery Act, 1905, for £18 15s., against Ally Dawood, of West London, and one Machodam, also of West London. The summons was served upon Machodam and also upon Ally Dawood (the present appellant) in his absence. Machodam sent back the summons and no appearance was entered in the Magistrate's Court. The messenger of the Court subsequently went to West London and attached certain goods in the shop of Ally Dawood, in Church-street, which appellant said was his shop. It appeared that Ally Dawood, the real defendant, had called himself Ally Ishmail. The Magistrate declared that the goods attached were executable.

The appellant, in his evidence in the Court below, denied that he was the debtor. He said he was away at the Paarl when summons was served. Machodam sent the summons back. Witnesses were called who deposed to knowing the other Ally Dawood, who was known also as Ally Ishmail, and who, it was contended, was the debtor.

The respondent, Mahomed, said that judgment was given against the real debtor, Dawood, and that the goods attached belonged to him. When he (respondent) dealt with the debtor the latter had shops in Roamead Avenue and West London. The two were in partnership, and removed the goods from one shop to the other.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan for appellant. Respondent in person. Mr. Buchanan having been heard on the facts, Maasdorp, J.: In this case the Magistrate's Court had to decide whether goods, which were taken in execution in the case of Mahomed against Dawood, belonged to the defendant in that case, or to the appellant before this Court. If the goods belonged to the appellant, they would not be executable under the judgment. Evidence has been called to prove that the shop in which these goods were attached has been carried on for a considerable time by the appellant, and that the landlord of this shop dealt with the appellant, and received his rent from the appellant. He only knew the appellant under the name of Ally Dawood as his tenant, and he knew no other person as having any interest in the shop. The traveller of Messrs. Wiener, who did business with the appellant, states that whenever he transacted business at that shop it was with the appellant himself and no other, and that he did not know the defendant in the case of Mahomed and Dawood as a party to the business he did there. This shop, before it was taken over by the appellant, was in charge of a man named Desai, who had also hired it from the same landlord. Desai says that, in selling this business, the business was transacted with the appellant and with no other person. We have, therefore, very strong evidence of persons, directly doing business with the appellant, at West London, that the whole of that business was transacted with the appellant and no other. The only evidence to contradict this is of a very doubtful character. It is the evidence of the plaintiff himself. I do not say his evidence is of a doubtful nature as to his credibility, but it is doubtful as to its effect. He gives evidence that he dealt with the defendant, against whom he made his claim, at Kenilworth, and that he has never been to the shop of the appellant in this case, and he apparently knows nothing about the nature of the business carried on there by the appellant and the relationship existing between the appellant and the defendant. The appellant states that after the defendant came to West London, he entered into his employment as a paid servant, and there is no evidence to contradict that statement. The weight of the evidence seems to be wholly in favour of the appellant in this case, who claims this property. The Magistrate himself says that as far as credibility is concerned, he would have accepted the evidence of the European witnesses, but that the evidence does not seriously affect the result of this case. Well, these European witnesses were the landlord, who had let the shop to the appellant, and the traveller of Messrs. Wiener and Co., who did business with the appellant, and, I think, that is the clearest evidence that could possibly be given that the business was carried on by the person who owned the property in the shop. If the statements of the European witnesses can be taken as reliable, we have evidence that at the time the judgment was given against Dawood, the appellant was in quiet possession of these goods in a shop hired by himself, and the burden of proof would, therefore, be thrown upon anyone else who claimed this property. On the whole, I think that if there had been doubt, the doubt should have been given in favour of the appellant, but it seems to me that, considering the weight of evidence, there can be no doubt that the appellant in this case is the owner of the property in question, and that the property is, therefore, not liable to execution. The appeal will be allowed, with costs, including the costs in the Magistrate's Court, and it will be declared that the goods are not executable in the case of Mahomed and Dawood.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

PIQUETBERG DIVISIONAL. 1907.
COUNCIL V. JACOBS. (June 4th.)

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, for the plaintiff, moved for judgment in terms of a consent paper. The action was for ejectment from certain land and buildings.

Judgment entered in terms of the consent paper.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

GOODMAN V. WEINSTEIN.

This was an action to recover £31 10s., balance of wages for three months alleged to be owing by the defendant to the plaintiff, and £300 damages alleged to have been caused by reason of the defendant having falsely and maliciously given information on oath which caused the arrest of the plaintiff.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff was Lewis Goodman. The defendant was a baker carrying on business at Cape Town. In January the defendant engaged the plaintiff to work in delivering bread, and as a collector, at the wage of £8 a month and commission. In March, 1907, defendant dismissed him, and swore an affidavit alleging that plaintiff had embezzled the amount of £1 6s. 11½d. In consequence of this, plaintiff was arrested on the 25th March, and tried by the Magistrate, the case being dismissed in April.

The defendant, in his plea, stated that he had tendered £13 17s. 6d., being wages at the agreed rate of £6, less £10 2s. 6d. paid on account. He said the plaintiff was not employed as a collector. He denied that the dismissal was wrongful or unlawful. He denied any malicious intention in swearing the affidavit, and denied, further, that the plaintiff had sustained any damages.

Dr. Greer was for the plaintiff; defendant appeared in person.

The defendant said he wanted the case postponed, as he had been told by plaintiff's attorney that he would not go on with the action unless he was satisfied defendant had sufficient money to meet the costs, in case defendant lost the case.

[Maasdorp, J.: The case has been set down, and must go on.]

The plaintiff said he gave up a restaurant at Salt River to enter defendant's service, gave evidence detailing the circumstances. He said that defendant threatened that if he did not give him a clear receipt, he would have him arrested for theft. Witness said he could not be arrested, as he had stolen nothing. Defendant said he would give him twenty minutes' notice. Next day witness went to his attorney, who sent a letter of demand for the wages. Three days later witness was arrested, and brought to the police station, where he was kept under arrest for some time. He was charged that day with theft by means of embezzlement. He was remanded, and released on bail, and after hearing the evidence for the prosecution, the Magistrate dismissed the charge.

Dr. Greer: Did you ever rob defendant?

Witness: No, never.

Were there any grounds for the accusation?—None at all.

In further examination, witness said he had lost his business, which he had carried on at a profit of about £12 a month. He had paid about £5 to an attorney for defending him in the Magistrate's Court.

Defendant cross-examined the witness with a view to showing that the wages agreed upon were £6 a month, plus breakfast and supper.

Further evidence was called for the plaintiff, after which Dr. Greer closed his case.

The defendant said that when he taxed plaintiff with having robbed him, plaintiff offered to give him a clear receipt if witness would let him off, but witness refused to do so, saying that he had been robbed of £30 or £40, and that he could not let him off on these terms, as he had so many drivers who might do this. The defendant said that the plaintiff was engaged at £6 a month, and he produced books in support of this, showing payments made.

In cross-examination, the defendant said it was not usual to pay drivers commission. He admitted having said to plaintiff: "Bring me a clear receipt and clear." Plaintiff said he would do so. Instead, he sent a letter of demand, upon receipt of which witness went and swore the affidavit. Defendant denied that he went to plaintiff's attorney to try and get the case settled.

Corroborative evidence was called on the defendant's behalf.

After hearing Dr. Greer in argument,

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiff claims from the defendant payment of wages for four months at the rate of £8 a month. He also claims certain commission upon sales, which he contends the defendant had agreed to pay him. The defendant tenders payment of wages for four months at the rate of £6 a month. The question between the parties is, therefore, whether the wages were at the rate of £8 a month, together with the commission, or only £6 a month. Upon this point I may briefly say that the weight of evidence is most decidedly in favour of the defendant. The terms of the contract are briefly set forth in a folio of defendant's books containing the items of wages from time to time paid to the plaintiff, and it seems to me that the books are very properly and correctly kept. Reference to the book would prove that the agreement was that plaintiff should receive £6 a month wages, but defendant's evidence is further corroborated by three witnesses, who state that at an interview with the plaintiff when difficulties arose between the parties, the plaintiff said he was only entitled to £6 a month. At that rate, for four months, he would have had to receive £24. That would be reduced by the payment on account of £10 2s. 6d., leaving a balance in the plaintiff's favour of £13 17s. 6d., which amount was tendered by the defendant. There is a further claim by the plaintiff for £300 damages in respect of an injury done to him through the defendant having maliciously prosecuted him in the Magistrate's Court for theft. The plaintiff alleges that this prosecution was instituted without reasonable and probable cause. The defendant denies the absence of reasonable and probable cause, and upon the whole of the evidence, I am satisfied that there was reasonable and probable cause for the charge made by the defendant. The fact that the Magistrate found that the evidence placed before him was not sufficient to continue the prosecution further, does not conclusively establish that there was no reasonable and probable cause, because it very often happens that a man may have reasonable and probable cause upon information which he is in possession of, and which he has obtained after diligent inquiry, which information would establish some reasonable cause for a charge being made, even if it may subsequently be discovered that the charge is unfounded. His lordship briefly reviewed the evidence, and said: Under all the circumstances, I think there was reasonable and probable cause for the defendant instituting the prosecution, and the plaintiff must fail upon this ground also. Judgment will be given for the plaintiff for £13 17s. 6d., defendant to pay costs up to the 9th April (the date of the tender), the costs thereafter to be paid by the plaintiff.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

REX. V. HENDRICKS. 1907
{ June 4th.

Splitting of criminal charge.

Two or more charges cannot be brought in respect of crimes arising out of one and the same act, or out of a connected series of acts.

Hopley, J.: The case of Rex v. John Hendricks, heard before the A.R.M. of Cape Town, came before me as judge of the week, in which the accused was charged with the crimes of (1) theft, and (2) malicious injury to property.

It would appear that the prisoner was in the act of stripping a roof of lead for the purpose of theft, when he was interrupted, and he thereupon tried to escape with only a small piece of lead in his pocket, the damage done to the roofing being considerable.

The Magistrate found him guilty of both the theft of the small piece of lead and malicious injury to property for damage he had done to the roof. But it is clear that the act was a single act, and had been done, not for the purpose of damaging the property at all, or from any malicious intention of damaging the owner of the property, but with the intention of stealing, and, therefore, upon the evidence, it is plain that there was no malicious injury to property, and that the second charge of which the prisoner was convicted, and also sentenced, was not sustained. That portion of the conviction must be quashed, and the conviction for theft alone is confirmed.

The Magistrate sentenced the accused to three months for the theft, and one month for the malicious injury to property—four months in all.

I think that the splitting up of a single act, or a connected series of acts, into several charges, the effect of which would be to increase the jurisdiction of the Magistrate, and enable him to inflict a heavier punishment than is allowed by his ordinary powers, should not be allowed, and on that ground also I should have had something to say, but I think it is not necessary for the purpose of the present case to do more than say that the evidence does not warrant the second conviction of malicious injury to property.

ADMISSIONS.

Mr. Lewis moved for the admission of Morris Alexander as a translator.

Application granted, and oaths administered.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the admission of Willem Frederik Sieberhagen as an attorney and notary. Counsel called the Court's attention to the fact that, although the articles were entered into on the 1st June, and applicant had served the full term of three years, the contract was not ratified by his guardian until a few days later.

Hopley, J.: It would, of course, have been more proper, formal, and desirable for the guardian to sign the contract of service at the time of its execution, but only a few days elapsed before he ratified the contract, which was clearly for the benefit of the minor, and as the minor has served the full three years under that contract so ratified, the ratification may be taken to date back to the real signing of the contract, and the service may be taken to have been concluded in the proper form. Guardians in future need not be lax on account of this decision; they ought to be there at the time of the execution of the contract. Under the circumstances, the applicant will be admitted.

Application granted and oaths administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

PRICE BROS. V. DE KLERK.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £198 6s., with interest from the 4th April, 1907, and costs.

From the affidavits, it appeared that plaintiffs had carried on business with one G. J. Fourie as auctioneers, and had held a sale of stock at Moltano on the 4th January last. Defendant, who resides in Aliwal North district, bought stock, and gave the promissory note sued upon. His defence was that he sold part of the stock to one Oelofse for £123 10s., and that the latter gave him a promissory note for the amount. This note he (defendant) handed to Price Bros. and Fourie, who agreed to collect it and appropriate the proceeds in reduction of his indebtedness. Defendant also said that he sold to Mr. Fourie 30 hamels at 20s. each, and that it was agreed that £30 should be written off the promissory note sued upon. He was prepared to pay the balance of £44 16s. Plaintiffs traversed these allegations.

Mr. M. Bisset was for plaintiffs; Mr. Roux was for defendant.

Having heard Mr. Roux in argument on the facts:

Hopley, J.: In this case plaintiffs come with a liquid document showing the claim which they made against defendant. Defendant comes with what his counsel says is a probable, plausible, and likely story, a simple story as to how a very large amount of this claim has been settled. But when one examines the affidavits as to his statements, the affidavits contradicting him, it is clear that he is mistaken as to the course of the transactions which he wishes to set up in answer to the claim now made by the plaintiff. He says that this promissory note has been met to a large extent by another promissory note for £123 10s., but when that is examined, it is not found to be the case. To begin with, the whole of the £123 10s. promissory note was not for the benefit of the defendant himself. A large part, about £40, was for the benefit of his brother. This promissory note, which had been got from one Oelofse, was handed over to Fourie, not for the purpose, they themselves say, of being compensated against the large promissory note of £198, but for the purpose of being discounted. Had the note been discounted, and the money got into Fourie's hands, it is quite possible that defendant may have tendered his share of that promissory note, and given it in reduction of the £198 note now sued upon, but there was an unsuccessful attempt to negotiate this note, and no cash was returned. Price Bros. never got any benefit from it, and it was handed back to the people who had been acting for defendant in this matter, so that it is wrong on his part to say that there was a settlement of this note, and that Price Bros. got the benefit of this settlement. The history of the note shows that it was handed back after an unsuccessful attempt to raise cash upon it, and that thereupon Oelofse handed over, not to Price Bros., but to the De Klerks, the defendant's brother, and the other De Klerk, who was acting for him, certain stock to cover the amount of his promissory note, and if he settled that note at all, it was settled to the De Klerks, and not to Price Bros. The amount of £30 for the alleged sale of some wethers is also a matter which does not seem to me to concern Price Bros. It is true that there was an exchange of stock between Fourie and defendant, and that the wethers, Fourie says, were not worth 20s., but 16s. 6d. In these circumstances, it seems to me that the defence set up against the promissory note must prima facie fail, and that there should be provisional sentence as prayed, with costs.

ESTATE KAISER BROS. V. HOESCHEN.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. Roux) moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £120 and costs.

Defendant appeared in person.

Mr. Roux read an affidavit filed by defendant, in which he entered at length into his affairs, and stated that it was impossible for him, in his present circumstances, to settle the debt.

Defendant said that he had offered the plaintiffs £2 a month. He produced a statement of accounts of the Cycle Trade and Supply Co., of which he said he was manager.

Mr. Close cross-examined the defendant with regard to his relationships with certain businesses, and with the object of showing that his statements were unreliable. Counsel submitted that the defendant had not discharged the onus of showing that he had no means. His story was inconsistent and improbable.

Decree granted, execution to be suspended on payment of £10 a month, first payment to be made on the 1st July, with leave to applicants to apply for a variation of the amount.

Hopley, J., said that defendant admitted that he received a salary of £30 a month, and he must, if necessary, live in a less pretentious style.

GOODCHILD V. MCHUGH.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a second mortgage bond for £165, with interest from the 1st January, 1907, bond due by reason of notice having been given; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Defendant's affidavit was to the effect that he purchased for £475 a house at Green Point, the understanding being that the purchase price would be payable as rent. The bond was granted on the 1st August, 1905. Deponent said that he had been misled as to the terms of the bond. He thought the bond would continue in force so long as he paid the half-yearly instalments of £10 off the capital and the interest.

Plaintiff's answering affidavit stated that he had no intention at the time he granted the bond of availing himself of the clause that enabled him to give notice, but circumstances had since compelled him to call up the bond. Plaintiff's attorney said that the terms of the bond were clearly explained to the defendant at the time he gave the power of attorney.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones for plaintiff. Mr. Lewis for defendant.

Mr. Lewis submitted that plaintiff was not entitled to call up the bond so long as the defendant paid the instalments and interest. He cited Muller v. Watermeyer (15 C.T.R., 430), and submitted that provisional sentence should be refused. Plaintiff assured defendant that the bond would not be called up so long as he paid the instalments and interest. The only term in contemplation between the parties was that the bond should be payable by instalments. Defendant was at a great disadvantage on account of his sight. Counsel did not suggest that there was fraud in the transaction, but he said there had been a serious misunderstanding between the seller and the buyer.

Hopley, J.: This seems to be a case of some hardship against the defendant, and I wish that I could see my way to give anything in the way of relief by saying that I cannot order provisional sentence, but, as far as I can see, the document which he signed is not so strongly contradicted by all the evidence on affidavit as to make it advisable for the Court to put the parties to the further expense of going into an action to establish the right of the plaintiff to recover his money at this stage. I have no doubt that at the time the defendant bought the property he thought that as long as he paid off the yearly instalment of £20, and was regular with the interest on the purchase amount, he would be allowed to remain in possession of his house, and that no notice would be given to him under either of the bonds. But I cannot see that it was made part of the actual contract between the parties; on the contrary, the mortgage bond distinctly stipulates that, on three months' notice being given, the purchaser might pay the whole of the amount of the second bond, or, on the other hand, the seller might demand that the whole of the amount should be paid. Now, it is difficult to see how the defendant, even though he were a layman, should not have his attention strongly brought to this condition in the bond when it was read over to him, as it is admitted it was, by Mr. De Villiers (the attorney). At all events, the power of attorney contains the same clauses, and his attention must have been called to this, so that one cannot see what he could have thought of such a condition other than its real meaning. He signed the power of attorney, he admits that he signed it, and the only excuse that he can now put forward is that he has long sight, and that he had not his spectacles with him. It is clear from the conversation which has been referred to in the affidavits that he had the terms in his head. No doubt the plaintiff had no intention at the time of selling the defendant up. I am sorry that the plaintiff has thought it necessary to change his attitude, that he now must demand the whole of this money, but, apparently, the bond which he holds entitles him to do so, and there must be provisional sentence, with costs, as prayed.

Mr. Lewis applied for a stay of execution for two months.

Hopley, J.: I have every sympathy with the defendant, but I do not see any special reason for staying execution.

MOLLER V. WILKINSON.

Mr. Marais moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

WESSELS AND CO. V. VENTER (1907).
AND ESTATE LATE VENTER. (June 4th.

Service of summons—Deputy Sheriff—Domicile—Forum.

V. formerly domiciled at Vryburg, had for the last three years resided at F. in the O.R.C., and the Court found as a fact, that he was domiciled there. He still remained executor of a certain estate within this Colony. He had been summoned to show cause in the Supreme Court why a provisional order of sequestration granted against him should not be made final. Instead of serving this summons as directed by Section 17 of the Insolvent Ordinance, the Deputy Sheriff of V. went to F. and brought the summons to V's notice.

Held, that the service was bad, that the fact of V. being executor of a Colonial estate did not subject him to the jurisdiction of the Colonial Courts and that his proper forum was the Supreme Court of the O.R.C.

This was an application to make final a provisional order for sequestration of the joint estates of defendant and his late wife.

Mr. Upington was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin appeared on behalf of Rosenblatt and De Beer to oppose. Mr. Benjamin's clients are creditors of the defendant, W. D. Venter, and had a sum of £57 odd in the hands of the petitioning creditors attached ad fundandum jurisdictionem.

Having heard counsel in argument, Hopley, J.: There seem to be considerable difficulties in granting a final order in this matter. To begin at the point which Mr. Upington has just been arguing upon, a matter which crops up in the very initial stage of the procedure—that is, whether the defendant has been properly summoned in this case. The 17th section of the Ordinance deals with the mode of service of these summonses in compulsory sequestration, and it sets forth that the petitioning creditor shall summon the debtor to show why his estate should not be adjudged to be sequestrated, and the service of process shall be made in the same manner as is or shall be by law provided for the service of any other process of the said Court, provided that if any debtor has been forty days absent from his usual place of residence or business within the Colony, copies of the said summons shall also be affixed upon the outer door of the Supreme Court, and inserted in the "Government Gazette" of the Colony. Now, it is admitted on all hands that this debtor has been out of the jurisdiction of the Courts of this colony, and away from Vryburg, which was his ordinary place of residence, since, I think, 1904, and therefore considerably more than forty days. His ordinary place of residence would seem to be Fouriesburg, Orange River Colony, and if he were to be summoned in this colony at all in insolvency proceedings I should take it that it would have to be shown that he was still subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this colony, and had not changed his domicile, and then the process should be served in the same way as it should be served in other cases, as the section provides, and in this case either the defendant is a peregrinus, at the present moment living in a foreign jurisdiction, or he is still subject to the jurisdiction of this Court. If the former, then he ought not to be summoned in Vryburg, nor ought the service of the Deputy Sheriff of Vryburg to have any avail against this foreigner. If the latter, if he is still subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this colony, then service ought to be made at his last known place of residence, or last known place of business in this colony, by the Deputy Sheriff, at such last known place of residence or business. That course has not been pursued. The last known place of residence of this man is, I suppose, still in existence; no service was made there by the Deputy-Sheriff of Vryburg. On the contrary, Mr. De Kock, knowing probably his Fouriesburg residence, went over the border, and brought personally to the notice of the defendant the steps that were being taken in this Court; in fact, served that paper in a foreign jurisdiction. In doing so, he was acting wholly beyond the scope of his jurisdiction. He was functus officio as soon as he got beyond the borders of this colony; he was merely a private individual when he entered the Orange River Colony, and the order that he had in his hands was merely an ordinary piece of paper. He brought this, it is true, to the knowledge of the defendant, and the defendant, it is said, knows quite well of these proceedings. That may very well be, and one must, of course, agree with the quotation which Mr. Uppington has made from Van Zyl, in which he says the main object of the summons is to bring it to the knowledge of the person who is to be affected thereby, but, on the other hand, one must look at the matter from another point of view, and see whether such a person was in the circumstances bound to take any notice of it whatever. He may say: "I will not take the slightest notice of it; they have no jurisdiction over me." Well, if he chose to take that position, he was perfectly entitled to do so, and, to apply a practical test as to whether that is so or not, let us suppose that the order was made final to-day, and there would be a Cape Colony sequestration of this estate granted. Supposing a trustee is appointed, probably somebody in Vryburg, suppose that, thereafter, he goes into the courts of the Orange River Colony and asks for recognition of his position as trustee, and asks for permission to administer assets in the O.R.C., and suppose on that occasion the defendant were to appear, and say, "I was never served, a person calling himself the Deputy Sheriff of Vryburg came to my house in this colony, and served a piece of paper upon me, and I took no notice of it, and I am not an insolvent, properly speaking, at all." It would be very difficult for the Courts of the O.R.C. to say that that man was properly insolvent, so that they could give effect to the application of an officer of this Court. It is not a mere matter of technicality. As far as that goes, I do not think the provisions of the law have been complied with, and in matters of summoning for sequestration of estates, the provisions of the law have always been strictly construed by this Court. This man, having left the Colony, and domiciled himself elsewhere, it does not follow that because he happens also to be the executor of an estate in this colony, this colony thereby has jurisdiction over his affairs. If one could get over the difficulty of the service, the next difficulty I see is ought he (the defendant) to be summoned at all in this colony for the sequestration of his estate? As far as I can see, everybody admits that his actual habitation, at all events has been for some three years, in the O.R.C., and there seems to me to be very little doubt that he has gone there for the purpose of remaining. As far as I can see, he is living permanently in Fouriesburg. I am by no manner of means satisfied that the proper place to have sued him for sequestration of his estate would not have been the O.R.C., where he resides. Then there is a further difficulty, and that is, as the learned judge pointed out in the note he made on the papers, this is an application under the 3rd section of the Act 38, 1884, and therefore the Court has to consider two matters: (1) whether the defendant is insolvent, and (2) whether it is for the benefit of his creditors that this estate should be sequestrated. There is no doubt about the actual insolvency at the present moment of this estate, although one cannot be absolutely sure about that, because it is said there is an expectancy of a considerable inheritance. But if this estate is insolvent, and this inheritance, or expectancy, is not worth £240 or thereabouts that he owes, is it for the benefit of the creditors that the estate should be sequestrated? It seems to me it may be possible for the benefit of the defendant himself, and the petitioning creditor in this case seems to have been acting very much in the interests of Venter all along, and had advised him to surrender his estate. I do not see how, in any case, if there is only £57 odd in the estate, it would be for the benefit of the creditors really that this estate should be sequestrated. It is not difficult to see that the whole of the £57 odd would be swept away in costs and charges, without any of the creditors getting a single penny out of the estate. It may be for the benefit of Venter himself to have his estate sequestrated, but I cannot see that it would be for the benefit of his creditors to have it done. As to the petitioning creditors' position in this matter, it is quite possible that they might have the interests of Venter at heart more than the general body of creditors, or they might wish wish to check Rosenblatt and De Beer in the assertion of their claim. In that case, it is not an object which this Court should assist. In all the circumstances, it seems to me that the provisional order must be set aside with costs.

BEARD V. BEARD.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce, on the ground of defendant's malicious desertion.

Mr. Closs was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

Plaintiff said that she was married to defendant in London, England, in 1892. The marriage was not a happy one. Her husband was a stockbroker at the time she was married to him. In 1902 defendant came out to South Africa at a few days' notice. He did not ask witness to accompany him. Defendant had visited England twice since 1902, but he had not requested her to join him. He had contributed nothing towards her support. Witness came to the Colony in March last. There was one child of the marriage, now eleven years of age.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to restore conjugal rights to plaintiff on or before the 20th June, failing which, to show cause, on the 4th July, why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs, and plaintiff declared entitled to custody of the child of the marriage.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

INDUSTRIAL LIFE ASSUR-ANCE CO., LTD., V. } 1907.
ESTATE OF FELIX. } June 5th.

Life insurance — Condition —
Lapsed policy—Waiver.

It was a condition of a life policy that 35 days should be allowed for payment of renewal premiums, the directors of the Insurance Company reserving the right as they should think fit, to waive any forfeiture incurred by breach of such condition. The insured was in default for three and a half months, after which weekly payments were made by him and accepted by the Company but subject to the approval of the directors. Finally the directors refused to approve of these payments, and the money was returned to the mother of the insured who had made them on his behalf.

Held that, on the death of the insured, his executor was not entitled to claim the amount of the policy.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Cape Town.

It appeared that in the Magistrate's Court the present respondent, Petronella Felix, in her capacity as executrix in the estate of the late Albert John Felix, sued the Industrial Life Company for a sum alleged to be owing upon a certain insurance policy, dated in September, 1905, effected on the life of A. J. Felix, who died on the 28th October, 1906. The sum of 12s. plaintiff alleged she had received as a loan from the insurance company's agent, and she claimed the amount of £18 4s., less this sum. The plea was that the policy became void in June, 1906, in consequence of the non-payment of premiums. Upon application for renewal, the arrears of premiums were accepted by the company's agent, subject to approval by the Board of Directors, who declined to approve of the application, the arrears payments being refunded. The Magistrate gave judgment for the amount claimed. The grounds of appeal were that the policy lapsed on the 11th June, and there was no revival; and, further, that on the 10th October, 1906, the plaintiff accepted the return of the premiums by the inspector, sent to her for that purpose on behalf of the company, and that she therefore acquiesced in the cancellation of the policy, if there had been any renewal. The case had been before the Supreme Court on appeal on a former occasion, and was then remitted back to the Magistrate to take the evidence of the plaintiff on certain points. (17 C.T.R., 244.) The Magistrate now stated that the evidence given by the plaintiff and her daughter differed materially from that given before, and that his judgment, if it could be altered, would now be for the defendant, with costs.

Mr. Bisset was for the appellant company; there was no appearance for the respondent.

De Villiers, C.J.: It was one of the conditions of the insurance that 35 days should be allowed for payment of the renewal premium, and another condition was that any forfeiture incurred by breach of the foregoing condition might be waived by the directors, and on such terms as they shall think fit. In the pass-book which the insured had from the company, entries were made, and each page of the pass-book was headed thus: "Thirty-five days are allowed after the due date for payment of premium, after which, the policy was to be considered lapsed. Application for renewal of lapsed policies will, however, be considered on liberal terms." It would appear that between the 10th of May and the 31st of August no premiums were paid. Premiums were payable weekly, so that more than 35 days had elapsed between the payments of the premiums. An application was made to the company, on behalf of the insured, for revival of the policy, notwithstanding the lapse, and this application was considered. Subsequently premiums were accepted, but there was an endorsement on the pass-book that it was subject to the approval of the Board of Directors. Now, that approval never was given, and therefore it is impossible to hold, as the Magistrate seems to have held, that there was a waiver on the part of the company of the condition. The condition never was waived, and the policy remained a lapsed policy. Subsequently the money which had been paid was returned to the mother of the insured, and she seems to have accepted the money and to have given a receipt for it. Under all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the Magistrate was wrong in holding the plaintiff to be entitled to recover, and that there should be judgment for the defendant in the Court below. The judgment of the Court, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed, with costs in this Court, and judgment entered for the defendant company, with costs, in the Court below. I am bound to add that it is the duty of attorneys who are engaged in a case to be present in Court or to have a representative present to answer questions arising in the course of the case. In the present case the Court wished to know whether there had been service of the notice of set down, but there was no one present to give the information. It is now stated that there was service, but then it is added that it was supposed at the time that respondent would appear and would be represented in court, and that that was the reason why no affidavit of the notice of the set down was served. Well, that may be a good reason why such affidavit was not produced, but it is no reason why the attorney could not be in court to assist counsel and to assist the Court in case any question arises. The appellant's attorney, therefore, will not be entitled to any fee for appearance in court to-day.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

REX V. CHRISTIAN. { 1907.
June 5th.
Magistrate's criminal jurisdiction
—Act 18 of 1873, Sec. 2,
Sub-sec. 1 and Sec. 4.

Maasdorp, J.: There is a case which came before me from the Resident Magistrate of Oudtshoorn, the case of Andries Christian, in which the accused was charged with contravening sub-section 1 of section 2, Act 18 of 1873, in that, having entered into a contract of service with Mr. Serfontain, he neglected to commence the service at the stipulated time. He pleaded not guilty, and was found guilty and fined in £2, or six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. The Magistrate now explains that in passing that sentence he was under the mistaken impression that he was dealing with section 4 of the Act and that being under that impression he exceeded his jurisdiction in passing that sentence. Under the section mentioned in the charge, the maximum punishment for a first offence is a fine of £1, or 30 days' imprisonment, with hard labour. The sentence will therefore be altered to one of £1, or 30 days' imprisonment, with hard labour.

MPAKADO V. KEMLO.

This was a case in which the appellant (then defendant) had been sued by the respondent for money lent and interest, which he charged at the rate of 60 per cent. In the course of the hearing an objection was taken as to the two documents put in that there ought really to have been provisional procedure, and with respect to the documents the point was also taken that these documents ought to have been stamped, and there was a plea on the general issue.

The Magistrate, the Resident Magistrate of Kentani, was not satisfied as to the payments having been made by the defendant, and gave judgment for the plaintiff in the amount of £19 6s., with interest, and also compound interest.

Mr. McGregor was for the appellant, and Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for the respondent.

Counsel submitted that the compound interest could not be allowed. The plaintiff gave his evidence, but unfortunately he did not bring his books. The defendant was apparently an illiterate man, and he could only speak generally. The question was whether the evidence was so satisfactory as to justify the Court in giving judgment for any amount. There was one item which the Magistrate could check, and on that he found against the plaintiff. In such a case of high interest it was most unsatisfactory, that the books were not produced, and the case was a fair one for absolution from the instance. Counsel submitted that two promissory notes were put in, and the documents for revenue purposes should have been stamped, and that compound interest could not be allowed.

Mr. De Villiers having replied on the different items in the account, Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiff in the Court below sued the defendant for £21 8s., for money lent, together with interest due, and the items constituting this debt were all set forth fully in the account annexed to the summons. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and it appears that his defence is not clearly set forth in the plea, that he put before the Magistrate. His real defence was that he had paid the debt. The Magistrate inquired into the case, and he came to the conclusion that certain items were due, and that certain payments were made. What exactly the ground of appeal in this case was did not appear, but it was a general appeal upon the merits of the case, and amongst other things it is quite clear that the finding of the Magistrate as to the payments that were made was questioned, and that was certainly one of the grounds of appeal, and it apparently was the main ground. Upon that the Court cannot interfere with the finding of the Magistrate. The result he came to as to the items that were due and the payments that were made is based upon the evidence supporting that finding, and the Court must allow that to stand. But it appears that the plaintiff, in making out his account, had charged what apparently is compound interest. That question was raised in the Court below in the cross-examination of the plaintiff by the defendant's agent, and the Magistrate, in dealing with the question, it is now admitted, found that the plaintiff was not entitled to charge compound interest, and he set about dealing with the figures upon the ground that only simple interest was to be allowed, with the result that in conclusion he ascertained that the sum of £19 6s. was due. It is pointed out that he could not have arrived at that figure if his calculation was correct upon the basis that only simple interest was to be charged, and it is now admitted that the amount—the correct amount—if simple interest was charged upon the different items from time to time, and allowance made for payments from time to time, that amount would have been £13 14s. 6d. The object of the Magistrate is admitted to be to allow the plaintiff only simple interest. It was contended in his calculation he seems to have allowed compound interest, and what exactly the figures were which he dealt with does not now appear. On the side of the plaintiff, it is contended that if certain allowance is made for an item which was struck out of the account upon the admission of the parties, the Magistrate's calculation would be wrong. But it is argued that though the amount was struck out, that for the purpose of appropriating payments in this account it could have been allowed. It is impossible for me to follow that argument, and this account must stand on its own basis, and if a certain item is struck out, that item cannot be made use of for the purpose of appropriating payments, and so reducing the amounts paid off, and in that respect increasing the capital remaining due. As I say, whatever the Magistrate's calculation may have amounted to it was upon the basis that it was only simple interest being charged. Now, the question is whether, in rectifying the Magistrate's error, the Court ought to allow the appellant's costs in this case. It seems to me that that ground of appeal was not in contemplation of the parties at all at the time. It was not understood quite how it was that the Magistrate arrived at the amount that he fixed upon, but it was presumed that it was because compound interest was charged. It is now found that compound interest was not charged. The fact remains that if the calculation is incorrect, it must be rectified. The Magistrate's calculation was consequently wrong in the amount of £5 11s. 6d. Now, it seems to me that if that had been brought by the appellant to the notice of the respondent in all probability he would have consented to the amendment, but, on the other hand, it is quite clear that the respondent came to the Court to support a claim which is now found to be incorrect, and which he himself could have ascertained the appellant could have ascertained when he came into this Court to support the claim he was not entitled to. Both the parties are to blame in coming to this Court, which merely means the rectifying of figures in the Magistrate's judgment. The appeal will be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £13 14s. 6d., each party to pay his own costs of appeal.

VAN DER WESTHUIZEN V. MULDER.

This was an appeal from a decision of the R.M. of Prince Albert, in which judgment was given for the plaintiff for £3 19s. 9d. for goods sold and delivered. The goods consisted of bread and buns, which were supplied to Miss Stripp, who afterwards married the defendant, Van der Westhuizen, who undertook to pay, but subsequently refused. The Magistrate, after hearing the evidence, held there was a guarantee on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff refused to supply the bread without cash, and the defendant told the plaintiff to supply the bread, and to look for him for payment. The defendant, in his evidence, denied that he ever gave such an undertaking.

Dr. Greer was for the appellant, and Mr. Van Zyl was for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff sues the defendant for bread and buns supplied, and for work done by her to and on account of Miss Stripp. It is stated in the summons that the defendant promised that he would meet Miss Stripp's indebtedness to the plaintiff. This account runs from March, 1906, to February, 1907. In August, 1906, Miss Stripp was married to the defendant, and after that the purchases put in the account are entered against Mrs. Van der Westhuizen. There are therefore two sets of items, the one for goods supplied and for work done before Miss Stripp was married to the defendant, and the other for goods supplied and work done after the marriage. It is alleged in the summons that the defendant undertook to pay for any bread supplied to Miss Stripp and any work done for her. The plaintiff herself has given evidence, from which it appears that when she refused to give Miss Stripp any further credit the defendant came forward and guaranteed this payment, or rather took the liability upon himself, and she says that was done in the presence of her husband and sister. She is corroborated by her sister and her husband, and the statements made by these three witnesses are believed by the Magistrate. On the part of the defendant we have only his denial. Under the circumstances it would have been reasonable to expect that his wife should have been put in the witness box to corroborate his statement. She was not called, and that circumstance is very unfavourable to the case of the defendant. There is no denial of her indebtedness. It is not disputed that the bread was supplied to her and the work done for her. In fact, it is not a matter which could have been disputed by the defendant, and for that purpose it would have been necessary to call Mrs. Van der Westhuizen herself. It must, therefore, be taken that it has been satisfactorily proved that the goods were supplied and the work done, and I am satisfied that the defendant came to some such arrangement as that stated by the plaintiff. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon Mr. Justice HOPELEY.]

JACOBSON V. SCHILLER. } 1907.
} June 5th.

Mr. Wallach moved for judgment under Rule 319 in default of plea, for £95, balance of account for cash lent and advanced, with interest a tempore moræ and costs.

Judgment as prayed.

In re HEX RIVER VINEYARD CO., LTD.

Mr. Struben presented the liquidators' report, and applied for the usual order. Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that this was a preliminary report in a voluntary liquidation, and that it was not the practice to order publication.

Order granted, as is usual in official winding-up. Publication once in the "Cape Times" and "S.A. News."

In re EAST LONDON DAILY NEWS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO. (IN LIQUIDATION).

This was an application by the official liquidators of the East London Daily News Printing and Publishing Co., Ltd., for confirmation of their second report.

Dr. Greer appeared for applicants; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan appeared for H. Ries and Co. and the partners in that firm, to oppose their being placed on the list of contributaries in respect of 1,000 shares.

Dr. Greer said that certain affidavits had been filed by Messrs. Ries, and it would be necessary that the applicants should have time to reply to those affidavits. The report had duly lain for inspection as directed by the Court, and the only opposition raised to it was that by Messrs. Ries. Under the circumstances, he suggested that the Court should confirm the report except such portions as referred to Messrs. Ries, viz., in paragraphs 6 to 24 inclusive. In regard to those portions, he should have to apply for a postponement for two or three weeks to enable replying affidavits to be filed, or, if the parties were so advised, an action might be brought to settle their respective rights. Of course, if no agreement were arrived at, then the matter would have to be dealt with on motion.

Mr. Buchanan: There is great objection to an action being brought now.

Hopley, J., said he thought it was the invariable practice to settle matters of contributories on motion.

Mr. Buchanan said he thought it depended whether the facts could be sufficiently set forth on affidavit. He added that he did not raise any objection to a postponement.

Dr. Greer then proceeded to call the Court's attention to the other principal features of the report. He said that the liquidators had sold the machinery, plant, etc., as authorised to Messrs. Davis and Son, of Natal, for £3,600, less £6 10s. allowed for damaged type, and £40 paid to Mr. Rose for supervising the plant while the offer was under consideration. The liquidators went on to say that as to the liability, if any, attaching to the provisional directors for the irregularities in the formation of the company, more particularly as regards the deficiency of capital properly subscribed for, they were advised that the provisional directors were protected by the terms of the prospectus. With regard to the liability of E. K. Fletcher (the promoter) for shares and otherwise in connection with matters referred to in the report, they had every reason to believe that he was not worth pursuing, and that his whereabouts could not be ascertained. The liquidators next dealt with Mr. M. J. Ries's claim for £6,480 for damages for breaking the lease of the premises. When the premises were surrendered, the lease had still nine years to run at £60 per month. Mr. Ries claimed full rent for the unexpired period. He had since offered, without prejudice, to accept £1,000 in settlement of his claim, and the creditors had decided to offer him, without prejudice, £500 in full settlement. Counsel said that, since the report was prepared, Mr. Ries had accepted this offer. Continuing, he said that the liquidators criticised Mr. Ries in that he sat as a director while the tender of his wife of the premises was considered and accepted, though he did not appear to have voted. Certain variations were made in the tender. "In each case," the liquidators observed, "Mr. M. J. Ries is described as not voting, but we feel that it is hardly likely, considering the important variations in the tender, all in his favour, that he was not actively engaged in promoting his own interests." They also pointed out that Fletcher received an advance from the company of £500 to be set off against commission he may earn on advertisements and subscriptions he may obtain. He only earned £278 2s., leaving a deficiency of £221 18s. The question as to how far the directors could be held liable for this advance of £500 was under consideration by the liquidators. Sanction was also asked to compromises effected with the late editor, and two machinists and stereotypers, who had been engaged on contracts. In their account the liquidators had allowed for payment of the landlord's claim in full, and they recommended that a dividend of 4s. 9d. in the £ be paid to concurrent creditors, leaving a balance in hand of £278 2s. 1d. Counsel pointed out that, in view of the fact that the landlord's claim had been settled for £500, there would be a still larger sum available for distribution. The liquidators also applied to the Court to fix their remuneration, and urged that they should be allowed 5 per cent. on the assets realised to date, viz., £237 12s. 6d. The failure of the company was attributed to (1) insufficiency of working capital; (2) the somewhat lavish expenditure in machinery in excess of the requirements of the districts to be served; (3) want of management, too much of the business being entrusted to the promoter Fletcher.

The Court confirmed the report, save paragraphs 6 to 24 inclusive, which must stand over, pending any action to be taken by the liquidators or by the firm of H. Ries and Co., and the various partners of the said firm, to settle the question of their liability, the liquidators' remuneration to be fixed at 200 guineas.

In re GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS.

Mr. Upington moved for confirmation of the third report of the official receivers. Counsel drew the Court's attention to the publication in the "Times" (London). It appeared that an account had been received from the "Times" for three publications, but only one copy of the paper had been received.

Hopley, J., said that there seemed to be no reason to doubt that due publication had been made.

Mr. Upington said that there was a motion on the list for admission of the firm of J. E. and S. Spencer to rank and receive a dividend in respect of their claim. That matter was not dealt with by the report, but the receivers raised no objection to the application of J. E. and S. Spencer. The receivers, in the course of their report, stated that a sum of £109,770 was available for immediate distribution, and they asked for authority to pay a further dividend of 5s. in the £, making 11s. in the £ to date. They also recommended that J. E. McNellan, for £80 15s., and E. Hazelhurst and Co., for £428 6s. 4d., be admitted as creditors, and that they be paid the dividend already awarded, and be included in the list of creditors, and that they (the receivers) be allowed remuneration at the rate of 2½ per cent. on the amount received since the filing of the second account.

The report was confirmed, and an order made in terms of the receivers' recommendations.

Ex parte HILL AND GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order admitting the firm of J. E. and S. Spencer to rank and receive a dividend in respect of their claim of £750 against the Grand Junction Railways. Judgment had been obtained by the firm against the petitioner as receiver in the High Court in England.

Order granted accordingly.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

VELKORISKY V. VELKORISKY. } 1907. June 5th

This was an application for an order upon respondent to pay £1 a month to his wife, from whom he had been judicially separated, for maintenance of the child.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; respondent appeared in person.

Applicant said that since the order was made in March, 1906, respondent had not contributed anything towards the maintenance of the child. She was unable to continue to maintain the child, and respondent was in a position to pay maintenance.

Respondent, in an affidavit, said that he was quite unable to pay anything towards the maintenance of the child.

Dr. Greer cross-examined respondent as to his means.

Hopley, J., said that he could not make an order on the present application.

Ex parte CONNOR.

Mr. Long moved for an order authorising the executors in the estate of the late Mary Connor to raise a further mortgage on certain property in the division of Somerset East, in order to pay estate debts. The property was left by testatrix to two of her sons, subject to the conditions that they should maintain and support two of their brothers, who are of weak intellect, and that they should not sell or dispose of the farm. The curator ad litem of the two imbecile brothers consented to the application. The two legatees also consented.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte KOK.

Mr. Sutton moved for a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte ADAMS.

Mr. Lewis moved for leave to petitioner to sue his wife, Georgina Adams, in forma pauperis for divorce on the ground of adultery.

Rule nisi granted, returnable on the 18th June.

Ex parte BULL.

Mr. Lewis moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Joshua Edward Bull, medical practitioner, of Uitenhage, for release of applicant from arrest on payment of the arrear instalments in the matter of Coulton v. Bull, and the costs of the arrest. Applicant had previously been placed under arrest, and had been released on payment of £3 a month. He paid the instalments regularly until last month, when he failed to pay the money, because a certain cheque he had depended upon did not come to hand.

Ordered that applicant be released on payment of the arrears and the costs of arrest, original order to stand subsequently, with leave to telegraph the order.

Ex parte SMITH.

Mr. Van der Byl moved, on the petition of Hendrik Smith, of Saron, who had been employed as a handy man by the Imperial Cold Storage, Limited, at a farm in the Tulbagh district, for leave to sue the respondents in forma pauperis for £2,000 damages. Petitioner said that he was seriously injured by a threshing machine owing to the negligence of respondents or their servants. He had been refused relief in the Magistrate's Court on the ground that the case did not come within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act, No. 40 of 1905, inasmuch as the injuries were sustained in agricultural work. Counsel said that his learned friend, Dr. Greer, who had been briefed in this matter, was prepared to certify.

Rule nisi granted, returnable on the 19th June.

Ex parte ESTATE OLIVIER.

Mr. Toms moved for leave to the executors to invest the sum of £5,049 18s.

11d. on mortgage of certain immovable property. The matter had previously been before the Court, when Mr. Justice Laurence directed that a sum of £4,250 be invested on first mortgage and that the balance be paid into the guardians' fund. Petitioners asked for leave to invest the whole amount, and said that such a course would be in the interests of the minors. The Master was in favour of the application, subject to the grandfather of the minors, J. P. Hugo, becoming surety for the payment to the minors on attaining their majority.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

Ex parte CALITZ.

Mr. Toms moved for leave to petitioner to sell certain estate property in the district of Oudtshoorn, the proceeds to be invested in landed property at Swellendam.

KEEGAN V. HERBSTSTEIN.

Mr. Pohl moved for the removal of this case to the ensuing Circuit Court at Graaff-Reinet.

Ordered to be removed accordingly.

Ex parte MALONEY.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, Alfred James Maloney, by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights. Petitioner resided at Wynberg, and had not heard anything from her husband since 1905. Respondent was heard of a little time ago in Bradford, Yorkshire.

Leave to sue by edict granted, citation returnable on the 15th October, personal service, if possible, failing which one publication in the "Yorkshire Daily Observer" (Bradford).

Ex parte WARING.

Mr. Lewis moved for leave to petitioner, who resides at Salt River, to sue by edictal citation one George S. Sargent, formerly of Wynberg, and now of Boksburg, Transvaal, for a debt of £28 18s. 6d., and for attachment of certain property at Maitland and rents in the hands of Mr. McGregor.

Leave to sue by edict granted, citation returnable on the 26th June, landed property and rents collected by Mr. McGregor for the said Sargent to be attached ad fundandam jurisdictionem.

INSOLVENT ESTATE NAUDE V. DURANDT.

Mr. Burton moved on the petition of Robert George Attwell, as sole trustee in the insolvent estate Naude, for costs incurred by applicant in certain application for an interdict in which he (Attwell) was respondent, and G. J. Cloete and the present respondent were applicants. Applicant also prayed for the removal of the interdict against a certain erf in the insolvent estate claimed by Durandt.

There was no appearance for respondent, who, it was stated, had intimated his willingness to have the interdict discharged.

Ordered that the interdict be discharged, and that the respondent (Durandt) pay the costs which he caused to be incurred in the matter, and also the costs of the present application.

Held that, under the circumstances the presumption of animus injurandi was rebutted.

The letter read to the Council had been type written by the defendant's clerk.

Held, that the privilege which protected the defendant in having the letter read to the Council also protected him in the employment of a confidential clerk to copy the letter.

This was an action for damages for slander in which Jacob Petrus Celliers, an attorney of Somerset West, sued Henry Allan Fagan, an ex-Mayor and enrolled law agent. The amount claimed was £2,000, and the slander was alleged to have been uttered on various occasions during the years 1906 and 1907.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. Plaintiff is an attorney-at-law and notary public practising and residing at Somerset West, in the division of Stellenbosch; defendant is an enrolled agent practising and residing at the same place.

2. On or about January 21, 1907, defendant caused to be written and forwarded to plaintiff, who duly received it, a letter.

3. The statements in the said letter bearing reference to plaintiff were made by defendant falsely and maliciously.

4. Defendant has published the contents of the said letter to divers persons on divers occasions: more particularly to one Anna Hansen, to whom he dictated the said letter for the purpose of having the same typewritten on or about January 21, 1907; to the Councillors of the Municipality of Somerset West Strand assembled in meeting, to whom he read it on January 31, 1907, and February 1, 1907, respectively, there being present on the former occasion Councillors Haylett, Van der Merwe, Dorrington, Myburgh, and Loubser, and the Town Clerk, De Beer, and on the latter occasion Councillors Haylett, Gous, Louw, Dorrington, Myburgh, Loubser, Van der Merwe, and Abeglen; to one Johannes Wynand Louw Hofmeyr; and to one Jozua G. Hofmeyr, to whom defendant showed the said letter or a copy thereof on an occasion or occasions the dates whereof are unknown to plaintiff.

5. On or about January 30, 1907, and at Cape Town, defendant swore an affidavit in a certain matter of Cairncross and Celliers v. Fagan, and annexed thereto a copy of the letter referred to in paragraph 2, and thereafter filed the said affidavit and annexure with the honourable the Supreme Court, and

FIRST DIVISION.

CELLIERS V. FAGAN. { 1907.

Defamation—Animus injurandi—Privilege—Publication—Employment of copyist of defamatory matter.

In an action for damages for causing a letter containing defamatory matter concerning the plaintiff to be read at a meeting of a Municipal Council of which the defendant was Chairman, it appeared that the letter was annexed to an affidavit prepared by the defendant to meet an application made by the plaintiff in the Supreme Court calling upon the Council and the defendant to show cause why the defendant should not be removed from the Council.

thereby falsely, maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause repeated and published the contents of the said letter.

6. By reason of the publication of the false and defamatory statements under the circumstances referred to in the preceding paragraphs, plaintiff has suffered great damage in his credit and reputation and professional practice, and is entitled to claim in respect thereof the sum of £1,000.

7. On or about December 31, 1906, at Somerset West Strand and in the presence of one Carel Johannes Petrus van der Merwe, defendant falsely and maliciously uttered the following words of and concerning plaintiff, to wit: "I can tell you that Celliers is one of the biggest scoundrels. He humbugged Mrs. Louw, and he would have humbugged Mrs. Brink out of £300 if it was not for me, and you can tell him so from me."

8. On or about January 26, 1907, at Somerset West Strand, and in the presence of one Andreas Zacharias de Beer, defendant uttered the following words of and concerning plaintiff, to wit: "I have sent a letter to Celliers in the strongest terms possible telling him that he has done certain dishonest things, and if he did so again I would take steps to get him struck off the roll. Celliers knows that the letter was not typed by me but that I dictated it to my typist, and if my statements were not true he would certainly have sued me for libel, but instead he sent me a mildly worded letter in reply." (And after some further words, which it is unnecessary to insert: herein, defendant continued): "Tell him" (that is to say, one Dorrington) "if he only knew what a blackguard and scoundrel Celliers is he would have nothing to do with him," whereby defendant meant that plaintiff had been guilty of dishonest conduct, that he had been guilty of conduct which rendered him liable to be removed from the roll of attorneys and notaries, and that he was a blackguard and a scoundrel: all of which words and imputations defendant uttered and made falsely and maliciously.

9. In or about the month of May, 1906, at Somerset West Strand, and in the presence of the said Andreas Zacharias de Beer, defendant falsely and maliciously uttered the following words of and concerning plaintiff, to wit, "You must be careful of Celliers, because he tried to swindle Mrs. Krynauw out of the purchase money of her property."

10. In or about the month of December, 1905, at Somerset West, and in the presence of one Johannes Rynhardt van Breda, defendant uttered the following words of and concerning plaintiff, to wit: "Ik is jammer om het te hoor jij zal nog verneuk raak bij di end. Ik zal jou nou iets vertel wat Celliers gedaan het wat jij zelf zal beken gaat tegen hem. Een zeker man het aan Celliers geschreef dat hij zeker erven moet verkoop tegen niet minder dan een zeker prijs en toen het Celliers naar Urtel gegaan en hij het aan Urtel gezeg, kijk die kerel wil die erven verkoop. Dit is zyn laagste prys. Koop jij die erven nou en verkoop dit dan weer en dan verdeel ons die profit. Nou wat denk jij dan van een man wat dit kan doen," which words, being translated, read: "I am sorry to hear you say so; you will be ultimately swindled. I shall now tell you something that Celliers has done, which you yourself will allow goes against him. A certain man wrote to Celliers that he must sell certain erven for him at not less than a certain price, and thereupon Celliers went to Urtel and said, 'See this fellow wishes to sell these erven. This is his lowest price. You buy the erven now, and again sell them, and let us divide the profit.' Now, what do you think of a man who can act in such a way?" Whereby defendant meant that the confidence placed in plaintiff by the said Van Breda had been misplaced, and that he (Van Breda) would ultimately be swindled by him (plaintiff), and that plaintiff had abused, or had tried to abuse, for his own benefit, the confidence placed in him by a client in connection with the sale of certain land with which the said client had entrusted him. All of which words and imputations defendant uttered and made falsely and maliciously, but plaintiff obtained knowledge of the utterance thereof only during the currency of the present year.

11. By reason of the publication of the false and defamatory statements referred to in paragraphs 7, 8, 9, and 10 plaintiff has suffered damage in his credit and reputation and professional practice, and is entitled to claim in respect thereof the sum of £1,000.

Wherefore plaintiff prays: (a) Judgment for the sum of £1,000 and £1,000 respectively; (b) interest a tempore mora; (c) such other and further relief as may seem meet; together with (d) costs of suit.

The following is the letter referred to in the declaration:

Somerset West, January 21, 1907.

J. P. Celliers, Esq., Attorney, Somerset West.

Sir.—The concluding paragraph of your letter of 17th inst. has been noted, also your remarks re Du Plessis v. Arnold, as well as those contained in some of your previous letters. Allow me to state that your malevolence is making you positively silly and unbearable. I often wonder when you are going to cease from letting your envy of an opposition business make yourself ridiculous. I should have sent you a full reply to the abusive and impertinent attacks made upon me, but I doubt whether you are always responsible for the baseless fabrications contained in some of your letters. Either your malevolence stupefies you, or you are maliciously preparing the way for a repetition of the scurrilous tactics adopted by you in the matter of Krynauc v. De Beer. You are taking advantage of my well-known habit of ignoring calumnies of this nature from such sources. I simply write this to record my protests, once and for all. You are constantly referring to the honourable profession you have adopted. My opinion is that some of your tactics are disgraceful and dishonouring to this profession. I am seriously considering whether the Law Society should not be placed in possession of the facts. We desire to carry on our business in a quiet and honourable manner. Had we worked for profit merely we would have accepted some of your suggestions to work "harmoniously." In our best interests and in the interests of our clients, we have found it incumbent on us not to accept your proposals, but to carry on our business in our own manner. I desire nothing better than to be left alone. I have once and for all come to the conclusion that if I want to study the interests of our clients, there must be no "private arrangements." Our methods are too different for us ever to try to work together. I do not intend taking the slightest notice of anything in your future correspondence apart from the subject matter dealt with. Let this letter serve as a reply to all your calumnies past and future.—Yours, etc. (signed), H. A. Fagan.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

1. Defendant admits paragraphs 1 and 2 of the plaintiff's declaration.

2. Defendant says that the letter referred to in paragraph 3 of the declaration is not defamatory, and otherwise denies the allegations in the said paragraph 3.

3. Defendant dictated to Miss Anna Hansen the terms of the letter referred to in paragraph 4 of plaintiff's declaration. The said Miss Hansen is the confidential clerk and typist of the firm of Fagan and Markotter, of which defendant is a member, and the said dictation was made to her in the usual and ordinary course of business of the firm aforesaid. Defendant neither made nor exhibited any communication in writing to Miss Hansen in connection with the said letter, nor did she see the said letter when complete as signed by the defendant. The defendant moreover says that in any event the communication by dictation to Miss Hansen was privileged.

4. On or about the 28th January, 1907, the present plaintiff, together with one Cairncross, instituted proceedings against the defendant and the Municipality of Somerset West Strand, with a view to having the defendant declared incapable of sitting as a Councillor of the Municipality of Somerset West Strand, of which defendant was then the Mayor.

5. About the date stated in paragraph 4 of the plaintiff's declaration, the Councillors of the Somerset West Strand Municipality met and discussed in committee the position regarding the said proceedings wherein the Council of the Municipality of Somerset West Strand had been joined as respondent. The defendant (as it was his duty to do) in discharge of his functions as Mayor furnished the Councillors with full particulars of the charges that had been made and the steps that had been taken to secure further time within which to prepare the answering affidavits and to complete the defence. The defendant accordingly read to the Councillors present in committee aforesaid the notice of motion with the affidavits in support thereof furnished by the plaintiff and his co-applicant which set forth the allegations relied upon, and at the same time defendant also read a copy of the affidavit which he had filed in support of his application for additional time, to which was attached a copy of the letter forming the annexure to the plaintiff's declaration in this suit. Defendant claims that communications so made by him to the Councillors and to such of the officials of the Somerset West Strand Municipality as may have been present at the meeting were and are privileged.

6. Save as in the three previous paragraphs of this plea set out defendant denies the other allegations in paragraph 4 of the plaintiff's declaration, and specially denies that he showed the said letter or a copy thereof to Johannes Wynand Louw Hofmeyr or to Jozua G. Hofmeyr as in the said paragraph of the declaration mentioned.

7. Defendant admits that the said letter was annexed to an affidavit and filed in proceedings pending before this Honourable Court as in paragraph 5 of the plaintiff's declaration set forth, but denies the remainder of the allegations in the said paragraph. The defendant says that the affidavit to which a copy of the said letter was annexed was filed on behalf of and in support of the present defendant's case in the proceedings then instituted by the plaintiff, and defendant claims that the communication was privileged.

8. Defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 6 of the plaintiff's declaration.

9. In regard to paragraph 7 of the plaintiff's declaration, defendant admits having on an occasion at Somerset West Strand stated to Van der Merwe Celliers is a scoundrel, he humbugged Mrs. Du Plessis and would have humbugged Mrs. Brink out of £300 if it had not been for me." Defendant says that the communication was a privileged one, and made to a fellow Councillor of the Somerset West Strand Municipality in the course of a discussion relative to municipal affairs, and more particularly relative to the exchange of land with one Abegglen. These words were made use of by the defendant in self-defence and in answer to rumours known to be in circulation (which Van der Merwe on the occasion referred to discussed with defendant) and attributed to the plaintiff as an attack upon defendant's character and reputation and also upon him in his capacity as Councillor or Mayor of the Municipality of Somerset West Strand. Defendant believed that plaintiff was mainly responsible for such rumours. Defendant denies the other allegations in paragraph 7 of the plaintiff's declaration.

10. The words used by the defendant concerning the plaintiff set out in the preceding paragraph of this plea were not defamatory, and were spoken bona fide, and with reasonable belief as to their truth. The defendant further says that they were true and were spoken by him in the public interest.

11. For particulars of the facts and circumstances relied upon by the defendant as justifying the words used by him on the occasions complained of in the several paragraphs of plaintiff's declaration, the defendant begs leave to refer this Honourable Court to the annexure hereto, which he asks may be considered as included in this plea.

12. At the date mentioned in paragraph 8 of the plaintiff's declaration, Andries Zachariah de Beer was Town Clerk, and the defendant was Mayor of Somerset West Strand Municipal Council. De Beer reported to defendant that the official auditor of the Council, one Wade, was making extracts from the Council's books and from papers in the said De Beer's office apparently for the plaintiff's use, and that plaintiff came from time to time in order to check and verify such extracts, and added that plaintiff seemed to be taking advantage of Wade's position as official auditor to secure information upon which to base charges against the defendant. The Town Clerk inquired what attitude should be assumed by him towards such "spying." Defendant thereupon instructed De Beer to allow free access, and added that on several occasions the defendant had taken exception to the manner in which the plaintiff was acting towards him, and said that if the plaintiff was acting the spy in the manner De Beer suggested, then he (plaintiff) was a low blackguard, and should be struck off the rolls. Defendant says that the whole of the communication to De Beer was privileged and justifiable in the public interest.

13. The defendant otherwise denies the allegations in paragraph 8 of the plaintiff's declaration, and he specially denies that save as above set forth he used the words in the form set forth in such alleged quotation, and he also specially denies that he sent the alleged message to Dorington.

14. Defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 9 of the plaintiff's declaration.

15. Defendant admits that at Somerset West on one occasion he had a conversation with Van Breda generally in the terms indicated in paragraph 10 of the plaintiff's declaration. Defendant, however, denies that he made use of the word "verneuk," and he also denies having spoken the first sentence of the alleged words quoted as having been uttered in Dutch. Defendant says that the said Van Breda was one of an election committee of certain candidates at the Parliamentary General Election of 1903 and 1904 at Stellenbosch, for which candidates defendant was an agent. The conversation took place during the period of and had reference to election matters, upon which Van Breda and defendant were engaged in common. Defendant repeated to the said Van Breda the purport of a statement which had been made to him by William Urtel, then and still a client of the plaintiff, in the bona fide and reasonable belief of the truth thereof. Defendant denies that the words he used were defamatory, and claims that the words were privileged. Defendant says moreover that action thereon is prescribed. Defendant otherwise denies the allegations in paragraph 10 of the plaintiff's declaration.

16. Defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 11 of plaintiff's declaration.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's action may be dismissed with costs.

The following was an annexure to the declaration, setting forth the particulars of the acts and conduct of the plaintiff, Jacob Petrus Celliers, referred to by the defendant, Henry Allan Fagan, in his plea of justification. (A) the reference to Mrs. Du Plessis was made in consequence of the following facts and circumstances:

1. During the year 1906 the plaintiff had been and was acting as attorney for Mr. A. P. du Plessis, senior, whose wife conducted his affairs. Plaintiff was also acting for Mr. A. P. du Plessis, junior, the son of Mr. A. P. du Plessis, senior, and the plaintiff was likewise acting for some of the creditors of the said A. P. du Plessis, junior. On plaintiff's advice and at a time when the plaintiff knew Du Plessis, junior, to be insolvent, he, plaintiff, arranged for and effected on April 2, 1906, transfer from the name of Du Plessis, junior, to that of Du Plessis, senior, of all the unmortgaged landed property then registered in the name of the said Du Plessis, junior.

2. The plaintiff before completing such transfer insisted upon and obtained payment from Du Plessis, senior, of the sum of £52 alleged to be due to the plaintiff by Du Plessis, junior, and also of a further sum of £178, stated to be due by the said Du Plessis, junior, to the Somerset West branch of the Standard Bank, for which branch the plaintiff acts. These amounts of £52 and £178 were paid through Mrs. Du Plessis, senior, together with a further sum of £18 to cover expenses of transfer from Du Plessis, junior, to Du Plessis, senior. The purchase consideration for the transfer purported to be advances which had been made by the father to the son from time to time during a period extending several years back.

3. At the date of this transaction Du Plessis, junior, was indebted for advances made against three separate properties by three separate creditors, each bond containing the general clause, viz: (l) £450 to Miss Malan, for whom plaintiff acted and still acts as agent. (m) £100 to Miss Brounger, for whom the South African Association was agent. (n) £60 to the defendant.

4. Plaintiff knew of the existence of these mortgages, and was aware that the properties specially hypothecated were not sufficient to meet the mortgage debts, and that the effect of transferring the unmortgaged property must be to deprive the bond holders, who were not made aware of the proposed alienation, of the benefit of their general clauses. A month after the passing of the transfer by Du Plessis, junior, to Du Plessis, senior, the plaintiff advised and as the agent of Du Plessis, junior, secured the surrender of the estate of the said Du Plessis, junior, as insolvent.

5. Plaintiff thereupon tried to secure for himself the appointment as trustee of the insolvent estate of Du Plessis, junior, by endeavouring to induce one or more of the creditors to withdraw from their promise given to support the defendant's candidature for such trusteeship, and to transfer such promised vote to the plaintiff or to his nominee. The creditor thus approached having adhered to his promise, the plaintiff and defendant were elected joint trustees.

6. As a result of the defendant's investigation and inquiries the insolvent estate of Du Plessis, junior, on the 15th October, 1906, obtained an order from this honourable Court decreeing a forfeiture of the claim of Du Plessis, senior, against his son's insolvent estate, and ordering the re-transfer of the property conveyed to Du Plessis, senior, from Du Plessis, junior, on the 2nd April, 1906, and requiring him to deliver up the deed of transfer dated August 3, 1903, in favour of Abram Petrus du Plessis. Du Plessis, senior, had upon the advice of the plaintiff maintained that he was entitled to retain such deed as against his son Du Plessis, junior, owing to the omission of the distinguishing designation "senior" or "junior" after the name of the transferee.

7. Mrs. Du Plessis, senior, eventually arranged a compromise whereby the judgment was satisfied by payments to the trustees which resulted in substantial dividends to concurrent creditors, whilst she and her husband sustained serious loss.

8. Defendant says that plaintiff's conduct was improper, and that he thereby caused Mrs. Du Plessis, acting for her husband, heavy loss. Neither the £52 nor the £178, nor the further losses sustained by the said Du Plessis have been repaid to Mrs. Du Plessis or to her husband, to whom she is married in community of property.

"B."—The reference to Mrs. Brink was made in consequence of the following facts and circumstances.

9. In 1903 plaintiff acted for the late D. J. Brink, and obtained as security for a debt from one Robert Gordon a mortgage bond for £700 over certain property at Somerset West. The plaintiff also acted for the late Brink in obtaining additional security in the form of a like bond for £700 passed by the said Gordon to cover the same debt. The plaintiff acted as the agent of the said Brink, and collected the half-yearly interest, and after the death of the said Brink he continued to act as the agent of the widow, Mrs. Brink.

10. The plaintiff likewise acted for one Charles Kershaw, the holder of a mortgage bond for £600, containing the general clause, but specially hypothecating only some of the landed property of the said Gordon. Early in the year 1906 Mrs. Brink transferred the management of her affairs to the defendant's firm, whereupon the plaintiff handed over the two bonds which had up till then remained in his possession.

11. The plaintiff acted for the debtor, Robert Gordon, and also for his brothers and sisters, all of whom were appointed heirs and entitled to substantial amounts from the estate of their late father.

12. Consequent upon the general depreciation in the value of land already prior to June, 1906, the landed property bonded was not worth sufficient to cover the mortgage debts owing by Gordon. In June, 1906, the roof of Gordon's dwelling-house was blown off, and by reason of his want of means he has been unable to repair the same, and the value of the security was thus further diminished.

13. The plaintiff, although aware that Gordon was then practically insolvent, on the 1st July, 1906, took an underhand cession of Gordon's only unburdened asset, namely, the claim upon his parents' estate. The cession purports to be in security for advances alleged to be due to plaintiff, and was obtained without the knowledge of the other creditors of Gordon.

14. On the 17th September, 1906, Gordon was cited before the Resident Magistrate at Somerset West to show cause against a decree for civil imprisonment on a debt of £34. The plaintiff appeared and offered on behalf of Gordon £3 per month. Gordon stated on oath under cross-examination that beside the mortgage debts he owed his brother David £31, and that with this exception he only owed small amounts, and that he had to get £300 from his father's estate. The plaintiff, who was acquainted with the true condition of Gordon's affairs, made no correction of these statements, which were made in his presence.

15. Within a few days thereafter the plaintiff prepared Gordon's schedules, in which he brought himself up as a creditor for £121 4s. 6d., secured by the cession aforesaid. Gordon's surrender having been accepted, the plaintiff proved for his claim of £121 4s. 6d., and claimed to hold the said cession as security, which security he valued at £500. The cession aforesaid is being challenged on behalf of Mrs. Brink as an undue preference in fraud of creditors, of whom plaintiff well knew at the time that Mrs. Brink was one.

"C."—The plaintiff likewise acted improperly in connection with the assigned estate of one Abraham Arnold, as follows:

16. Abraham Arnold became insolvent in 1893, but omitted to bring up in his schedules certain landed property registered in his name, and situate in the village of Faure. In 1903 Arnold passed a covering bond for £300 in favour of the plaintiff, which mortgage purported specially to hypothecate the said land at Faure, together with other property which Arnold had secured since his insolvency in 1893. In the year 1906 Arnold assigned his estate for the benefit of his creditors. Plaintiff and defendant were appointed joint assignees. The plaintiff, although well aware that the land at Faure belonged to the creditors of the insolvent estate, and not to the creditors of the assigned estate of Arnold, pressed the defendant to allow the plaintiff to sell the premises at Faure and to apply the proceeds in reduction of the plaintiff's bond. Defendant declined to consent.

"D."—The plaintiff likewise acted improperly in effecting a transfer from Morkel to Du Plessis, jun., as follows:

17. At Somerset West, in the year 1903, the plaintiff, acting as auctioneer on behalf of Peter Morkel, knocked down certain erven to one Jardine for £64. Some time thereafter Jardine resold the same erven to A. P. du Plessis, jun., for the sum of £80, whereupon Du Plessis, jun., paid £64 to plaintiff and £16 to Jardine, and transfer was effected through plaintiff's office direct from Morkel to Du Plessis, transfer duty being paid on £64 only.

"E."—The plaintiff also acted improperly and unprofessionally in connection with the passing of a covering bond by A. P. du Plessis, jun., to R. Warner and Co., for £150, as follows:

18. Shortly after the alienation to Du Plessis, sen., of the landed property on the 2nd April, 1906, as set forth in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this annexure, the firm of R. Warner and Co. approached plaintiff to obtain security from Du Plessis, jun., for a sum of about £100, due to the said firm.

19. The plaintiff failed to inform R. Warner and Co. that the said Du Plessis, jun., was to plaintiff's knowledge in insolvent circumstances, but offered to procure from the said Du Plessis, jun., a covering bond for £150 in favour of the said firm, provided that the firm would discharge a claim of £10 10s., together with costs of an action then pending for the recovery of this sum by plaintiff from Du Plessis, jun., plaintiff wrongfully alleging that he had a lien over all the title-deeds of the said Du Plessis, jun.

20. The said firm agreed to this arrangement, and in terms thereof discharged the plaintiff's said claim, with costs. Thereupon on the 25th April, 1906, the plaintiff, in terms of the arrangement, secured on behalf of the said firm the registration of a covering bond for £150, specially hypothecating as a second mortgage the separate properties referred to in clause 3 of this annexure, though the plaintiff knew that the said properties were not at the time worth the amount of the existing bonds thereon.

21. Thereafter, on the 2nd May, 1906, the estate of the said Du Plessis, jun., was surrendered as insolvent, as in paragraph 4 of this annexure set forth, and the firm of R. Warner and Co. were, under the circumstances above set forth, compelled to abandon all claim for preference under their bond, and have had to accept a dividend as concurrent creditors. The plaintiff has, moreover, not refunded to the said firm the amounts paid under the arrangement as aforesaid.

"F."—The plaintiff has on divers occasions, and with reference to sundry matters, acted in an improper and unprofessional manner as follows:

22. In endeavouring to persuade creditors interested in insolvent estates to depart from promises made to vote for defendant as trustee, with a view to inducing such creditors to support the candidature of plaintiff or of plaintiff's nominee, to wit, in the insolvent estates of Charles Gerhardus van der Byl, of Somerset West Strand, and A. P. du Plessis, jun., of Somerset West.

23. By arranging a compromise of a case direct with the party against whom the plaintiff was acting, although such person was represented by the defendant's firm to the knowledge of plaintiff, to wit, in the matter of Scarts v. Roos.

24. By attempting to influence a client of the defendant's firm not to employ such firm, but to transfer his business to plaintiff, to wit, Rayoolsha, of Sir Lowry's Pass.

25. By neglecting when transmitting a diagram prepared for purposes of transferring premises purchased by defendant from Mrs. Willeputs through plaintiff, to communicate a disclosure specially made to plaintiff by the surveyor employed that the diagram did not contain the entire premises sold and purchased.

26. By wrongfully entering into an agreement with one J. J. de Beer, an enrolled agent, also practicing at Somerset West, whereby plaintiff and De Beer agreed (independently of special arrangements with clients) each to charge and the other to allow in all future court cases, in which they should appear as opposing one another, fees at the rate of £2 2s. per diem, for attendance in court, the said charge being far in excess of that authorised by the Magistrates' Courts rules as to costs. The said charges were made accordingly by plaintiff and De Beer, to wit, in the case of Fauré v. Haupt.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan) for plaintiff Mr. Close (with him Mr. D. Buchanan) for defendant.

Karl Johannes Petrus van der Merwe, Mayor of the Somerset West Municipality, said he was present at the meetings on January 31 and February 1. At the first mentioned meeting the defendant (Fagan) was present. A question arose with regard to proceedings taken to unseat Fagan, and the defendant read a letter (produced). Witness took objection to the letter being read, as he considered it was not at home in their deliberations. In spite of this protest, the letter was read. The meeting was an open meeting. The Mayor then suggested that the meeting should adjourn pending his getting a full meeting of the members of the Council. They met again on February 1, and the letter was again read. Witness again protested against the letter being read, but, notwithstanding that, it was read. With regard to what had been stated in the letter, he thought that if the Mayor read such a letter in an open meeting there must be some truth in it. Mr. Cilliers asked witness after the meeting if the letter had been read. "Now, I wish you to tell his lordship the grounds that led up to this statement," continued counsel.

Mr. Fagan came to my private residence, and asked me if I would accompany him to Stellenbosch to see Mr.

Roux, in order to try and persuade him to withdraw the protest he had made against the action of the Council in passing transfer of a certain lane to Mr. Abeggien.

Was Mr. Fagan acting for Abeggien in that matter? inquired counsel.

The witness replied in the affirmative, and added that when Mr. Fagan invited him he replied: "Well, as to-morrow is a holiday, I do not care about going away from my home, and, secondly, as there is some ill-feeling between you, I do not like to be mixed up in it." "Well," said Mr. Fagan, "Cilliers is only doing it out of spite." I replied. "I do not think Roux is a man that will allow himself to be used as a tool for spite, and Cilliers is only acting for the client, the same as you would do." Witness then asked him why he had delayed in bringing forward the matter of the transfer to Abeggien, and Fagan replied that it was the fault of the Surveyor-General, and witness replied that he thought Mr. Fagan was as bad, then Mr. Fagan jumped up, and said, "I tell you that Cilliers is the biggest scoundrel. He humbugged Mrs. Louw, and he would have humbugged Mrs. Brink out of £300 if it had not been for me, and you can go and tell him that."

Mr. Benjamin: Fagan says that Mrs. Louw's name was not mentioned, but that it was Mrs. Du Plessis?

Witness: He said Louw.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Considerable interest was aroused in the case at the time.

I put it to you that this letter was read at a special meeting of the Council to ascertain what action should be taken.

It was a special meeting of the Council.

I put it that Fagan read this letter which he had written some time before, commenting on the action of Cilliers to show his animus?

He read the letter.

Why did you not move a resolution protesting against the reading of this letter?

I did object.

Was not a vote of confidence moved in the Mayor (Mr. Fagan) at the time he explained his position?

Yes, but I protested.

But the minutes state that the Council was unanimous, and where is the reservation you made?

I said I appreciated what he had done, but that there was one thing he had done to which I objected.

Is that stated in the minutes?—No.

Some time before the end of 1906 there was some ill-feeling growing between you and Mr. Fagan?—Not from my side.

Mr. Fagan was in the habit of discussing matters with you?—Yes.

And you often spoke of Mr. Cilliers, and, in fact, on one occasion you told

Mr. Fagan that Celliers was unscrupulous in his charges, as you had opened a letter addressed to another Van der Merwe?—No, I do not remember it.

You often spoke of other members of the Council to Mr. Fagan?

I do not talk about the other Councilors.

Mr. Fagan consulted you about the matter of the transfer?—Yes.

And in the course of conversation Mr. Fagan said this about Celliers?—Yes.

Mr. Fagan gave his opinion of Mr. Celliers?—Yes, pretty strong.

Are you sure he used the word Mrs. Louw?

Yes, I am.

I put it to you that you are mixing up the name Louw with Du Plessis.

No, I am not. I know Mrs. Louw, and I knew Celliers had acted for Mrs. Louw before her husband's death, and that Fagan was then working for her.

You did not communicate that information to Celliers for a month after?—No.

Did you write the statement down?—No.

Did you see Mrs. Louw after Fagan said this?—No.

I thought you told my learned friend that you were impressed by this letter?—I thought it was just a business squabble.

Mr. Fagan was very angry when he made use of this statement?—He was huffed.

I cannot understand why your blaming Fagan for the delay should cause Fagan to call Celliers a rogue?

I told Fagan that I thought he was to be blamed for having delayed this matter so long.

Had you mentioned this matter to Fagan before?—Yes.

In re-examination, the witness said he had given Fagan work.

Andreas Zacharias de Beer, the Municipal Clerk, gave evidence in support of the eighth paragraph in the declaration, and put in copies of the minutes. He was present at both the meetings, and heard the letter read. Witness thought something must be wrong, or Mr. Fagan, smart business man that he was, would not make such a statement. On January 26 Mr. Fagan asked witness and his wife to dine with him, and witness accepted. They had a conversation, which commenced with regard to Mr. Dorrington, who was a member of the Council. Mr. Fagan wondered if Dorrington would pass a vote of censure on the Mayor, as he had challenged him to do so. Fagan then said: "I have sent a letter to Celliers in the strongest terms possible, telling him that he had done certain dishonest things, and if he did so again, I would take steps to get him struck off the roll. Celliers knows that the letter was not typed by me, but that I dictated it to my typist, and if my statements were not true, he would certainly have sued me for libel, but instead he sent me a mildly-worded letter in reply." Witness said that in May, 1906, Fagan said that if it had not been for him, Celliers would have swindled Mrs. Krynauw out of £50.

What impression did these various statements raise in your mind?

Well, there is never smoke without fire, and as these things had been going on for twelve months, I became suspicious.

Continuing, witness said that when the affidavits in the action to unseat Mr. Fagan were being drawn up, Mr. Fagan wanted witness to swear to something that was not correct—

Mr. Benjamin: Now, in June, 1906—

Mr. Close: My lord, there is nothing in the pleadings referring to June, 1906.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He cannot get damages for that date, but if there was slander, I do not think it can be excluded. I would suggest that it be left out.]

When that statement was made in January, was Wade getting particulars from the books for plaintiff?—No, he was not.

Celliers has a right to look at the books as a ratepayer?—Yes.

And there was no spying?—No. Continuing, witness said that on February 1 Fagan asked him if Wade had been in to look at the minute-book, and witness replied that he had. At the meeting, Mr. Fagan said that the Town Clerk said a spy had been in, but this statement he (witness) repudiated. Witness remembered the Municipal contractor applying for an advance, and Mr. Fagan said to him: "I am disappointed with you. You are still giving your work to Celliers, and therefore you cannot get money on account. If you cancelled the sale with Mr. Celliers you can get the money." A few days after the contractor went to the Municipal office, and Fagan paid him.

In cross-examination, witness said that although he visited Mr. Fagan privately on January 26, he took Municipal matter with him to discuss. Witness occasionally consulted the Mayor at his own house on Municipal matters.

I put it to you that that afternoon you told Mr. Fagan about Celliers and Wade and the books?—I did not.

You deny that?—Yes.

You then knew that the case was set down?—I had heard it.

A lot of investigation into the Council's books took place?—Yes.

When did Celliers go through them?—On the 25th.

I put it to you that Celliers constantly saw Wade?—I deny that.

Witness said he could not say where all the information contained in the voluminous affidavits handed in in the other case came from.

Are the minute-books accessible to the public?—They are to a ratepayer.

I put it to you that there had been unusual investigations into these books?—No.

At that time you knew that for some time past there had been ill-feeling between Celliers and Fagan?—I did not come in contact with Celliers to know what his feelings were. Mr. Celliers and I never discussed the matter.

You heard of this action on a Saturday?—Yes.

Did you go and tell the Mayor?—No: I only heard it casually.

These proceedings came on, and affidavits were prepared, and you tell the Court that you did not care to sign the affidavits because there was a lot that was not true in them?—Yes.

But you signed them?—Yes, when they were amended.

Witness, continuing, said he objected to the affidavit, because of certain statements in it which were not true. Sections 33, 34, and 35 in the affidavit were not read over to him. He gave instances of where he did not agree with the statements in the affidavits.

You say that Mr. Fagan wanted deliberately to commit perjury for the sake of 3s. 11d.?

Witness: The amount was more—it was 4s. 10d.

Witness, continuing, said he was sure that Mr. Fagan had used the name of De Beer with Celliers in May.

How did that come about?—Mr. Fagan told me to tell Bream that he must be careful of Celliers, or Celliers would make him bankrupt.

Why did Mr. Fagan choose a messenger?—I do not know. I thought Mr. Fagan was working for the Municipality. You see, Bream was doing the work very cheaply, and I was afraid of his going bankrupt.

Did you tell Celliers at once of what Fagan had said?—No, I said nothing until March last.

And how did you come to mention it?—Celliers asked me if I said so-and-so to Bream and Dorrington, and I replied that I had.

Did Celliers suggest to you the words that were used?—No.

Didn't you know there was considerable ill-feeling between the parties at this time?—Yes.

And you gave all the messages?—Yes.

Has Mr. Van der Merwe got a bond over your property?—Yes.

How much is it?—I do not see that that has anything to do with the case. I decline to answer.

Johannes Rynhardt van Breda, a farmer, of Standerton, and brother-in-law of Celliers, said that last year Fagan met him, and said he intended starting business at Somerset West, and asked witness to give him his work, and that of his mother. Witness replied that he could not give up his work, as Celliers had it, but that if Celliers swindled him he would soon make a change. With regard to his mother's property, he said he had nothing to do with it. Fagan then replied in Dutch. As conveyed in the declaration, witness took Fagan's statement to imply that Celliers was a rogue and a scoundrel. Witness did not tell Celliers at the time.

In cross-examination by Mr. Close, the witness said he and Mr. Fagan were in the committee which worked for Marais and Krige at the Parliamentary election in 1903. They were all thanked for the share they took in the election. Witness did not know that Celliers wanted to join the committee.

I put it to you that you asked Mr. Fagan what Celliers was like, and that he replied as you have stated?—That was never mentioned then.

Did you trust Mr. Celliers?—No. I trusted no man at election times. I did not know how he would vote, whether he would vote Progressive or Bond. He told me he was not going to interfere with politics because he was friendly with both sides.

When you heard this statement from Fagan you thought that Mr. Celliers had acted badly?—Yes.

And yet you did not tell Celliers about it for fifteen months after?—The first time I mentioned them was three days before my sister's wedding.

I put it to you that not only on the occasion of the election, but at other times you said Mr. Celliers was unscrupulous in his charges?—No, I did not.

Didn't you make objections to his charges?—No, indeed. I got the account and then went and paid it.

The Chief Justice interrupted the cross-examination to remark that if the line of defence as shown in the cross-examination were not established, he was not sure it would not increase the damages.

The witness said he got an offer at the sale of over £2,000, and afterwards the School Committee bought the place for £3,000. That was the reserve price, and they would not have sold for a penny less. He was away when the option was given to the School Committee, and he told his mother he was sorry that such option had been given.

Mr. Close: I put it to you that you have had considerable ill-feeling against Mr. Fagan for some time past—that there was ill-feeling over a certain case Mr. Fagan conducted against you?

Witness: I said I was not feeling satisfied at all with Mr. Fagan for taking up a case against me, where he ought to have acted for me, in putting through a transfer and bond. I said he did not act fairly with me when he took up the case against me, and he afterwards said himself he was sorry.

Mr. Close: In that case you were the plaintiff and you withdrew and paid the costs?

Witness: I would not have withdrawn, but I had to go to British East Africa, and my brothers were waiting for me, and I thought I had better pay a couple of pounds rather than postpone my trip.

Jacob Petrus Celliers, the plaintiff, said he was a Councillor of the Somerset West Municipality, and was a valuator to the Divisional Council of Stellenbosch. He had been a Justice of the Peace for some years, and had been in practice as an attorney at Somerset West for some time. He had known the defendant for the last six years. Witness joined Mr. Cairncross in an application made for the unseating of Mr. Fagan as a Councillor of the Somerset Strand Municipality. First of all Mr. Cairncross was alone in the action, but witness was advised that there would have to be a ratepayer joined. Witness was a ratepayer. There was no personalities introduced in the action against Fagan.

The witness was examined as to the contents of a certain letter complained of. He said that the charge of "scurrilous tactics" in the matter of Krynghout v. De Beer were wholly unfounded. He acted in a purely professional capacity. A letter was written by Mr. De Beer in that matter, and witness understood that that was the letter which caused Fagan to use the expression "scurrilous tactics," but witness had nothing to do with that letter. He attached the letter to an affidavit in the case of Krynghout v. De Beer. The application to unseat Fagan came before Mr. Justice Maasdorp. In regard to the matter of Du Plessis v. Arnold, the circumstances were that Mr. Fagan and witness were joint assignees in the estate of Arnold. Witness was administering assignees, and advertised the sale, but on the morning of the sale, Mr. Markotter attached the goods, and afterwards sold them. Witness wrote to Markotter stating that he could not reconcile his action with the fact that his partner, Fagan, was a joint assignee in the estate. On the 1st February, witness heard that certain letters had been read at meetings of the Council. Thereupon witness made inquiries, and he questioned Mr. Van der Merwe and obtained a statement from him. Witness at once wrote to Mr. Fagan, saying he had heard of "the wicked slander." Other statements were made by witnesses to him at the beginning of the present year.

Mr. Benjamin: Do you think that the reading of these letters at the Town Council meetings affected you?

Witness: It has done me a tremendous lot of harm. The effect of a man like Mr. Fagan, who was the Mayor, reading such letters in public, naturally makes the public believe they must be true, I suppose, and somehow it has been spread throughout the whole district. It has spread like wildfire; the whole district knows about it. Proceeding, the witness said he had been authorised by Thounissen to sell certain land which was disposed of to the defendant. There was a good deal of unpleasantness with Fagan with regard to the administration of the Arnold Estate. Witness advertised the sale, but it was withdrawn on a notification received from Fagan, who said Arnold had given him power of attorney to carry the sale out. Immediately afterwards, Fagan proceeded to advertise the property. The slanders had done him a great deal of harm in his business, particularly in a country business which was not only a legal one, but a trust one. A number of clients had gone away from him. The witness went on to explain that the defendant was a much older man than he was, Fagan was a man of some public position, and slanders from him naturally had a great effect. There were many other slanders brought to the notice of witness.

Cross-examined: His connection with the young Du Plessis began in 1902; it was only recently he was connected with the family. With regard to the Du Plessis' transaction, the witness contended that the boom in property had not stopped in May, 1903. In 1903 he believed he made valuations for the Divisional Council, and the transfer which was made in 1906 was on the Divisional Council valuation. With regard to the commission in a sale, it was a simple matter of arrangement whether the buyer paid or not.

The witness was cross-examined as to drawing up no case for counsel's opinion in the matter of Du Plessis. He said he passed the case for opinion, but had not then made a research, and he admitted having made a slip. He did not, he said, suppose at that time that Mr. Fagan was making up a case against him, as he now appeared to have done.

Mr. Close: Is that your suggestion now—that a trap has been laid for you?

Plaintiff: Oh, yes.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Close): What is your charge, in a few words, against Mr. Celliers in respect of that?]

Mr. Close: The charge there is the improper passing of transfer direct to Du Plessis, when, as a fact, he knew of the circumstance that there was an intermediate buyer, and we bring that forward as acting improperly.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you mean he obtained any benefit for himself out of it?]

Mr. Close: I don't know whether he got any benefit himself from it, except the indirect benefit in obliging a client.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You mean he ought to have paid double transfer?]

Mr. Close: We mean he ought to have seen that double transfer was paid, and I say that, for a professional man to act like that, is acting improperly. That is one of our charges.

[De Villiers, C.J.: A professional man can make mistakes. If a mistake was made, it does not necessarily prove that he was assisting in a fraud on the Government. You say it was a fraud on the Government?]

Mr. Close: I say it was a fraud on the Government, and that it was an unprofessional act on the part of an attorney of this court to have allowed it to go through in that way, whatever the motive was.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But supposing it was a purchase by Jardine on behalf of Du Plessis?]

Mr. Close: One can only say the property was actually knocked down to Jardine.

The witness said that if he had seen to a double transfer it would have benefited him. If there were a dishonest motive, one was generally dishonest to make profit. He had made a mistake in passing the case for opinion. The thing was not fresh in his mind at the time, and he should never have passed it.

In the course of further cross-examination, the witness exclaimed heatedly: Mr. Fagan has an insinuation of a dishonest motive for everything I do. No matter how honest my actions may be he ascribes bad motives to them.

Cross-examination continued: Witness had a good deal to do with the affairs of the Du Plessis family. Du Plessis omitted several things from his schedules for which witness might be asked, on the same principle as these questions, to explain.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You say that in the Du Plessis case, knowing there was undue preference, he aided and abetted in it?—That is the charge, is it?]

Mr. Close: Yes, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you say to that, Mr. Celliers?]

The witness said the bank was not his client. He did not know Du Plessis was insolvent or that his affairs were so involved. Until shortly before his insolvency Du Plessis had the name of being a wealthy coloured man in Somerset West. He put through the transfer on instructions. He was not acting for any creditor except the bondholder, and he was convinced that the latter was fully secured.

De Villiers, C.J., said it seemed to him that much time was being wasted. The proper course, he thought, would be for the plaintiff to prove the uttering of the slanders, leaving it to defendant to justify them. Then, perhaps, the plaintiff might be recalled. His lordship added that there was nothing so far to justify the suggestion that the Law Society should take any steps. There might be something still to come, but there was nothing so far. The course which I would suggest and the most reasonable course, I think, is that you should have the right to have the plaintiff recalled for the purpose of cross-examination after you have given your own evidence. That would simplify matters.

Mr. Close: The onus was not put upon us.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It would be much better if the Court first of all decides what were the words actually used by the defendant, and having decided, then it would be much easier to confine the evidence to such points as are relevant. What I would still suggest is this: The witness now should step down—and of course, I do not know whether the plaintiff has any more evidence—then you can give your evidence. Then, if afterwards necessary, he may be recalled for the purpose of further cross-examination by you.]

Mr. Close: I do not know what further evidence my learned friend has to call.

To the Witness: You were practising at Somerset West in 1903, when De Beer came there?—Yes.

And I put it to you, you and De Beer made an agreement about fees on your suggestion?—No.

I put it to you you made an arrangement by which you were to allow each other to charge, and charge in all contested cases two guineas?—There was no such agreement with Mr. De Beer, but we did in certain trial cases, where a number of witnesses were called, agree to charge two guineas for the appearance at court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: For your appearance in court?—For the attorney or the agent in court.]

Was it explained to your client, and did he explain to his client?—That I cannot say.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That, I think, is very improper—not to tell your client beforehand.]

By Mr. Close: In one Faure's case, witness explained the arrangement to him, but Faure objected, and witness refunded a guinea. In case the client won he would not have to pay attorney and client costs, so that it was not, he submitted, a one-sided arrangement. In another case—the case of one Nochomowitz—witness allowed De Beer three guineas for attendance. The case was on three times. The first day it was postponed by consent, the second day evidence was heard, and the third day judgment was given.

Mr. Close: You allowed three guineas instead of 10s. 6d., according to the tariff?

Witness: No; I think it should be £1 11s. 6d. for three days. The witness added that he had not been able to find the papers in the matter, and, therefore, could not recall the circumstances. He did not regard the arrangement as improper.

Re-examined: Mr. Fagan had spoken to him of the smallness of the tariff charge, and had asked him to agree to allow a guinea. That was an arrangement between them.

Mr. Close said his client denied this.

In reply to the Court, Mr. Benjamin said he had other witnesses on the question of justification, but no more witnesses on the defamatory statements.

De Villiers, C.J., said that on the following day the Court would hear the evidence for the defence on the question of justification, reserving the right to the plaintiff to call further evidence on this point.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

The defendant stated that he was a law agent practising at Somerset West. For six years he had been Mayor of the Somerset West Municipality. He started in practice in January, 1906. Formerly he had been in partnership with Mr. De Villiers, who subsequently disappeared, and Mr. Markotter took his place. He denied that he had ever entered into an agreement with regard to the fixing of fees. There had never been an agreement between Celliers and himself, though there might have been one between Celliers and Markotter, but of this witness had no knowledge. Witness and Celliers were appointed trustees in the insolvent estate of A. P. du Plessis, and he formed a very strong opinion as to the conduct of Celliers. As Mayor he had never shared in any profits through Municipal work. That was entirely in the hands of Markotter. With regard to certain transactions, he knew that rumours were going about, and he spoke to Mr. Van der Merwe on the subject. He admitted he lost his temper, and said to Mr. Van der Merwe, in confidence as he thought, that Celliers was a scoundrel: that he had humbugged Mrs. Du Plessis, and would humbug Mrs. Brink. Five minutes afterwards he was sorry for what he had said, but he was angry at the time, and did not think the conversation would be reported. On another occasion, when De Beer told him of what was going on in connection with Municipal matters, he said that if Celliers had done what was said of him he was a low blackguard, and that he should be struck off the roll. He also admitted some of the remarks made by him in conversation with Mr. Van Breda, in connection with election proceedings. He denied, however, that he had ever used a curse word. He had never done so in his life. He had no recollection of having asked for these remarks to be reported to the plaintiff. Witness had absolutely no recollection of the statement deposed to by Mr. Breda relative to wanting to get the estate in his hands. Witness had not told witnesses to convey his statements to Mr. Celliers. He thought he was speaking in confidence to people whom he regarded as intimate friends.

Regarding the letter, the witness said that at the time he wrote it he was very irritated and annoyed at the plaintiff lecturing Mr. Markotter. He was also annoyed by a letter written by the plaintiff, and in answering that letter, witness said that after inquiry he considered that Celliers had charged him with what he (Celliers) knew at the time to be incorrect statements. He called upon Celliers to withdraw what he considered an offensive part of the letter, adding that plaintiff had deliberately tried to confuse two issues by a base attempt to injure him (defendant) in his reputation and character as a business man. The fact that Mr. Celliers had attached to an affidavit a letter reflecting on witness's character was what witness referred to in the letter complained of as "scurrilous tactics."

[De Villiers, C.J.: What part of Cellier's letter to you do you consider "displayed malevolence which made it positively silly?"]

Defendant: Not part of that letter. The letter was a climax. I felt afterwards that I was too angry at the time when I wrote that letter. I have often since felt sorry that I wrote that. There was one thing after the other until I got so sick of it that I wrote that letter.

The witness was further examined regarding correspondence between himself and the plaintiff. He complained that certain letters accused witness's firm of unprofessional conduct. "It made me very angry," said the defendant. "It was really a climax, and I was at the time in a serious state of mind owing to public worries and municipal unpleasantness I had had."

Asked what were his reasons for making the statements in the letter attached to the declaration, the witness said they were the conduct of matters in the cases of Du Plessis and Gordon, and the spying behind his back through Wade, whom witness understood was practically in Cellier's employ at the time. Then he heard of the arrangement with Mr. De Beer, that they should allow each other more. That also was in his mind.

Mr. Close: These things you believed to be true at the time you wrote that letter?

Witness: Oh, yes. I still believe in them, though I am sorry, very sorry, that I expressed it in that manner.

The plaintiff gave further evidence relative to the matters of Arnold and Gordon. He referred in detail to the transaction in respect of the various matters, saying that the parties were illiterate and pliable, and were simply in the hands of their legal advisers.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The gist of your charge in the Du Plessis case is that plaintiff induced Du Plessis to pay more for the property than it was worth?]

Witness: Yes, my lord.

But supposing he believed the property was worth that?—He was acting for Cairncross. But Du Plessis was an ignorant man and could easily be led by his legal advisers. The man had been simply misled—I don't want to use a stronger word—into paying this large sum.

I understand that the gist of that accusation was undue preference?—That was a subsequent matter, my lord. I felt it very much that this poor fellow had been made to pay £900 for property which a few months before was sold for £300. If Du Plessis had been an educated man able to protect himself I would have thought nothing of it. Du Plessis told me he had not even seen the property, that he accepted all Mr. Celliers told him.

Do you consider it humbugging a man to get him to pay a good price for a thing?—When he was acting as legal adviser.

Your suggestion is that he shared in the profits?—I won't say that, my lord, but he could not have done it with an honest intention. If he had sold it for, say, £450, I would have said he got a small profit, but selling on a falling market for £900 what was sold a few months before for £300 seemed to me suspicious.

The witness, in further examination, detailed transactions in respect of the insolvency of young Du Plessis. He felt very strongly for these people, and he regarded the circumstances as suspicious.

"Before this case came on," said the witness, "I did all I could to keep it out of Court. I did everything that a man with a grain of self-respect could do. I went to Mr. Celliers, spoke to him and wrote to him, asking him to allow the past to be buried between us. I wanted both of us to come together and sign a joint document saying that whatever we had said of each other would be withdrawn. But they wanted me on my knees. They wanted an apology such as I could not give as an honourable man. I had it on my mind that these people had been very badly treated, and that their terrible losses were due to these things."

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose you were very much annoyed about the case against you brought by the plaintiff?]

It was prior to that I made these statements.

Before the action?—Yes.

Take what you said to Breda, what justification have you for that?—It was said to me one day that Celliers had given Urtel a month's refusal on property, which was in his hands. He said that the owner would accept £200, and Urtel was to try meanwhile to get more, and share the profits with Celliers. I said I thought it was not a proper thing to do, and to tell Celliers if that becomes public, his name will be struck off the roll. Subsequently, Mr. Urtel said he had forgotten the conversation. In connection with the application to have him unseated, he had been rushed by Mr. Celliers and treated like a criminal. Had he got reasonable time to prepare his case, the letter would never have been heard of. The affidavits of the applicants had lain on the Council table for several days, and he thought it unfair the councillors should have been allowed to read these charges before he had prepared a defence.

Rumours were constantly going about that Messrs. Cairncross, Celliers, and Walker were going to bring further actions against him, that they were not quite done with him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But you are not quite done with him?—I wrote that I wished everything was over between us.

The witness, further examined, stated that the plaintiff had admitted to him that he was in court to assist in the criminal prosecution against the defendant for certain obstruction in the street causing an accident to a cyclist. Witness was placed in the dock with a coloured man. Both were acquitted, and the threatened civil proceedings fell through.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Celliers did not ask a single question in the criminal proceedings, although he sat between the sergeant and Mr. Adams. Witness could not say that Celliers suggested a single question to the police officer. If the plaintiff said he had absolutely nothing to do with the case, witness would rather not contradict him. Although he had the impression that Celliers was interested in the case. Markotter told witness that the plaintiff had approached him with regard to the extra allowance in fees, and when witness heard the conditions, he said he would have nothing to do with it. Witness never saw that letter in reply to that of Markotter. The plaintiff said to Markotter that they must not pursue a cut-throat policy, but charge the same. Witness absolutely declined to have anything to do with the suggestions of the plaintiff to arrange a scale of charges. Mr. Markotter dealt with all municipal work. Witness believed that the plaintiff was acting towards him in spite. When witness spoke to Van der Merwe, he was angry. It never entered his mind that the plaintiff had done anything wrong towards Mrs. Louw. He did not tell De Beer that the plaintiff had humbugged Mrs. Louw.

Upon one occasion you took Mr. De Beer over to Stellenbosch?—He took me over.

Mrs. Louw was interested in that property?—She had nothing to do with it.

Was it not her property?—It stood vested in the name of Arends.

Was she occupying it?—Yes.

If Mr. De Beer says you told him on that occasion that Celliers had humbugged Mrs. Louw, it was not correct?—I have no recollection of it.

Proceeding, the witness said that he believed De Beer was living in dread of the plaintiff, who had on one occasion told De Beer that he had committed perjury in an affidavit.

I suppose you know all ratepayers have a right of access to the municipal books?—I do not believe all of them. I think only the minute-book, and perhaps some other, but not to the private documents of the municipality.

Do you think it would have been necessary for Mr. Celliers to employ a spy for the purpose of obtaining information for him?—If he wanted to do it privately, yes.

Was there any necessity for Celliers to spy upon the municipality?—I think he wanted to work up something against me.

Mr. De Beer says he would have openly shown him the books?—I think he preferred to keep in the background, and let someone else do the work.

Further cross-examined, the witness denied that he had ever specially asked Breda for his business. He might have said he would be glad if Breda would do what he could for the office.

Mr. Benjamin: Now, Mr. Fagan, you say this letter was privileged. But you are aware of the remarks made by Mr. Justice Laurence in the case of Cairncross v. Fagan, when that letter came under his notice? You are aware that his lordship said there was a letter filed which was offensive and abusive, and which ought never to have been put before the Court? And notwithstanding that, you have now put that letter on record, and you say it was privileged?

Defendant: I still look upon it as privileged. It may be abusive, and at the same time it may be privileged.

You know his lordship said it was deplorable that such a letter had been filed, and notwithstanding his remarks, you still persist in putting it on the record and making it a public document?

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is annexed to make it public.]

Defendant: That is what I say. You (plaintiff) make it a public thing, not I.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Besides, the judge did not say it was not privileged.]

Defendant: No; that is my point. It may be abusive, and it may still be privileged. The witness added that the letter was filed in reference to an application for extension, and he wanted to show the Court the friction that there was.

H 1

Counsel proceeded to read certain letters.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why do you read these?]

Mr. Benjamin: I read them to show the malice on the defendant's part.

Defendant: It is generally known there was friction between us; very serious friction, I am sorry to say.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is it necessary for your case to read all this?]

Mr. Benjamin: Well, perhaps not, my lord, but there are one or two letters I would like specially to draw attention to.

Mr. Benjamin (to witness): I put it to you, Mr. Fagan, that you came into Court to-day to justify yourself on all these various defamatory statements on the sole ground that you had got rumours from people here and there, and you believed them?

Defendant: No, no, no, Mr. Benjamin. There are the documents.

Re-examined by Mr. Close: He had never had any arrangement with another practitioner with a view to charging above the tariff fees.

Servas Daniel Faure, general dealer, of Somerset Strand, said that Mr. Celliers acted for him as his attorney in a case against a Mrs. Haupt in 1905. In August of that year, plaintiff forwarded him a bill of costs, in which there was a charge of two guineas for appearance in Court. In January, 1906, Mrs. De Beer's bill of costs was forwarded to him. That contained a similar charge. Witness objected, and a guinea was taken off. Celliers came to him one day a couple of weeks ago, and said he saw witness was going against him. Witness said he did not want to go into Court. Celliers then said, "You must say you are satisfied." Celliers went away saying something about, "he who laughs last laughs longest."

By Mr. Benjamin: What Celliers said was not: "Didn't you tell me at the time you were satisfied?"

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did plaintiff refund you a guinea?]

Witness: No; I thought it was the correct charge at the time. I thought because Mr. Celliers was an attorney he was entitled to two guineas.

Nathan Nochomowitz said he had a case last year in which Mr. Celliers appeared for him. The case was called one day and postponed. It was heard another day, and judgment was given at a later date. The bill of costs had been paid to Celliers.

Counsel explained that this bill had been put in showing a charge by Mr. Celliers of £3 3s.

Witness (to the Chief Justice): I should like to ask you if I can get the five guineas back which I paid Mr. Celliers too much?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did you pay him five guineas too much?]

Witness: Well, according to what I have found out, I have paid five guineas too much.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, you had better consult your attorneys.]

Johannes Jacobus de Beer, law agent, said he practised at Somerset Strand from 1903 until 1905.

Mr. Close asked the witness if any arrangement was made with plaintiff about fees.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is admitted that there was an arrangement about fees.]

Mr. Close: But we say there was a general arrangement.

The witness said that at the end of 1904, Mr. Celliers approached him, and suggested that in contested cases, there being such a lot of work to do, and the statutory fees being so low, they should agree to raise the charge to two guineas. That was in all contested cases. At the time there were no other practitioners there. It was agreed that the bill should not be taxed, but if the clients objected the extra amount should be allowed to fall away. The bills were to be placed before the clients. In February of last year witness was instructed by Warner and Co. to make inquiries as to the position of the younger Du Plessis. It was not the case that plaintiff did not know of Warner and Co.'s matter until April. Witness had correspondence with Celliers about the matter, and had interviewed him about Warner's affair early in March, when Celliers assured him he knew all about Du Plessis's property, and that the bond would amply secure the debt. Mr. Celliers had spoken to witness before the case, and had told him not to say anything about this arrangement in Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How could he be so foolish if he admitted it himself in Court?]

Witness: Well, I have only answered the question.

When he said that to you, you went and repeated it to the defendant?—He saw me talking to the plaintiff, and asked me what he said.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How could he be so foolish when he admits it in court?]

The witness made no reply.

Carel F. Markotter, partner of the defendant, said that Celliers asked him to agree to charge more than the tariff fees in contested cases. Defendant refused to have such an agreement made, when it came to his notice of a charge of a guinea being made by Celliers. The arrangement was never acted upon. Celliers told witness in the first place that there had been such an agreement with De Villiers, witness's predecessor. Witness did not show Fagan the letter from Celliers relating to the arrangement. He for got the letter. Witness only consulted Mr. Fagan in contested Magistrate's Court matters.

By Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Fagan invariably conducted contested cases, but witness did not consult him in uncontested cases. Witness always drew up the bills of costs, as he was better acquainted with the charges than Mr. Fagan was.

Stephanus Abram le Roux, farmer, of Stellenbosch, said that some time last year he undertook to vote for Mr. Fagan in the election of a trustee in the estate of Van der Byl. Celliers afterwards came to see him, and asked for the vote, but witness said he could not break his word. Celliers said he would do better for him than Mr. Fagan.

Mr. Close: Did he remain some time to try and get you to change your vote?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is that a matter to put before the Law Society?]

Mr. Close: It shows "the tactics," my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is merely rivalry; we could spend a month going into these things.]

In cross-examination, the witness said that this had happened after the summons was issued in the present case.

Charlotte Brink, holder of a bond passed in favour of her late husband for £700, stated the plaintiff acted at one time as her attorney, but later the defendant conducted her affairs. In July last the property became much depreciated through a storm. The mortgagor, Mr. Gordon, was repeatedly asking for time in which to pay interest. She was not aware that Gordon had ceded an interest in his parents' estate to the plaintiff. Proceedings were being taken in the matter. The plaintiff told her if she proceeded with the case she was sure to lose. He said he was not accustomed to brag, but when he went to Court he won his cases, and that he had successfully sued Fagan on several occasions, and he would do so again. The plaintiff said he was sorry for witness, as he knew she had lost a lot of money.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: She was friendly with Mrs. Celliers, whom she knew from childhood.

Nicolas Loubser, of Somerset Strand, who was a Councillor in January this year, stated he was present at a meeting between the Town Clerk and the Mayor, when the affidavits were being discussed. The defendant read the affidavits through, and struck out some points, with which Mr. De Beer did not agree. There was no attempt at a suppression of anything in the affidavit.

Robt. Chas. Warner, sole partner in the firm of R. Warner and Co., of Cape Town, stated in February, 1906, he had an account with Du Plessis, jun. In consequence of information he made arrangements for the passing of a covering bond, which was carried through by the plaintiff. He was not satisfied as to the security after he received the bond in consequence of what he was informed. The trustees in the insolvent estate were told to sue him for undue preference, and witness agreed to rank as a concurrent creditor, which resulted in a loss to him. He was informed that Celliers had a lien on the deeds of transfer when he wanted to register the bond. He had to pay ten guineas to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff did not tell him the condition of the estate was a precarious one.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He had been informed the estate would realise fifteen shillings in the £.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is your complaint against the plaintiff?—I say he must have known at the time when he had that bond registered that A. P. du Plessis was insolvent.

Why?—Well, from information conveyed to me.

By whom?—By Fagan.

Mr. Close said this was all the evidence except on the Du Plessis matter, and he would suggest that this matter should stand over until the Du Plessis trial was actually decided.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You had better finish your evidence.]

Mr. Close said after the expression of opinion of the Court in the matter of Du Plessis, he did not propose to call witnesses.

Mr. Benjamin then called

Wm. Fredk. Urtel, farmer, who said the plaintiff had been his attorney for a number of years. In 1903 he had a conversation with the plaintiff with regard to the sale of certain erven of Theunissen. Witness had a verbal refusal from the plaintiff, but he could not state the amount. Witness tried to obtain a refusal from the plaintiff. He had no arrangement with plaintiff by which he was to share the profits.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Witness did not offer the property to the defendant for £300. The defendant did not buy through witness. Witness had the refusal of the ground.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Whatever you said to Fagan, did Celliers ever offer you land he had for sale on condition you shared in the profits?—No.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think you admitted in cross-examination that in July, 1896, you took an underhand cession of Gordon's claim upon his parents' estate?]

Witness: It was not really so much a claim on his parents' estate as some money out of his parents' estate which was in the hands of Messrs. Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller for investment. The estate was administered about 15 years ago, I think, and it was really funds out of the estate in the hands of Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller for investment.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What was the security for? Was it for money to be advanced, or an old debt?]

It was a covering security for past and future advances. On the 1st July, Gordon owed me about £74, and he got further advances from me after the 1st July, which brought his total indebtedness to £221. On account of the debt of £74 I received, a few days after the 1st July, £14 10s. from Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller. That reduced his indebtedness about the 1st July to about £60. Part of the balance I lent him to pay Mrs. Brink.

The £74 you received for past debts?—That was owing to me.

In whose favour was the bond passed?—Mrs. Brink.

When was the bond passed in her favour?—I should explain first of all that Mrs. Brink held two bonds, one passed in 1903 for £700, which represented the full purchase price of some erven, and at the beginning of 1905 an additional security bond was passed to Mrs. Brink for £700.

When did insolvency take place?—In September, 1906. I should like to mention one matter in connection with that and that is the last advance I made to Gordon was £21 to pay Mrs. Brink's interest. This was given shortly before his insolvency. Gordon told me that he had arranged with Mrs. Brink that if he paid her interest his bond would not be called up. The application for civil imprisonment was dropped by consent between Mr. Fagan and myself.

Mr. Close said that the Magistrate suggested that the man should surrender his estate for the benefit of his creditors.]

Witness: That is not so. I said that if the man cannot get time to pay his debt he will certainly not go to prison, but will surrender his estate.

Mr. Benjamin said that the onus rested upon the plaintiff, in the first place, of proving publication of the various defamatory statements. If the plaintiff satisfied the Court on that point, then the defence, as he understood it, would be either that the statements were true and for the public benefit, or that they were privileged. The former line had only been taken in one case, viz., that of Van der Merwe. In all the other cases, the position taken up by defendant was solely one of privilege. On the question of privilege, counsel cited Odgers, p. 275, and said his submission would be that if the occasions were privileged, there was malice on the part of defendant, and, further, that the communication was so irrelevant to the circumstances of the case as not to be protected by privilege. On the question of malice, he cited Odgers, pp. 309 and 313. The dictation to the defendant's typist, Anna Hansen, was, he contended, not privileged. Counsel cited Palmer v. Hill (1892, Q.B.D., 524) and Odgers, p. 174. As to the publication to the Municipal Council, the meeting may have been privileged, but the communication was of such a nature, and so irrelevant to the occasion, that it was not protected. The mere words alone showed malice. The letter was in no way material to the affidavit submitted by defendant in connection with the proceedings on motion.

De Villiers, C.J., on the question of publication to a shorthand clerk or typist, drew counsel's attention to Edmondson v. Birch (1907, 1 K.B.D., 371). He added that he should like counsel for plaintiff for the present to address himself to plaintiff's conduct in regard to the agreement as to fees—whether that would not justify a great deal that was said by defendant.

Mr. Benjamin said he could not justify that at all. But this was not the proper way in which the matter should have been brought up. A notice ought to have been sent to the Law Society, and the plaintiff's conduct ought to have been brought before the Supreme Court in the ordinary way. Counsel called attention to the exaggerated language employed by defendant in his letter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The result on people who heard that letter read would be that they would say the man who had written that letter has lost his temper and he does not know what he is writing about. I do not say that is an excuse.]

Mr. Benjamin said there was no doubt that plaintiff suffered very seriously in his business and profession on account of the defendant's statements.

Mr. Close said that defendant stood before the Court to justify the statements he had made in respect of the slanders which were alleged against him. Counsel referred to the attempts which were made to settle this matter out of court. Proceeding, he urged that on the occasions when he made the statements, defendant referred to matters at least one or two of which had been conclusively proved to be true, and with regard to others, he had had very serious grounds for making the statements he did make. In regard to the letter, three publications were alleged, viz., in the Council meeting, to the typist, and to certain persons outside (the Hofmeyrs). The Hofmeyrs had not been called, so that that part of the case fell away. As to the annexation of the letter to the affidavit, counsel said that Odgers (p. 216) said that every affidavit sworn in the course of judicial proceedings was privileged.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is not the affidavit but the letter that is relied upon by the plaintiff.]

Mr. Close: But the letter is annexed to the affidavit, and, therefore, forms part of it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The libel is not the framing of the affidavit, but for showing a certain letter to divers persons.]

Mr. Close went on to say that the Town Council and Mr. Fagan, as Mayor, were joined as respondents in certain proceedings, and it would be his duty to consult with the Town Council as to their defence. The confidential relationship existed between defendant and the Council of co-respondents. There was a qualified privilege by reason of common interest (Odgers at pp. 220 and 253 quoted.) Defendant thought in these proceedings that he was being rushed, and, rightly or wrongly, he thought he should explain to his co-respondents why he was being rushed. On that application an extension of time was granted by the Court. Counsel quoted from the judgments of Lawrence and Maasdorp, J.J., in the case of Cairncross and Another v. Fagan. The publication of the letter to the typist was privileged. Dealing with the questions of fact, counsel referred at some length to the correspondence which had passed between the parties, and said that the only libellous clause in the letter relied upon by plaintiff was that in which defendant said: "My opinion is that some of your tactics are disgraceful and dishonouring to your profession."

[De Villiers, C.J.: What were the disgraceful tactics?]

Mr. Close: The arrangement with De Beer.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you suggest seriously that that was in Fagan's mind when he wrote that letter?]

Mr. Close: Yes, my lord. Mr. Fagan is making a general summary of the situation there. Counsel went on to contend that the plaintiff had in certain two cases heard in the Magistrate's Court, charged excessive fees. On those cases the defendant was justified in accusing plaintiff of disgraceful tactics in a professional sense. Plaintiff had not alleged, in reply to defendant's plea of privilege, that defendant was guilty of express malice. Counsel entered into a detailed examination of the various acts which defendant relied upon as justifying his allegations against plaintiff, and submitted that in any event plaintiff was only entitled to very nominal damages.

Mr. Benjamin quoted Diepenaar v. Human (1878, Buch., 140).

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant two sums of £1,000 respectively as damages for certain defamatory words written and spoken of and concerning the plaintiff by the defendant. The first occasion on which the defamatory words are alleged to have been uttered was at a meeting of the Council of the Municipality (Somerset West Strand), when a certain letter which defendant had written to plaintiff was read. But it would appear from the evidence of Mr. Van der Merwe himself, who gave evidence on this point, that the letter was read in connection with certain proceedings having reference to the motion for the removal of defendant from the Council. In that motion the Council had been made respondent together with defendant, and, if it were for the defendant to refer to any correspondence which had passed between him and plaintiff in the affidavit, then the presumption of the existence of an animus injurandi would be rebutted by the circumstances under which such correspondence was communicated. It is true that if the plaintiff could prove, independently of the words used, that the defendant was influenced by motives of malice, he could not take advantage of the privilege, but I am not satisfied that such malice did in fact influence him. I find that the letter was referred to in the affidavit for the purpose of showing that the case was being hurried on by the applicant in that particular case, that the defendant wished for further time, and that he wished to satisfy the Court that it was to some extent a personal matter between the parties, and that the applicant in that case was not solely actuated by public motives in proceeding against him. I quite agree with what the learned Judge said in the original case that a letter of that kind ought not to have been inserted, that it was not really relevant to the suit, but defendant at the time that this letter was read, and when it was annexed to the affidavit must have thought it was relevant, and I am not prepared to hold that there was necessarily proof of malice on the part of the defendant in reading this letter with the notice of motion at the Council meeting, nor am I prepared to say that, if I held that there was malice, it would have induced me to add to the amount of damages which I consider ought to be awarded. I may make this further remark upon this part of the case, that I do not consider, seeing that the communication to the Council would be privileged, that the employment of a clerk by the defendant for the purpose of typing the letter was necessarily such a publication as would render him liable. It was in the ordinary course of business that he employed the clerk, he did not do so with the object of publishing to her specially the contents of the letter, and as the occasion on which this statement was made to the Council was privileged I consider that privilege must also embrace the communication to the clerk, for the purpose of type-writing the letter for the information of the Council. If the circumstances under which the letter was read to the Council were sufficient to rebut the existence of animus injurandi on the defendant's part in so reading it, they could equally rebut the existence of animus injurandi on his part in causing the letter to be type-written for the purpose of being so read. Coming then to the next charge, that refers to communications made to one

Carl Johannes Petrus van der Merwe, on the 31st December, 1906, and counsel for the defendant has contended that that was also a privileged communication. In my opinion, it was a wholly unprivileged communication. It so happened that Van der Merwe was also a member of the Town Council, but these words were not uttered to him for the purpose of that particular lawsuit in which the Council was made co-respondent with defendant, but for the purpose, as I take it, of venting his indignation and bad opinion of the plaintiff, and it was a wholly unnecessary statement, there was no privilege surrounding that statement, and if the statement was made, and if the statement was false, the defendant is clearly liable. Now, substantially, the words used were these: "I can tell you that Celliers is one of the biggest scoundrels. He humbugged Mrs. Louw, and he would have humbugged Mrs. Brink out of £300 if it was not for me, and you can tell him so from me." The defendant says that Mrs. Du Plessis was mentioned, not Mrs. Louw. Well, he may have thought so, he may have intended to mention Mrs. Du Plessis, and I do not think he deliberately swears what is not true when he now says he never mentioned Mrs. Du Plessis, but I consider that he was mistaken, that Mr. Van der Merwe had an accurate recollection of what took place, and that he was right as to the use of these words. No proof whatever has been given that on any occasion the plaintiff has deceived Mrs. Louw at all. An attempt was made to show that he had deceived Mrs. Du Plessis; as far as I can see, the receipt was in the nature of an alleged undue preference. Now, I consider it a somewhat unfair proceeding to drag this matter of Du Plessis into the matter at all, because it is a matter in which an action is still to be brought, as I understand, for undue preference against the plaintiff, and it should be left out of the consideration of this case. And the same remark applies to the evidence given regarding the plaintiff's dealings with Mrs. Brink. That also forms the subject of an action for undue preference, for which I understand the defendant himself is engaged as legal adviser, and I think it would have been well to have kept that matter out of this case altogether. I consider, therefore, that this was a defamatory statement made by the defendant of the plaintiff, for which there is no justification whatever, and for which the defendant is liable in damages. The same remark applies to the statements which were made by the defendant to Mr. De Beer on two occasions. There substantially the words mentioned in the declaration were used by the defendant, and for these words also he should be held liable in damages. Then, with regard to the statements which were made to Mr. Van Breda, I am satisfied that Mr. Van Breda's memory is perfectly accurate, and that the charge was made by the defendant "that a certain man had written to Celliers he must sell certain erven for him at not less than a certain price, and thereupon Celliers went to Urtel and said, 'See this fellow wishes to sell these erven. This is his lowest price. You buy the erven now, and again sell them, and let us divide the profit.' Now, what do you think of a man who can act in such a way?" Now, what was intended by such words? He may well ask what he thought of a man who could act in such a way, because if he had acted in such a way he would have been nothing short of a scoundrel. If these words had been used, defendant must prove the truth of them. He cannot say, "I heard them from Urtel, and, therefore, I was justified in using them." He must not only prove that he heard these words from Urtel, but he must prove that the words were true. He did not attempt to call Urtel to prove that the words were true. He had no right to say that of any man without proving the truth, and he has not attempted to prove the truth. But Urtel was in court, and was called on behalf of the plaintiff, and he, it is true, says, "I don't remember it," but it is quite enough for the plaintiff's case, because it is for the defendant to prove that the words were used, and if the man who gave the information to the defendant cannot remember it, it is quite enough for the plaintiff's case. The defendant has wholly failed to prove justification with regard to these words. I cannot for one moment accept the proposition that, because statements are made at election time, any slander or defamation may be uttered in regard to the private character of people whom you are speaking of. Therefore, upon all the grounds except the first, the plaintiff would be entitled to damages. Under ordinary circumstances, I should have given very heavy damages indeed. Every attempt to rake up all the past history of the man on every little point has been made, but there is certainly one very serious allegation that has been made against plaintiff, and which has been proved against him, and that is the allegation that he, an attorney of the Supreme Court, had made a private arrangement with a gentleman acting as an agent in the Magistrate's Court that, in contested cases in which the two should be on opposite sides, they should not object to the opponent, if the opponent should be the winning party, charging two guineas in every contested case. It appears to me that an arrangement of this kind would entirely defeat the object of the law. It would entirely defeat the provision of the law that costs shall be subject to taxation. If such arrangements were to be generally made between attorneys of the Supreme Court, I think it would be the grossest injustice to clients generally, and it becomes still worse when that practice is adopted in regard to cases in the Magistrates' Courts, because there you have poor people engaged in law, people who know very little of their rights, and who unreservedly accept statements made by their legal advisers as to the amounts which they should be liable to pay. These poor people engaged in the Magistrate's Court should be specially protected against any attempt of this kind to fleece them out of their rights, and I consider it a very serious reflection upon the plaintiff that he should have entered into any arrangement of this kind, and because of that the damages are reduced to the very lowest sum which I can possibly award under the circumstances. But for that fact, I should have been quite prepared to award the full sum of £1,000 damages in this case. But I can well understand that the defendant himself may have strongly disapproved of such an arrangement, unless it is clear, as the plaintiff wished to prove, that the defendant had been party to such an arrangement. I am not satisfied that the defendant was aware that any such arrangement had been made between his partner and the plaintiff. If that had been a standing arrangement, I should have thought there would have been more than the one case that has been brought before the Court, and in which the whole of the bill of costs is entirely in the handwriting of the defendant's partner at that time, De Villiers, and, at all events, it is clear that, as soon as Markotter, the defendant's partner, brought it to the knowledge of the defendant, that some such arrangement existed, or was desired, he at once repudiated it. Then a letter was written in answer to which the plaintiff stated that such an arrangement had previously existed, and that the suggestion to make such an arrangement had come from the defendant himself, but I am not quite satisfied that the plaintiff is right there, because, whatever may be said regarding the defendant in this matter, I think he has shown that he has a keen sense of honour in his business transactions. He seems to be a man who suffers from great nervous irritability, and he took over statements made which he ought not to have taken offence at. The judgment of the Court is, therefore, for the plaintiff for £50 damages, with costs, not including the costs of the witnesses J. J. de Beer, Nathan Machonowitz, and Servaas Faure. Their expenses must be paid by the plaintiff, because they are witnesses who came to prove the conduct of the plaintiff.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLAY.]

GODDESS V. PIENAAR. { 1907.
 { June 6th.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment, under Rule 319, in default of plea, for £158, for certain four wagons supplied, and £3 for hire of a store.

Dr. Greer (for defendant) applied for removal of bar and leave to plead.

From the affidavits, it appeared that applicant had recently come up from the country, and had been confined to the Monte Rosa Hospital, receiving his discharge on Tuesday, the 4th June. Respondent had commenced an action against him to recover £158 for certain four wagons and £3 hire of stores, and, after certain correspondence between the attorneys, the defendant had been barred from pleading. Respondent's attorneys took up the attitude that the applicant's attorneys were sufficiently posted in the case to have filed plea. Applicant's attorneys, however, said that that was not so, and that they had been unable to obtain instructions from their client while he was confined to the hospital. Respondent did not now object to applicant being allowed to plead, but urged that he should be put to terms, so that the case could be brought to trial this term.

Dr. Greer submitted that defendant had been unreasonably barred, and that the other side ought to pay wasted costs.

Mr. Roux submitted that, as the delay had been occasioned by the defendant, and plaintiff had acted quite regularly, the plaintiff was entitled to wasted costs.

Hopley, J.: As a rule, when a defendant gets leave to purge default, and has been in default without a genuine excuse, the Court makes the defendant pay the wasted costs. But there are special circumstances in this case, and circumstances such as a very little inquiry or a very little courtesy between the attorneys would have shown to exist. If Messrs. Van der Byl and De Villiers (the plaintiff's attorneys) had approached the defendant's attorneys in a somewhat less peremptory spirit than their first letter on the subject shows, I dare say they would have got the information that his doctor had ordered Mr. Pienaar not to attend to business while he was in hospital, and then all these complications would have been avoided, and they could have waited until the defendant was out of hospital. As a matter of fact, they put the defendant's attorneys in such a position that it was very difficult for them to act. On the one hand, they had the doctor's orders that defendant must not attend to business while in the hospital, and on the other hand, they had the plaintiff's attorneys assuming that they (defendant's attorneys) knew all about the case for the purposes of their plea, because they had in February communicated with them about the matter. Although they had communicated with them in February, it does not follow that they had necessary and final instructions as to everything that ought to be said in a plea. The plaintiff's attorneys might have been a little more patient in the circumstances than they have been. At the same time, not wishing to make the plaintiff lose the costs in consequence, I think that the matter will be fairly dealt with by making the costs costs in the cause, so that the party who is eventually proved to be in the wrong will have to pay them. Leave will be granted to purge default, defendant's plea and counter-claim must be filed on or before Thursday next, and costs will be costs in the cause.

DU TOIT V. VOORTMAN AND ANOTHER.

This was an application on notice to Henry Voortman and the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Humansdorp, calling upon them to show cause why the first respondent should not be removed from office as joint trustee of the insolvent estate of Frederick May, and why one Percy R. Stapleton should not be appointed sole trustee of the said estate.

It appeared that a majority in number of the creditors were in favour of the appointment of Mr. Stapleton as sole trustee, but that, on the debts admitted by the Magistrate, creditors representing the greater value were in favour of Mr. Voortman. Under the circumstances, the Magistrate had appointed the two candidates as joint trustees. The grounds of the present application were that a claim for interest on an open account by one Collin ought not to have been allowed, and that a claim by one R. W. Metelerkamp should have been admitted. In either event the majority in value would then have been in favour of Mr. Stapleton, as well as the majority in number.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for respondent Voortman. The second respondent did not appear.

Dr. Greer referred to section 40 of Ordinance 6, 1843, and cited Graham and Ozer v. Caldecott (1876 Buch., 4) and In re K. (3 Menzies, 258). Dealing with the facts of the present case, he said that Collin claimed on an open account an amount of £201, on which he charged £72 interest, making a total of £273 12s. 9d. An allowance of £2 6s. was made by the Magistrate in respect of interest, and after other allowances had been made, the debt was reduced to £251, of which about £70 was represented by interest. Counsel submitted that the Magistrate was wrong in allowing any interest to be charged on an open account.

[Hopley, J.: There may have been a contract.]

Dr. Greer said it did not appear that there was an agreement, and it was against custom to allow interest on an open account. He quoted Henderson and Co. v. Haslitt (9 H.C., 178).

[Hopley, J.: I must assume at present that the Magistrate was right in accepting the proof of debt.]

Dr. Greer submitted that the Court could review the decision of the Magistrate on this point.

Hopley, J., said he did not know how he could decide the point without evidence.

Dr. Greer, in further argument, cited Hofmeyr and Co. v. Effendi (7 S.C., 102).

Hopley, J., said that the whole point in the case was whether, by the customs of trade in the district of Humansdorp, there was an implied contract on every purchaser at a shop to pay interest on the account after a certain period.

Dr. Greer then dealt with the other part of the case. He submitted that the Magistrate ought to have admitted the claim of £67 7s. 11d. filed by Metelerkamp for money which he advanced to pay a certain account on behalf of the insolvent. He cited Jeanneret v. Estate Sharp (22 S.C., 42), and Zondagh v. Fichat (12 C.T.R., 590). In any case, he submitted that on the authorities the Magistrate was wrong in appointing these two gentlemen joint trustees. He should have appointed provisional trustees.

Mr. Jones admitted that if either of the two claims in question had been decided as applicant contended, there would have been a majority of creditors, both in number and value, in favour of Stapleton. As to Collins's account, there was a custom in Humansdorp to charge interest after six months on overdue accounts. That custom was recognised by the Court in Fraser v. Vorden and Co. (2 Menzies, 212).

[Hopley, J.: The part of the case that troubles me most is whether there has been an election at all.]

Mr. Jones said that if the Court ordered another election, the result would probably be a deadlock. He suggested that, to save expense, the Court should at once appoint Voortman and Stapleton as joint provisional trustees, with power to liquidate the estate.

Dr. Greer said that, although he was not specially instructed, he would, in the circumstances, be prepared to consent to an order in those terms.

Hopley, J.: In this matter the applicant, who is a creditor for a small amount in the insolvent estate of one May, gives notice that this Court is to be moved for an order declaring the election of Voortman as a joint trustee in the insolvent estate invalid, and declaring one Stapleton elected as sole trustee. Stapleton is a clerk, though not an articulated clerk, any longer, in the office of the applicant, Du Toit, who is an attorney at Humansdorp. The grounds on which he wished the Court to make the order are that the Magistrate, sitting as commissioner in the insolvent estate, improperly and unlawfully allowed an amount of £69 odd claimed by one Collin as interest in an open account, and also that he improperly disallowed a claim by one Metelerkamp for £67 odd. If he had allowed Metelerkamp's claim, or if he had disallowed the claim of Collin for interest, then, in either event, Stapleton would have been supported by a majority in value as well as in number of the creditors who voted, and, if he had taken the applicant's view of both those amounts, so much more would Stapleton have been supported by the larger value. But the Magistrate did allow the claim for interest, and he did reject the claim of Metelerkamp, and it is impossible for me, in the information before me, to say that the Magistrate was wrong in so doing in either case. As to the interest, it seems to me that it must be a matter of what was the contract between May and the shopkeeper Collin. That must depend upon local custom and implied contract. There is strong evidence that it is the universal custom in the district of Humansdorp on accounts which run over a long period that interest at the rate of 8 per cent. should be charged after six months. This account had extended over some years. If that is the custom, I do not see that the Magistrate went wrong in assuming that the custom applied in the case of May just as it did in everybody else's. With regard to the other amount of £67 claimed by the father-in-law of May on his estate, the Magistrate took certain evidence and decided that, as matters then stood before him, that claim was one that he must disallow. It is said that this Court now knows more than the Magistrate did. I do not think that on that ground I ought to disturb the Magistrate's decision. Probably there are circumstances of suspicion and of some complication. The Magistrate has decided against that claim, and I do not see that I know enough of the circumstances that I can with safety say that the Magistrate was wrong. Then the further question arises, if that is so, and Mr. Voortman had the larger value and Mr. Stapleton had the larger number of creditors, what course should have been taken under section 40 of the Ordinance, which says that the choice of trustee shall be made by the greater part in number and value of the creditors. Now that has not been done in this case. The Magistrate himself says that one man had the greater number and the other had the greater value, so that he declared them jointly elected, but it is perfectly clear from the terms of the Ordinance and previously decided cases that he had not the right to do that. Although the matter does not come before me on an application to set aside the election, it seems, on the authorities quoted, and especially the case of Graham and Ozer v. Caldecott, that the Court should now make an order declaring the election of both as trustees null and void, and setting such election aside. The Court will, therefore, order that the election of both these gentlemen, Stapleton and Voortman, be set aside as null and void, not having complied with section 40 of the Ordinance. But counsel suggest that the Court should save further expense and also avoid the complications that are certain to arise under a deadlock, if this matter is remitted for election to the Magistrate, by at once appointing these gentlemen as provisional trustees of the estate, with power to liquidate it, and I think that, on the whole, in this small estate, that would be the wiser course. The Court will, therefore, order that Mr. Stapleton and Mr. Voortman be provisional trustees, with power to liquidate this estate and wind it up, and the costs of all these proceedings must come out of the estate.

Court for the sum of £13 6s. 1d., being certain costs and charges incurred in an application brought by respondent against the applicant. Applicant, counsel said, originally sued respondent for a judicial separation, and, in default, a judicial separation was granted, with custody of the children to the wife, and an order to pay £3 a month. Respondent had made no payments under that order, with the exception of a few small payments for the children. Subsequently he applied to the Court to set aside the order, so far as custody of the children was concerned. The Court, however, refused that application, and ordered respondent (the then applicant) to pay the costs. He had, however, failed to pay any portion of the costs.

Respondent said that he was without means. He was employed as a van conductor by a firm of bakers at £2 a week. He had made certain payments on behalf of his children.

Cross-examined: Witness had paid nothing to his wife under the contribution order. He was prepared to offer 2s. 6d. a week towards the debt.

By the Court: He regularly set aside a certain sum each week for the children. He had given them boots and clothing.

Decree granted, execution to be suspended upon payment of 5s. a week, first payment to be made on Monday afternoon next, with leave to applicant to apply for an increased order.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

CAPE TIMES LTD., V. CRANE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £451 5s. 6d., balance of account due for printing the "South African Magazine," with interest a tempore morae and costs. Counsel stated that the summons was issued against Charles H. Crane and Eric France, carrying on business in partnership as proprietors of the "South African Magazine." Mr. Crane did not enter appearance. France represented that he was not a partner, and after declaration had been filed, that position was accepted, and as against France, plaintiffs did not proceed with the case. Judgment was asked as against Crane only. Mr. Bisset added, however, that in face of the decision in Dunell, Ebdern and Co. v. Hassett and Co. (18 H.C., 135), he did not think he could ask for judgment against Crane individually.

[Hopley, J.: Does Crane admit that France was not his partner?]

Mr. Bisset said he was not instructed on that point. As a matter of fact, Crane did not take up any position at all.

SUPREME COURT

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY]

ADMISSION. } 1907.
 } June 7th.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the admission of Eric Edward Jarvis as an attorney and notary.

Application granted and oaths administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SIERADZKI V. BENJAMIN.

Dr. Greer moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Final order granted.

BRIMACOMBE V. BRIMACOMBE.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for a decree of civil imprisonment against defendant upon an unsatisfied writ of this [Hopley, J.: You have summoned the partnership, and the partnership has not taken any notice of it. Crane might have said that, in not entering appearance, he knew there was no partnership. I am wishful to help you, but I must stick to the Rules of Court, and I do not see how the man is in default individually on that summons. You had better obtain some consent from Crane.]

Mr. Bisset said that if fresh service was necessary, it would only mean multiplying costs, and Crane knew perfectly well the nature of the claim.

Eventually the matter was ordered to stand over, and plaintiffs were granted leave to amend their summons, by inserting after "carrying on business in co-partnership, etc.," the words "and also against them individually."

Hopley, J., said that the plaintiffs might perhaps be able to obtain a consent from Crane to judgment being taken against him in that form.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte DE WIT.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved, on the petition of Susanna de Wit, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent her son, J. J. F. de Wit, of Riversdale, in proceedings to have him declared of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his own affairs. Application was made for leave to have the curator's report set out in writing, and evidence as to insanity given on affidavit. Counsel asked the Court to make an order similar to that granted in Van der Vyver's case (15, C.T.R., 1,007).

Ordered that a commission issue to inquire into the sanity of the alleged lunatic De Wit, Mr. Roux (Magistrate of Riversdale) appointed curator ad litem, summons returnable on the 9th July, with leave to give evidence by affidavit, if advisable, and curator to report in writing instead of being personally present on return day.

Ex parte MOLLER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Van der Byl moved, on the petition of certain major children of the late Gerrit Hendrik Moller, and his surviving spouse, for an order authorising the Board of Executors, as trustees under the ante-nuptial contract, to pay out certain money to the major children and to the minors on attaining their respective majorities. It appeared that the late Mr. Moller died in April last, and that the only asset was an insurance policy for £500. The proceeds of the policy, amounting to £1,177 8s. 4d., had been paid over to the trustees, and, after their disbursements and various charges, as set out in the account annexed to the petition, had been met, a balance remained of £596 13s. 11d., which petitioners desired should be distributed among the children in pro rata shares. It seemed that in October, 1893, the Court had "authorised the trustees to raise on the policy such moneys as may be required for the purpose of paying the school fees of petitioners and their brothers and sisters as they became due, and the amount of premiums and fines on the policy not exceeding £200 in all." If the balance of the proceeds were invested, the income would be inadequate to maintain the widow, and petitioners therefore prayed for an order authorising the money to be paid out to them, their mother having renounced her life interest and they having undertaken to maintain her.

Hopley, J., said that the trustees seemed to have infringed the former order of the Court, and to have exceeded the authority granted to them to the extent of about £380. However, the probability was that they did it for the purpose of preserving the policy, although it would have been better if they had come to the Court to ask for further powers.

Ordered that the Board of Executors may pay out to the petitioners and also their major sister, Sophia Moller, their pro rata share of the said sum of £596 13s. 11d., or whatever other balance there may be in their hands, and to the said minor children their shares upon their attaining their respective majorities.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

Ex parte LA COMPAGNIE S 1907. COMMERCIALE DES COLONIES (June 10th).

Mr. Benjamin moved for the appointment of J. M. P. Muirhead as curator bonis in the insolvent estate of Abraham Elias Levy, carrying on business in Strand-street, Cape Town, as a retail dealer in paints, wall papers, etc. Petitioners said that the estate was provisionally sequestrated on the 8th June, and that they had a claim for £1,936 out of total liabilities amounting to £1,976. It would be in the interests of the creditors that the business should be carried on without interruption, and petitioners prayed for the appointment of a curator bonis, with power to collect outstanding assets and carry on the business. Counsel said that the Master declined to appoint a curator.

[Maasdorp, J.: The only difficulty in this case is, what does the insolvent say to the proposal? His estate may not be finally adjudicated.]

Mr. Benjamin: A provisional order has been made, and the business will be closed unless a curator be appointed.

[Maasdorp, J.: It would be advisable in these cases to have the opinion of the insolvent. He may have some objection to his business being carried on by some person who does not understand it.]

Mr. Benjamin said he understood that the insolvent and his clerk had agreed to assist in carrying on the business in the interim.

Mr. Muirhead was appointed curator bonis, with power to collect outstanding assets and carry on the business, security to be given to the satisfaction of the Master.

Ex parte ESTATE KOSSUTH.

Mr. De Villiers moved, on the petition of G. W. Steytler, secretary of the Colonial Orphan Chamber, in his capacity as executor dative of the estate of the late Henry Kossuth, for a rule interdicting one Madam Dorothy Weber from removing certain furniture and other goods from the premises, Rhine Villa, Kloof-street, Cape Town, pending an action to be brought by petitioner for rent. Petitioner said that respondent owed the estate a sum of £125, for rent from the 1st August, 1906, to the 31st May, 1907, and he feared that unless an interdict were granted the goods in the premises would be removed, and the landlord's hypothec would be defeated.

Order granted, with leave to respondent to move the Court to set aside the rule.

Mr. De Villiers asked that the Court should grant an order with costs.

Maasdorp, J.: You may ask for the costs in the action, or, if no action is brought, you may move for costs afterwards. It may appear that respondent had no intention of removing the goods.

RIEGLER V. AFRICAN LANDS AND HOTELS, LTD.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Cape Town in an action brought by appellant against respondents, who are proprietors of the Mount Nelson Hotel, to recover three weeks' wages as waiter.

From the record it appeared that appellant had been engaged as a waiter at the Mount Nelson Hotel, under contract in Europe for a period of two years, and that he had recently left the defendants' service prior to the completion of the agreement. The agreement made certain provisions in case plaintiff left his employers' service before the contract time expired, for the retention of certain money from his wages, and for the refund of the passage money paid by the defendants in case he left before the end of the contract.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that on the 11th April, 1907, the same parties were before him in a case in which plaintiff sued for £13 10s., wages for the quarter ended 24th March, 1907. Defendants admitted the amount claimed, less £3 7s. 6d. retention money, under clause 4, and pleaded a counter claim for £10 10s., refund of passage money, under clause 12. Judgment was entered for plaintiff for the amount admitted, and absolution from the instance given on the counter-claim. After plaintiff had left the defendants' service of his own accord on the 17th April, at the expiration of a month's notice, he instituted the action now in appeal on the 22nd April for £2 5s., three weeks' wages from the 25th March to the 17th April. The defendants counter-claimed for 10 guineas, refund of passage money, less £2 7s. 3d., wages due to plaintiff in terms of the contract. Plaintiff denied the counter-claim, and excepted to the jurisdiction, and submitted that, in terms of the contract, all matters in dispute must be settled by arbitration, under the laws of Cape Colony. The Magistrate overruled the exception, on the ground that, having chosen the Court as his forum, in a previous action, and also in this action; plaintiff could not now raise this objection. Judgment was given for defendants (plaintiffs in reconvention) for £8 2s. 9d., with costs, being the difference between the counter-claim for ten guineas and £2 7s. 3d., admitted by defendants to be due to plaintiff.

Mr. Rowson was for appellant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondents.

Mr. Rowson submitted that the Magistrate should have allowed the exception to his jurisdiction under the 12th clause of the contract. No litigant, by having chosen a certain forum, could confer jurisdiction on a Court. Counsel cited Harris v. Broman (7 Juta, 41). As to the 5th clause, no consideration was given, and that clause was utterly illegal, and such as no Court in the world would uphold. It was a pity that no evidence was given as to the reason why plaintiff left the Mount Nelson Hotel. He thought it would be found that he was bound to go, largely by reason of the persecution of his immediate superiors, and therefore did not leave of his own accord.

Mr. Benjamin said that the contract provided that all matters in dispute between the parties should be referred to arbitration. It was difficult, however, to see that there really was any dispute. Furthermore, plaintiff had chosen his forum, and had waived his privilege of arbitration under the 12th clause.

Maasdorp. J.: It appears that the plaintiff in this case entered the defendant's service as waiter for a period of two years, to commence from the 31st July, 1906, and it was one of the conditions of the agreement that, if he should leave the service of the defendant before the expiration of the two years, the passage money should be refunded by him to the defendant. It appears that he left the service of the defendant on the 16th April, 1907, of his own accord, and in order to better himself. The clause providing for the return of the passage money has, therefore, come into operation. The plaintiff sues the defendant for the sum of £2 7s. 3d., for the last three weeks' wages due up to the 16th April, 1907. That indebtedness is admitted by the defendant, but the defendant now claims that he is entitled to set off against it the amount of the passage money, which plaintiff is bound to repay under clause 3 of the agreement. When the case came on for trial, the plaintiff excepted to the defendant's claim being brought in the Magistrate's Court, on the ground that there was a clause in the agreement providing for the reference of all disputes between the parties to arbitration. Now, without expressing any opinion as to whether that clause would have ousted the Magistrate's jurisdiction, I think the Magistrate is right in finding that, when the plaintiff himself chooses his tribunal in the Magistrate's Court for asserting his claim for wages, he could not then take advantage of the arbitration clause mentioned in the agreement, and the defendant was entitled to set off against any claim the plaintiff may have under the agreement such claim as the defendant may consider he is entitled to. The Magistrate was, therefore, right in dismissing that exception. There is some reference made to another clause in the agreement dealing with the retention money, but that is not now before the Court. It is quite clear that wages to the amount of £2 7s. 3d. were due by defendant to plaintiff, as admitted by defendant, and, on the other hand, it is quite clear that the passage money must now be refunded by the plaintiff to the defendant. The Magistrate has found that, under the circumstances, the sum of £8 2s. 9d. remains due upon the defendant's claim in reconvention. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

NEWMAN V. PHILLIPS. { 1907.
June 10th.
July 10th.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Mount Fletcher.

The present respondent sued appellant in the Magistrate's Court for the sum of £1 10s. 7d. In the summons it was alleged that on the 4th October, 1906, the defendant signed a promissory note in plaintiff's favour for £60, payable on the 4th June. Plaintiff discounted this note with the Standard Bank, who thereupon became the legal holders. Defendant omitted to provide for the payment of the £60 on the due date, and thereupon the bank incurred certain charges in connection with the presentation of the note, these being debited to the plaintiff's account. Defendant, on being called upon, tendered the £60, but refused to pay these charges. The £1 10s. 7d. consisted of the bank's notary's charges, overdue interest, and legal expenses. The defendant, in his plea, denied liability, and counter-claimed £15 7s. 7½d. for goods and cash supplied, and accommodation furnished to Phillips between September, 1906, and March, 1907. The Magistrate gave judgment for the £1 10s. 7d., and for the defendant (Newman) on the counter-claim for £15 7s. 7½d., and ordered each party to pay his own costs. There was a cross-appeal. The parties had formerly been in partnership.

In reply to the Court, it was stated that the cross-appeal had been withdrawn.

It appeared from the evidence that the promissory note was given in respect of a dissolution settlement. Newman's case was that it was agreed that the note should not be discounted, it having been given as an acknowledgment of a debt due by one Morgan to the partnership, which it was agreed should be paid to Phillips.

The Magistrate, in his reasons, said there was nothing on the promissory note to show that it should not be discounted or dealt with in the usual way by the plaintiff.

Mr. Watermeyer was for the appellant; Mr. Gutsche was for the respondent.

Mr. Watermeyer submitted it was clear on the facts that it was agreed that the note should not be discounted. The Magistrate had given no finding of fact upon this point, and so the Court was in quite as good a position as the Magistrate to decide on this. Counsel referred to Rule of Court 304 to show the legal charges, and to section 50 of the Bill of Exchange Act. Counsel dealt in detail with the several charges, contending that if the note were given as a promissory note in the ordinary form, appellant was only liable on certain of the items. He urged, however, that this was not given as a promissory note. It was conditional upon Morgan not paying, and was meant to be an acknowledgment of debt contingent upon Morgan not paying.

Mr. Gutsche contended that even if there were such a verbal agreement as was set up it could be of no force in law since the parties had reduced their agreement to a written document which did not contain such a condition as was set up. Oral evidence could not in these circumstances be held to vary a written agreement. Counsel cited Tarry and Co. v. South-West Diamond Mining Co. (2 H.C., 39), Simpson, N. O., v. Frank and Nicholls (2 E.D.C., 195), Griqualand West Diamond Mining Co. v. London and South-Eastern Exploration Co. (1 Appeal Cases, 240).

Mr. Watermeyer, in his reply, quoted Stephen on Evidence (section 90), Bills of Exchange Act (section 19, sub-section a), Byles on Bills (16th ed., p. 113), and Phipson on Evidence (3rd ed., p. 520).

Maasdorp, J., said the Court could not deal with this case until the Magistrate's finding had been ascertained. The matter would therefore be referred to the Magistrate for his finding upon the following question of fact: Was there any agreement apart from what appears upon the face of the note that the note should not be discounted by Phillips?

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (July 10th).

Maasdorp, J.: In October, 1906, Phillips, the plaintiff, and Newman, the defendant in the Court below, dissolved partnership, and at the time of the dissolution one Morgan was indebted to the partnership in a sum of about £120. This amount the plaintiff wished to treat as a bad debt, but the defendant objected, and claimed to be allowed credit for half the amount. The plaintiff consented to this, upon condition that the defendant should pass a promissory note in his favour for half the amount, payable in three months' time, in the event of Morgan's debt not being paid. If Morgan paid his debt in three months, the promissory note was to be returned; if Morgan failed to pay, the promissory note should become payable by the defendant. It was stated in evidence on behalf of the defendant that it was agreed that in the meanwhile the promissory note should not be discounted by the plaintiff, but this was denied by the plaintiff's witnesses. The Magistrate did not, in the reasons for his judgment, state his finding upon this issue of fact, and the case was, after argument on appeal, referred back to him for that purpose. He now says: "There was a verbal agreement not to discount the note, but that agreement was not reduced to writing, except in so far as there is a statement in the account that a promissory note for £100 should not be discounted, and plaintiff's attorney admits that this promissory note should have been for £60." The Magistrate has therefore found in favour of the defendant upon this issue. The whole question of consideration for the note is involved in this issue of fact between the parties, and could not upon the question of consideration be excluded as inadmissible. If Morgan had paid his debt within three months nothing would have been due from the defendant to the plaintiff. During the three months there was virtually nothing due by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the promissory note amounted to nothing more than a security for the payment of Morgan's debt. Before the expiration of the three months the plaintiff was not entitled to negotiate the note, irrespective of any agreement between the parties, but the agreement not to discount made their position quite clear. It was arranged that defendant should be informed of the fact in the event of Morgan paying his debt. This debt was not paid upon the due date of the note, and it then appeared that the note had been already discounted at the bank. The bank being the holder of the note, employed a notary to make presentation for payment at the bank where the note was payable, to note the non-payment, and give notices to the plaintiff and defendant as endorser and maker. The defendant, upon receiving notice, paid the amount of the note at once, but refused to pay the expenses occasioned by reason of the note having been discounted at the bank. At the time the defendant paid the amount of the note, he refused to pay the notary's expenses, because he alleged that the note only became payable upon his receiving notice from the plaintiff that he had not recovered from Morgan. This allegation is admitted by the plaintiff's manager, who says, "In the event of Morgan failing to pay Phillips, Newman was to pay Phillips out the amount for which he had been paid, i.e., £60 promissory note, for which he had received credit, but he adds there was no stipulation that the defendant should be informed if Morgan did not pay. It is clear as between the plaintiff and defendant that the promissory note became payable at the bank in case Morgan did not pay, and it was only after the notary's expenses had been incurred by the bank, as admitted by the plaintiff's manager, namely, on the 7th January, that he informed the defendant that Morgan had not paid the debt. The defendant thereupon offered to pay the amount of the note, which was accepted by the bank, but he refused to pay the notarial costs. The bank as holder of the note might have insisted upon the payment of these costs, but the plaintiff having paid them is, in my opinion, not entitled to recover costs, which would

Hopley, J.: I cannot, in this case, follow the reasons of the Magistrate, or his way of reading the evidence. Both in the case now under consideration and in the previous case between the same parties which has been put into Court the plaintiff has told a consistent story throughout, viz., that his aunt had sold him half her erf in Bredasdorp for £15. There may have been some dispute as to whether she had sold him the undivided share of the erf so as to make it possible for him to claim the half with the buildings on it, or the half with out buildings, but it seems that some sale of the half share of the erf for £15 had been made, and that an agreement was subsequently made by the purchaser to cancel that sale, and that he was to receive £5 for doing so. It seems to me that whatever the exact agreement was about the portion of ground sold there was a complete contract of sale to which the respondent could be held bound, and from which in the circumstances she was subsequently convinced that it would be advisable to be freed; and that £5 was the amount fixed as the price for getting out of it. As far as I can follow the evidence, I cannot see that it was agreed there, that she should not sell save by public auction, or that only after the auction took place she should hand £5 to plaintiff, and that in case no sale by auction should take place she should not be compelled to pay the £5 at all. That is what the Magistrate finds, but I cannot find anything in the evidence to support that view. Mr. Taillard states it was agreed that the sale should be cancelled, and £5 be paid to the plaintiff, and he said he would give it to plaintiff when the place had been sold, but there is no evidence to show that it was portion of the agreement that plaintiff was not to be paid

Dr. Greer submitted that in giving judgment as he did, the Magistrate erred. He seemed to think that the action was brought for damages for breach of contract. Apparently that was not so, because it was an action until after the auction. The facts show that an auction was attempted, but that the respondent had fixed so high a reserve price that no sale resulted. The appellant was not compelled to wait any longer for his money, and therefore I think that the judgment should have been for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, £5. I cannot understand how the Magistrate came to any other conclusion, or how he arrived at the result that the appellant was entitled to a shilling as damages for a "technical breach of contract," as stated by him in his reasons. Either there was an amount of £5 due under the agreement, or else there was no breach and nothing at all was due. The Magistrate's judgment must be set aside, the appeal allowed with costs, and the judgment of the Court below changed to one for the plaintiff for £5 with costs.

CROSS V. PURCELL.

This was an appeal from the decision of the R.M., Paarl, dismissing an action in which Peter Murray Cross, a tailor, residing at the Paarl, sought to recover £4 from one Purcell, also of the Paarl, for breach of contract.

It was alleged that the defendant ordered a suit of clothes from the plaintiff, for which he agreed to pay £4. When the suit was ready to be tried on, the defendant refused to do so or to take delivery. For the defence in the Court below, it was alleged that the order for the suit was cancelled, as the plaintiff had not complied with the conditions of the agreement on which the suit was ordered. This was denied by appellant.

The Magistrate, in giving judgment for defendant, gave as his reasons that the plaintiff's evidence was vague and unreliable, whilst his witnesses were very unsatisfactory. On the other hand, the defendant's evidence was reliable and given without hesitation.

Mr. Murray Bissett for appellant (plaintiff in the Court below), and Mr. Marais for respondent.

Mr. Bissett contended that probably the Magistrate had been taken in by the straightforward manner of the defendant, and went on to contend that it was hardly likely that plaintiff's assistants would have committed perjury for the sake of such a small amount as that involved.

[Hopley, J.: Magistrates are generally experienced men, who can usually sum up character.]

Continuing, Mr. Bissett contended that the defendant's evidence seemed to be somewhat embellished, especially in that portion where he stated that when he cancelled the order he was laughed at by plaintiff's assistants.

[Hopley, J.: One knows that when a man is disappointed he often behaves in a manner that is ludicrous to on-lookers, and, after all, these assistants were only apprentices.]

Mr. Marais contended that when the plaintiff was not ready to fit the suit on, the specified day that the defendant was justified in cancelling the order.

Mr. Bissett contended that it was not absolutely necessary to try on clothes. They knew of people who got their suits out from England, and ladies got their dresses from Paris, all of which were satisfactory.

Hopley, J.: The Magistrate has found that there was a contract between the appellant and the respondent, whereby the respondent ordered a suit of clothes to be ready for trying on on the 2nd of April, and to be ready at all hazards on the 6th April. The Magistrate has found that on the 2nd April, when the defendant went into the shop, he found the piece of cloth from which the suit was to be made still lying in the window, uncut, and that after handling it, he inquired why things had not gone further. That in response to his inquiries, he was informed that the master had gone home indisposed, and that he then verbally cancelled the order. I cannot say, on the evidence as one reads it, that there is not sufficient to support the Magistrate's finding on that point, but the question is if the defendant did so what are the rights of the parties, what should have happened? The appellant's point of view is that the suit was ordered from him, and that he has it now ready for fitting on, and that if the respondent would try it on he could finish it off in a very short time; but if the Magistrate's finding is correct, that the suit was wanted for April 6th, it is futile for the appellant to say that in the month of May it is only ready for a try on. When the respondent cancelled the order the appellant might have said: "You cannot cancel it; although it is not ready for a try on now, we will have it ready by April 6th, and will keep you to your bargain." He did not take that course, but on the contrary allowed the customer to leave the shop, and it is in evidence that the latter ordered a suit from another tailor close by, which corroborates his evidence that he did then and there cancel, because it is not likely that he would leave an order for one suit of clothes in abeyance and order another, he probably not being a person who would order two suits at the same time. After the cancellation nothing happened for ten days or a fortnight, and then, as the respondent was passing the tailor's shop, the appellant beckoned to him, but said nothing. This was extraordinary, and it is contradicted by the respondent. I feel that the course of conduct pursued by the parties affords a considerable justification for the Magistrate's finding as to the cancellation of the contract on April 2nd. The Magistrate adds that possibly the appellant might have brought an action for damages for breach of contract, but that point does not seem to have occurred to him, for the appellant went on making the suit of clothes after the cancellation had taken place, instead of stopping the work when the order was cancelled. It is now urged, however, that the Magistrate should have given some damages for the breach of contract by the cancellation of the order on April 2nd, but there is no evidence of any damage to the appellant by reason of such cancellation, and I do not see how the Magistrate, even if he had held that the cancellation was unjustifiable, could have found any damages for the appellant. On the whole of the evidence, I cannot say that the Magistrate is wrong. There is a great deal to be said as to the weight of evidence, and the conflict of evidence, but the Magistrate has made his decision, and I cannot disturb it. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

INSOLVENT ESTATE OF VAN } 1907.
DEN HEEVER V. GREYLING. } June 11th.
" 12th.
" 18th.

Cession of Inheritance as security for debt—Notice by cessionary to cedent's debtor—Bona fide payment to cedent—How far cession avails as against cedent.

G. and his wife were married in community and had 3 children. Mrs. G. died intestate. G. took out letters of administration and liquidated his wife's estate but failed to bring up in the liquidation one farm part of joint estate in which Mrs. van den Heever, his daughter, had an interest. Mrs. van den Heever thereupon became indebted to one Hunt, to whom she ceded all rights in her share of her maternal inheritance as security for all debts then owing by her, or in future to be incurred to Hunt. Hunt informed G. by letter, that he (Hunt) held Mrs. v. d. H.'s power of attorney and requested that all payments in connection with her property should be made to him: but he did not give notice of the cession: G. however admitted that he had knowledge of it. G. thereafter paid out to Mrs. v. d. Heever what she claimed from her maternal inheritance, and she gave him an acquittance in full. Thereafter she became insolvent and Hunt ceded his rights in her estate to her trustee. The trustee now sued G. for the full value of the whole of the inheritance.

Held that, as G. was aware of the cession from Mrs. v. d. H. to Hunt, the payment made by G. to her was bad.

Held further, that the cession to Hunt was good only for the amount of the cedent's debt to him and the trustee was entitled to recover the amount.

Held further that, by the full acquittance given by her to G. previous to her insolvency with notice to the cessionary of the transaction, the balance of her inheritance vested in him.

This was an action to compel an executor dative to file an account in the estate for which he was acting, and to pay over the share of one of the heirs, or (failing compliance) to pay the value of the said share de bonis propriis. Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

The plaintiff is Gideon Stephanus Cloete, in his capacity as the sole trustee of the insolvent estate of Maria Johanna Elizabeth van den Heever (born Greyling), and the defendant is Arnoldus Jacobus Greyling, in his capacity as executor dative of the estate of his late wife Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling (born Vorster), and also in his private capacity.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows: (1) The plaintiff is the sole trustee duly appointed of the insolvent estate of Maria Johanna Elizabeth van den Heever (born Greyling), married without community of property to Johannes Daniel van den Heever, of Lady Grey, in the district of Aliwal North. The said estate was finally adjudicated as insolvent by order of this honourable Court, on or about the 9th day of August, 1906. (2) The defendant resides at Lady Grey aforesaid, and is sued individually and in his capacity as executor dative duly appointed of the estate of the late Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling (born Vorster), to whom he was married in community of property, and is the father of the said insolvent Maria Johanna Elizabeth van den Heever, born of the said marriage. (3) By the mutual last will and testament, dated the 18th November, 1872, and codicil thereto, dated the 13th June, 1887, of Arnoldus Jacobus Greyling, senior (the father of the defendant), who died on the 20th day of July, 1887, and his spouse Magdel Maria Greyling, who died on the 18th day of March, 1903, there was bequeathed inter alia to the defendant subject to the usufruct thereof for life of the survivor, the said Magdel Maria Greyling, and to certain conditions unnecessary to be here set out, certain one-fourth share of the farm Honings Nest Kloof, situate in the division of Barkly East. (4) The said Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling (born Vorster), died intestate on the 12th day of August, 1888, leaving issue of the said marriage, her surviving, namely, the said insolvent and Schalk Willem Greyling. (5) At the date of her said death and at all times material, there had vested in the said Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling (born Vorster) by virtue of the said community of property the legal right in and to one-half of the said legacy and the said insolvent as one of the heirs ab intestato is entitled to one-half of the said half of the said legacy. (6) The defendant individually received transfer of the said one-quarter share of the said farm so bequeathed from the estate of the said Arnoldus Jacobus Greyling, senior, by deed of transfer dated the 29th day of December, 1904. (7) Thereafter on or about the 22nd day of November, 1905, the said insolvent for valuable consideration ceded by cession in writing of the said date as security for the due payment of certain legal costs and charges to one Clifford Athol Hunt all her right, title, and interest in and to the said half of the said one-half share of the said legacy. (8) The said legal costs and charges have not been duly paid or at all and the said Hunt having claimed and been duly admitted to prove upon the said insolvent estate for the amount thereof, to wit, £37 3s. 5d., did on the 14th day of January, 1907, and under and in accordance with the provisions of section 30 of the Insolvent Ordinance No. 6 of 1843, cede and transfer all his right, title, and interest in the said cession to the plaintiff in his said capacity. The defendant has had at all times material full legal notice and knowledge of the said cessions. (9) The defendant in his said capacity as executor, filed with the Master of this honourable Court a certain account in the estate of the late Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling (born Vorster) termed "First and Final Liquidation Account," on the 12th of February, 1890, which account is dated 31st January, 1890, but has not brought up therein or in any account of the said estate the said share of the said farm due to the said estate nor framed a distribution account showing the share in the said farm due to the insolvent, nor has he transferred the same to the said estate nor accounted thereto or to the said Hunt for the same.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims: (a) An order compelling the defendant in his said capacity to file an account with the Master of this honourable Court in the said estate of the late Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling (born Vorster), and to bring up therein the true and proper value of the share of the said farm due to the said estate and to show in a distribution account the true and proper value of the share of the same due to the said insolvent. (b) An order compelling defendant in his said capacity to pay over to the plaintiff in his said capacity the duly ascertained value of the said insolvent's share in the said farm. (c) Failing compliance with prayer (b), that the defendant be ordered to pay over the value of the said share ascertained as aforesaid to the plaintiff in his said capacity de bonis propriis. (d) Alternative relief. (e) Costs of suit against the defendant individually and in his said capacity.

Section 8 of the declaration was amended to read as follows: The said legal costs and charges have not been duly paid or at all, and the plaintiff, in order to render the said inheritance available for the benefit of the estate, has agreed with the said Hunt to pay the amount of the said costs and charges, to wit, £37 3s. 5d., and the said Hunt, in consideration thereof, did on the 14th day of January, 1907, duly and lawfully cede and transfer all his right, title, and interest in the said cession to the plaintiff in his said capacity. The defendant has at all times material had full, legal notice and knowledge of the said cessions.

The defendant's plea was as follows: (1) The defendant admits paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 6 of the declaration. (2) He also admits paragraph 4 thereof, save that he says there were three children, and not two as stated in the declaration. (3) He admits paragraph 5, save that he says the said insolvent is no longer entitled to her share of the said legacy, as will more fully appear hereinafter. (4) As to paragraph 7, the defendant says that, save that he received a letter from one R. G. Atwell, of Lady Grey, dated the 7th of June, 1906, informing him of the alleged cession, he does not admit allegations in the said paragraph contained, and puts the plaintiff to the proof thereof. (5) As to the amended paragraph 8 the defendant says that, save as aforesaid he has no knowledge of the allegations therein contained, nor has he had due notice of the said cessations. He says, moreover, that even if the said Hunt did cede his rights under the said cession to the plaintiff, as alleged, the said Hunt has not proved his claim against the said insolvent estate, and the plaintiff had no right under the circumstances to take cession from the said Hunt of any rights the latter may have had to the property in question. Section 30 of the Insolvent Ordinance does not apply to the circumstances alleged, and the plaintiff has no locus standi herein. (6) The defendant admits paragraph 9 of the declaration, but says that prior to the 23rd of May, 1906, he paid out for the said insolvent the sum of £133 3s. to settle certain moneys then due by her, and in consideration of the said payment the said insolvent, on or about the 23rd of May, 1906, entered into a certain deed whereby she acknowledged having received value for the share of Honing's Nest Kloof due to her by the estate of her late grandfather, and renounced any further right to the said farm. (7) The defendant says, in further reference to the said paragraph that it was not until 1904 that he received his quarter share of the said farm, and as so long a time had elapsed since the death of his first wife, the said Rachel Alida Elizabeth Greyling, he was not aware of the necessity for filing such an account as is referred to, but he subsequently paid out both the said insolvent (as already stated) and also his son, Schalk William Greyling, in cash, which they accepted in lieu of the shares of the said farm due to them, and for which the defendant holds their receipts and acquittances. (8) Subject to the above, the defendant is willing to file with the Master of this Honourable Court, if the said Master deems it necessary, an account containing the particulars referred to in the plaintiff's claim, but the defendant contends that for the reasons above given he has discharged the obligation resting upon him in respect of the said insolvent's claim to the said inheritance. Wherefore, the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. Upton) for the plaintiff. Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Pohl) for the defendant.

David Ross, clerk in the employ of Mr. Attwell, attorney, of Lady Grey, said that formerly he was in the employ of Mr. Hunt, attorney, of Somerset East. Mrs. Van den Heever instructed Mr. Hunt to obtain from defendant her share of the inheritance. Witness drew up a deed of cession on Mr. Hunt's instructions, whereby Mrs. Van den Heever agreed to cede her share in the inheritance in consideration of legal costs and disbursements. The witness deposed to interviews with Mrs. Van den Heever and to other matters. He stated that he posted a letter on November 25, 1905, to the defendant, notifying him of the cession. The letter was never returned. He was not sure that he press-copied the letter; it was usual in the office to do so. He was, however, certain he sent the letter. In May of this year he saw defendant at Lady Grey, and the latter admitted having received the notice. The letter-book was now in the possession of his former employer, Mr. Hunt. The witness gave evidence as to further correspondence, and as to an interview between the attorneys and the parties, at which Greyling agreed to pay to Mrs. Van den Heever her share of the inheritance at the rate of £1 14s. per morgen for 66 morgen.

Gideon Stephanus Cloete, attorney, of Lady Grey, said he was the sole trustee in the insolvent estate of Mrs. Van den Heever. The assets realised about £57 and the liabilities were £232. He saw defendant early in May, 1906, when the defendant told him he had had notice of the cession to Hunt. Witness warned defendant to pay the inheritance to Hunt.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Mrs. Greyling paid £133 in satisfaction of a debt in respect of which a writ had been issued against the goods of Mrs. Van den Heever. Witness paid Hunt, and the cession was made over to witness as trustee.

John D. van den Heever, husband of the insolvent, also gave evidence for the plaintiff. He admitted that Mrs. Greyling paid the £133 to satisfy the writ against his wife, but he said Mr. Greyling owed her £182, with costs. That was what witness calculated as her share of the inheritance.

In reply to the Court, witness said he advised his wife to accept £120 and £100 loan in settlement of the £182. He offered Greyling to accept this. It was not the case that the goods were sold to Greyling for £120. It was not explained to witness or his wife that the document given to Mr. Hunt was a cession.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

Arnoldus Jacobus Greyling, the defendant, was called. He said he was bequeathed a fourth part of the farm in question by his father, subject to his stepmother's life interest. When witness's wife died he did not bring up the half-share of his interest in the farm in the accounts in his wife's intestate estate, because his attorney told him that the share in the farm did not accrue to him until after his stepmother's death. Before his stepmother died he sold his interest in the farm to his brother, and passed transfer to him after his stepmother's death in 1903. He did not then pay over the part his children were entitled to because he did not understand the position. He did not know they were entitled to any part. In 1905 Van den Heever said his wife had a claim. Witness was willing to give Van den Heever £1 a morgen, which was the price at which he sold the farm to his brother. He never received the letter said to have been written by Ross in November, 1905, notifying the cession to Hunt.

Mr. Ross was recalled and questioned as to the omission from Mr. Hunt's bill of costs of a charge for the letter which he stated was written on the 25th November, 1905, notifying defendant of the cession. He said that Mr. Hunt's practice was to charge two letters together if written on the same day and relative to the same matter. In this instance a letter was written to defendant on the previous day, and as notice of the cession should have been included in that letter, no charge was made for the supplementary letter on the 25th November.

Mr. Buchanan argued that the cession to Hunt was an out-and-out cession, that all power went out of the cedent and vested in the cessionary, and that therefore no transaction in respect of the inheritance could take place except with the cessionary. What took place between Mrs. Van den Heever and Greyling could not, therefore, bind the inheritance. Counsel quoted the cases of Wellsaar v. General Assurance Company (3 Juta, 86), Trautman v. Imperial Insurance Company (12 S.C.R., 38), Van der Byl v. Findlay and Kihn (9 Juta, 178).

Maasdorp, J., said he would take it that all the rights were in Hunt and none in the insolvent estate.

Mr. Buchanan said that this was so until the 14th January, 1907, when Hunt ceded his rights to the insolvent estate. They were at present in the insolvent estate.

[Maasdorp, J.: But before they got there, was there not some one else who had a right?]

Mr. Buchanan said he would submit that that could not be taken into account, because it was a transaction between the executor—who had knowledge of the cession at the time—and the cedent, from whom the rights had gone out with regard to the matter. It was a transaction behind the back of the cessionary. Counsel quoted Burge, vol. 3, p. 548, and Voet, 8, 4, 16, and 17.

Maasdorp, J., said it came back to the point whether at the time the trustee sought to get the cession ceded to him, the cessionary ought not to say that he had notice before insolvency that it was ceded to someone else.

Mr. Buchanan said the point was whether at that time there could be a valid cession of the same thing when all the rights had gone out of the cedent to the cessionary.

Mr. Burton contended that in the particular form of action now brought the trustee of the insolvent estate had no locus standi. Independently of Hunt's position, the cession could not be regarded as an asset by the trustee, since the debt due to the insolvent by the defendant, as executor of his wife's estate, had been discharged before insolvency, and bona fide discharged, and the insolvent had given an acquittance. Counsel quoted the case of Fryer v. Farquhar's Trustee (1879, Buchanan, 226), and referred to the 30th section of the Insolvent Ordinance. As to the point whether the insolvent estate could claim the balance due under the cession after satisfaction of Hunt's claim, he submitted that in those circumstances the estate would be receiving the money twice, for before insolvency Mrs. Van den Heever, than whom the trustee could have no greater rights, had already received the money from the defendant. Plaintiff had no right to take the cession from Hunt. There was no asset against Greyling; he had paid. Counsel urged, further, that there was no proof of notice of the cession having been given by Hunt to Greyling.

Mr. Buchanan, in reply, referred to section 33 of Ordinance 104 of 1833, and to section 1 of Act 14 of 1864.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (June 18th).

Maasdorp, J.: The defendant, who is the executor of the estate of his late wife, Rachel Greyling, admits that in November, 1905, his daughter Maria was entitled as an heir ab intestato to one-third of her mother's share of the joint estate of the executor and his wife. That estate was duly liquidated, with the exception of a portion of the farm Honings Nest Kloof, which had been bequeathed to the defendant by his parents, and the defendant admits that in November, 1905, his daughter Maria was still entitled to receive from him in his capacity of executor one-third of half the value of such portion of the farm. In November, 1905, Maria van den Heever had become indebted to Hunt, an attorney at law, in certain sums of money for professional services rendered by him in endeavouring to recover her inheritance from the defendant, and it was contemplated that further costs would be incurred for the same purpose. On the 22nd day of November, 1905, Mrs. Van den Heever entered into a written agreement with Hunt, wherein, after reciting her indebtedness and her right of inheritance, she cedes, assigns, and sets over to Hunt her right to the inheritance for security of the debt already incurred and any future debts. On the

thing until a delivery remains the possessor and proprietor of it, as has been established in another place; so, until the assignee notifies the debtor of the assignment made to him, the assignor is not divested of the credit which he assigns." I mention this to emphasise the difference in our law, as it is laid down in Voet (18, 4, 15) where he says: "Certainly our modern practice, with respect to the transfer of actions, has established the view that all the rights of the transferor are extinguished by the transfer, and that thenceforth only the transferee, not the transferor can enforce the claim against an unwilling debtor, even though no notice may have yet been given by the transferee to the debtor that he is not to pay the transferor; but that a debtor who, being ignorant of the transfer, pays the transferor is entirely discharged, though it is not so if he has received notice to the contrary from the transferee." And Voet repeats this view in the 17th section of this title. But Sande lays it down that it is not only express notice by the cessionary that places it out of the power of the debtor to settle with the cedent, but also knowledge of the cession on the part of the debtor, however he may have acquired such knowledge. Sande, in his treatise on the Cession of Actions (chapter xii, sec. 19), comes to this conclusion, after reviewing the authorities and decided cases upon this point. Voet (18.4.15) somewhat modifies this opinion by saying "Indeed, even though notice should not yet have been given by the cessionary, if the debtor was not ignorant of the sale and cession of the debt, he cannot effectually enter into a compromise with the cedent, but there is nothing to prevent his making a bona fide payment to the cedent, and thus being released from the debt; inasmuch as he pays the person to whom he is bound, and he ought not to be prejudiced, previous to notice, by the act of a third party, and the cessionary has only himself to blame if he suffers loss the gist of Voet's modification of Sande's view of the law lies in the words bona fide. It is quite conceivable that there may be circumstances under which a bona fide payment may be made by a debtor who has received no notice, but has knowledge of a cession, but undoubtedly under ordinary circumstances such a payment could hardly be bona fide. In view of the correspondence put in, I am of opinion that no express notice of cession was given by Hunt to the defendant, and particularly with reference to the letters of the 6th of April and the 7th of June, in the first of which Hunt informs the defendant's attorney that no interview with himself was necessary, as Fichet had been engaged by Mrs. Van der Heever to recover the inheritance, and in the second notice is given of the cession in terms which imply that there had been no previous notice. Had it not been for the candid admission of the defendant himself, I should have had doubts whether he had actual knowledge of the cession, but his admission is in terms so explicit that it cannot be explained away. Defendant did undoubtedly speak of the letter of the 24th of November, which contains no notice of cession, as the one in which he was informed of the cession, but in my opinion he associates knowledge otherwise acquired by him with this letter. However, his evidence is too clear to be misunderstood where he says, "when on the 23rd of May I asked Fichat, 'What must I do with that thing of Hunt's,' I was referring to the cession of Hunt's." And again he says, "I got the document of security because I knew of Hunt's cession." I therefore come to the conclusion that although no express notice was given by Hunt to the defendant, the defendant was well aware on the 23rd May that Mrs. Van den Heever had ceded to Hunt her inheritance in her mother's estate. On the 23rd of May the defendant paid out to Mrs. Van den Heever what she claimed from the estate, and received an acquittance from her, and a promise to pledge certain goods as security in case Hunt should make a claim upon him. This is what the transaction, in fact, amounted to, notwithstanding the form of the documents put in evidence. The defendant, having knowledge of Hunt's cession, could not prejudice his rights by the payment to Mrs. Van den Heever, but on the other hand, Mrs. Van den Heever had every right to cede to the defendant any moneys she would ultimately become entitled to when Hunt's debt was satisfied, and a balance remained over to be repaid to her. This right so ceded would become vested in the defendant, at the time of the cession and not at the time Hunt enforced his claim. The settlement of the 23rd of Van den Heever's claim in so far as it was not prejudicial to Hunt, to a cession to Mrs. Van den Heever's claim of the balance to the defendant. In another view of the case it might be said to be simply a settlement of Mrs. Van den Heever's claim in so far as the executor would have money of hers available after satisfying Hunt. But, technically, the other view would be more correct, since Hunt, although his claim was for a less amount, had cession of the whole inheritance, and could enforce his claim for the whole. And it is only after he recovered the whole, that he became obliged to pay over the balance to Mrs. Van den Heever. Although the balance only then became payable, it was within her power to dispose of and transfer her right to such balance at any time. Hunt, upon recovering the inheritance, was entitled to retain enough to cover his claim, but the rest he would hold as trustee for Mrs. Van den Heever, and the moneys which he might be expected to become possessed of in that way may be the subject of a cession, which would take effect when the cession was made. On the 23rd of May, Mrs. Van den Heever was divested of all claim to the inheritance, and it vested partly in Hunt and partly in the defendant. Upon the insolvency of Mrs. Van den Heever, and when Hunt ceded to the trustee the cession he held, he could cede no more than he was himself entitled to, and, although, technically, as a matter of procedure, he could sue for the whole claim, a portion of it must be taken as vested in the defendant. That portion, which exceeded Hunt's claim, having already vested in the defendant, could not become an asset in the insolvent estate. There is authority for saying (see Sanle 12, 10) that though the debt vested in the cessionary even before notice is given by him, a creditor of the cedent, who before notice procured the attachment of the money in the hands of the debtor is preferred to the cessionary. But whatever the effect of the adjudication of insolvency might be in this respect, there is abundant evidence that Hunt, and, of course, the executor, had express notice of the settlement between Mrs. Van den Heever and the defendant before insolvency. It was contended that the trustee exceeded his powers in taking cession of rights from an outsider, and consequently did not acquire a right upon which he could sue as trustee; but Hunt could hardly be called an outsider, and this claim to the inheritance can hardly be regarded as falling outside the scope of his duties as trustee, because it might well have been that the estate was entitled to some benefit from it after all claims were satisfied. I am of opinion that the trustee is entitled to recover from the defendant what the insolvent owed to Hunt and was ceded by Hunt to him, and no more, amounting to £34 4s. 5d. It appears from the evidence that the defendant, under the belief that he was entitled to do so, has appropriated personally the proceeds of the property in question. Judgment is therefore given against him personally for the amount, and seeing that he is the only person interested in the defence of the action, he is ordered to pay the costs de bonis propriis.

On the application of Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, plaintiff was declared a necessary witness.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

BORCHARD V. DILLON. } 1907
 " June 11th.
 " 25th.

This was an action brought by August Carl Borchard, a wagon builder, residing at Claremont, to recover from Hannah Dillon, of Rondebosch, a Cape cart, or £30 10s. 1d., balance due thereon.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he was a wagon builder residing at Claremont, and the defendant was a domestic servant residing at Rondebosch. In 1905 he sold to John McCreery a Cape cart valued at £60, on an agreement that McCreery was to pay him £30 on account, and while the balance remained due the Cape cart was to remain the property of plaintiff. In January last McCreery disappeared, and on his disappearance from the Cape Peninsula the defendant took possession of the Cape cart, and the balance due had not yet been paid.

The defendant's plea denied the statements made in the plaintiff's declaration, and stated she bought the Cape cart along with other things from McCreery.

Mr. Roux appeared for plaintiff, and Mr. Douglas Buchanan for the defendant.

The plaintiff stated he was a wagon builder, residing at Claremont. He sold a Cape cart to John McCreery for £50, £30 of which was paid down, and an agreement was entered into for the payment of the balance in four months. It was further agreed that the cart should remain the property of witness until the balance was paid off. Witness did other work for McCreery to the extent of £20. McCreery paid him another £15 on account of the cart, and when witness asked for security for the open account, McCreery said, "You can take the £15 off the cart account, and put it to the credit of the open account." Witness saw McCreery very often, but in January last McCreery disappeared, and witness looked for his cart. He found it at Reynolds's store.

Mr. Roux: We are in a peculiar position, my lord; we have just had a telegram from Reynolds, stating he cannot attend the court, as his sister died last night.

Mr. Buchanan: We admit that the cart found at Reynolds's store is the cart in question.

In reply to the Court, witness said he had not entered up the cart transaction in his books.

In cross-examination, witness admitted that a page in the ledger in which McCreery's account was entered had been lost.

Mr. Buchanan: I put it to you that the full amount has been paid, and if page 33 was here it would prove it.

[Hopley, J.: Where is page 33?]

Witness: I cannot say. I bought the book at an auction, and the page must have been out.

Mr. Buchanan: But in the index you have page 33 entered opposite McCreery's name.

In further cross-examination, the witness said he had received altogether £76 6s. from McCreery. McCreery did not sign any agreement authorising witness to place the £15 received on the Cape cart account to the credit of the open account. McCreery promised to make a new agreement, but did not do so. The total amount McCreery owed him was £36 10s. The agreement was that the amount was to be paid in four months, but McCreery told him he could not pay at once, so witness allowed the matter to run on.

Mr. Roux began to explain to the Court his version of the various accounts in the ledger.

When His Lordship said: "Yes, Mr. Roux, you have got it off very glibly, but if these people had set about trying to make a Chinese puzzle, they could not have done better. Someone ought to have written out a copy of this account."

Mr. Roux: My lord, I was—

[Hopley, J.: I do not say you should do it, but it should have been done.]

Mr. Roux: I intend to call Mrs. Borchard who kept the books.

[Hopley, J.: Well, I suppose you will in time, but I do not see that she can do much.]

In re-examination, the witness said that he kept a separate account for every cart or vehicle on which he did work for McCreery.

[Hopley, J.: But where is it? The numbers "one" and "two" seem to have been written in afterwards.]

Mrs. Borchard, wife of the plaintiff, who kept his accounts, explained with much detail how it was that £30 was still due on the purchase price of the cart.

Mr. Buchanan cross-examined the witness at some length, to prove that the cart had been paid for, and that the balance due by McCreery was for other work done by plaintiff.

Mr. Roux closed his case.

Before calling evidence for the defence, Mr. Buchanan applied for absolution from the instance.

Mr. Roux having replied,

The defendant was examined, and stated that McCreery was her second cousin. She came to South Africa about four years ago for her health. In May, 1905, she lent him £50. He went to Ireland, and returned with a cart and started a livery stable. She lent him another £25, and in January, 1906, she gave him another £50 for the things mentioned. She returned them to him, and in January last he gave her possession of the whole thing, as he could not meet the debt he owed her. She had sold the things, but lost money over the deal.

[Hopley, J.: Where did you get the money? Did you save it?]

Witness: No; I had some private means. (Continuing) She knew nothing of the circumstances under which McCreery bought the cart.

In cross-examination, witness said that when she lent McCreery the first lot of money, he was looking after her carts.

[Hopley, J.: When you lent him the first £50, what security did you get?]

Witness: He gave me no security for that amount.

In further cross-examination, the witness said that when she lent McCreery the money, she did not know that he was hard up. The sale of the horses, carts, etc., only realised £90. The horses alone fetched £46.

Hopley, J., said the question he had to consider was whether this man had been paid for the cart or not. He would go into the figures.

Cur. Adr. Fult.

Postea (June 25th).

Hopley, J.: On July 29, 1905, the plaintiff sold a new Cape cart to one McCreery, a cab-driver and carrier, for the sum of £60, of which he received £30 in cash; and he thereupon delivered the cart. The sale was, however, one with a suspensive condition, to wit: that the cart remained the property of the vendor until the full purchase price had been paid, and the delivery was made subject to such condition. The defendant is a cousin of McCreery's. She had come to this country in about 1903, partly in search of health and had brought with her a little money. In May, 1905, McCreery borrowed from her £50, without security, and later in the same year he borrowed two further sums amounting to £25. In January, 1906, he applied for a further loan of £50, and she agreed to lend it to him if he would give her security for the total amount of his indebtedness of £125. This he agreed to do, and he accordingly delivered to her, as in pursuance of a sale by him to her of the said articles, the said cart, together with his other vehicles, horses, and harness. After keeping them for a few days, she handed them back to him for the prosecution of his business. In January, 1907, he told defendant that he was unable to repay her the loan, and he finally handed over to her the said property, which she at once set about realising. She sold the other property, and had handed the Cape cart to an auctioneer for sale, when the plaintiff, learning of what was happening, obtained an interdict to prevent her and the auctioneer from parting with the cart or its proceeds, pending the result of an action which he was bringing to establish his claim thereto. The auctioneer, it appears, disposed of the cart for £24, and the present action is to determine whether plaintiff or defendant is entitled to this amount. The sum total realised by the assets handed over by McCreery to defendant is less than the £125 which he borrowed from her, and it is admitted that she has acted bona fide and in ignorance of the condition under which McCreery had received the cart from plaintiff. Had the sale and delivery of the cart been an isolated transaction between plaintiff and McCreery, and had it been satisfactorily proved by plaintiff that he had received only £30 for the cart, there is no doubt that he would have been entitled to succeed in this action, whatever hardship such a result might have entailed on defendant: but plaintiff, who is a blacksmith and cart builder and trimmer, had, during 1905 and 1906, done considerable work for McCreery, from whom he had received in payment from time to time considerable sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to over £80, and his books show that the account for the cart had been merged in the general account for work and labour. As the payments were made, they do not seem to have been clearly appropriated to any particular account, and the general state of the books, as far as the accounts with McCreery are concerned, does not exhibit either a clear or creditable system of bookkeeping. In so far as the items charged against McCreery and the payments made by him are shown, they appear on pp. 5, 278, 275, 87 of the account book. No reason is given for this dodging about in the book, and there is no possible reason why the accounts should not have been carried forward in an intelligible manner on consecutive folios. In so far as payments are shown, there is considerable force in the contention that if they be attributed to the more onerous debt or to the older debt, then the amount due on the cart would have been paid off before delivery to defendant took place. But beyond this uncertainty there is another very unsatisfactory feature in the plaintiff's case. There is a rough index at the beginning of the book, from which it would appear that McCreery's account should be found on folios 5 and 33. Folio 5 is undoubtedly the one on which the account started, but when folio 33 is sought it is plain that it has been carefully removed from the book. The binding of the book has not come loose, and all the folios are in it save only the pages bearing folios 33 and 34 and folios 37 and 38. These have been carefully removed, and the corresponding portions of the sheets in the book to which they were attached are still in their proper places—e.g., 33-34 were attached to 51-52, which are in their proper place. No explanation of this has been given, and in the circumstances it is a very suspicious feature in the case. The onus of proving that the purchase amount has not been paid and that consequently the cart is still his property rests on the plaintiff. The books show payments which would wipe out this debt. Across payments amounting to £15, which, apparently before the merging of the accounts were made specifically an account of the cart have been written the following words "Subs." (? subtract) "this £15 from old repairing work, leave the full amount open still." This entry is undated, but it was made on 6th December (so it is said by plaintiff and his wife). That must, therefore, if the entry be a genuine one, be 6th December, 1906 (since the last item of £15 was paid on 11th January, 1906). If that be so, it seems to me that by that time on a due appropriation of payments and in view of the fact that the accounts had been merged it would have been impossible for the plaintiff to have contended that the cart was still his, and that if any such arrangement was made with McCreery it was merely an attempt to get a pledge without a delivery of the article pledged. In view of the above facts, and especially in view of the suspicious removal from the book of the folio containing McCreery's account, I do not feel convinced that plaintiff had any legal claim to the cart when he procured the interdict. There will, therefore, be judgment of absolution from the instance with costs.

ADMISSION.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for the admission of Egbertus le Roux as an attorney, notary, conveyancer, and translator in English and Dutch.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Oudtshoorn.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

GLUCKMAN V. BURGER.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £500, with interest at 8 per cent. from the 19th November, 1906, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

The defendant's affidavit stated that he had received a summons for payment of the capital, without having had previous notice of the interest being due. He intended to sell the property in the division of Riversdale by auction, but if the property were sold in execution, it would be greatly to his prejudice. The plaintiff's action was malicious, and was wholly due to defendant having refused to sell him a certain piece of land. Payment of the interest due on the bond had been tendered to plaintiff since the issue of the summons.

Plaintiff's answering affidavit denied that he had acted maliciously, and said that he was anxious to protect his own interests as holder of a second and third mortgage bond. The farm had previously been offered in November last, but no bid had been received. Defendant was making away with his movables.

Defendant's replying affidavit said that he considered there was a good prospect for the sale of the property at Robertson at an early date.

Dr. Greer for plaintiff. Mr. Van der Byl for defendant.

Counsel submitted that plaintiff had been guilty of sharp practice in this matter. The interest was due on the 19th May, and summons was issued on the 27th May, leaving five business days in the interval, on account of Sundays and public holidays. Plaintiff's conduct gave some colour to defendant's allegation that he had been actuated by malice, because the latter refused to sell certain piece of land, which seemed to have become a sort of Naboth's vineyard. Counsel cited Rymer v. White (14 C.T.R., 30).

Dr. Greer submitted that plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The case quoted could, in four distinct particulars, be distinguished from the present case.

Buchanan, J.: This is an application for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £500 and interest and costs. The bond itself was executed in July, 1906, but the interest was to be reckoned from the 19th May, 1906. In the first place the bond has not been in existence one year. The bond, however, contains the usual clause, which requires the interest to be paid half-yearly, and provides that unless the yearly interest is paid on the date it falls due, the principal and arrears of interest shall be considered as legally claimable and due without notice. The first half-year's interest on this bond was paid 11 days after it became due, and was accepted by the plaintiff. It was, in fact, deducted from the purchase price of certain mules bought by plaintiff from the defendant. There was no objection to that settlement 11 days after the due date of the interest. There is therefore no year's interest unpaid, only six months' interest. When the second half-year's interest became due, no demand was made upon the defendant. I am not prepared to say that a demand was necessary. The defendant was responsible for the interest on a certain date, and in strict law, I think, it was the duty of the defendant to seek out his creditor, and not the duty of the creditor to seek out the debtor. The interest was due on the 19th May. As stated, no demand was made before the summons, which was served on the 29th May on the defendant. I see from the Sheriff's return that this summons was served at the defendant's residence during his absence. It appears that immediately on learning about the summons the defendant instructed his attorney in Cape Town to tender the amount of interest due, with costs, to date. Considering that the interest had been tendered a few days only after the due date, and considering that no previous demand had been made, and that, immediately upon summons being issued, the interest was tendered, I think that provisional sentence should be granted only for the amount of interest, with costs, and not provisional sentence for the principal sum also. It will be open for the plaintiff, if he chooses, to go into the principal case if he wishes to recover the principal, which by the bond is to become payable upon three months' notice being given or received; but at the present no order will be made beyond provisional sentence for interest with costs, to date of tender. If the principal case is not gone into, the plaintiff must pay the costs after date of tender.

DE VILLIERS V. MYBURGH.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,800, with interest from the 1st July, 1906, less £31 16s. 5d., paid on account, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. Watermeyer moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £3,500, with interest from the 1st July, 1906, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable and the rents attached.

DE VRIES V. DU PLESSIS.

Promissory note overdue—Holder

—Compensatio.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £110, less £64 15s. paid on account, with interest from the 27th November, 1903. Plaintiff sued as legal holder.

The defendant's affidavit denied indebtedness. He said that he gave the promissory note to De Vries Bros., and that he made certain payments, which left an amount of about £42 still owing, and that a claim which he had against De Vries Bros. for grazing certain cattle should go in reduction of the balance due on the note.

The answering affidavit of A. H. de Vries (the plaintiff), stated that a few months ago he bought the stock-in-trade and outstanding debts of the firm of De Vries Bros., and that he took over the promissory note sued upon without any knowledge of the contra claim. A further affidavit by a member of the firm of De Vries Bros. was read, alleging that defendant owed the late firm another debt, far in excess of any claim that he might have for the grazing.

Mr. Pohl moved; Mr. De Villiers for defendant.

Mr. De Villiers said that the plaintiff became holder of the note long after it was overdue. It was taken by plaintiff with all the equities. Could De Vries Bros. on this note claim payment? Defendant pleaded compensation. It was not clear whether the whole of the amount had been wiped out or a large portion merely. Defendant had had no account from De Vries Bros.

Mr. Pohl submitted that plaintiff was entitled to provisional sentence on this liquid document. If defendant had any contra claim, he could proceed by action to assert that claim. He, however, recognised that it was impossible on motion to ascertain what was the true position of accounts.

Buchanan, J.: Provisional sentence is prayed for balance of a promissory note for £110, due March, 1903, made by Du Plessis in favour of De Vries Bros. De Vries Bros. and Du Plessis had transactions, and several notes and money payments passed between them. On this particular note several payments were made, and the last payment of £40 in cash was made in November, 1904. Shortly before that time the firm of De Vries Bros., the payees of the note, sent certain cattle to defendant's farm to graze. These cattle were attempted to be sold, but ments were made, the last payments were not sold, and were sent back to defendant's farm, where they continued to run for a considerable time. By June, 1905, an amount of £58, 18s. was claimed by Du Plessis against De Vries Bros. for the grazing of these cattle. There is no dispute that the cattle were grazed on the farm for the period claimed. It is said that originally defendant wished to charge 2s. per head per month, and that afterwards he reduced the charge to 1s. 6d., which De Vries wished to have reduced to 1s., but the defendant never agreed to less than 1s. 6d. This claim of £58 is still made by Du Plessis against De Vries Bros. This claim would more than wipe out the balance against him on the note. This is a claim which it is competent to the defendant to set-off, and the effect of such compensation is to extinguish the debt altogether. Afterwards, in 1905, there were other transactions between the parties, and there still seems to be an open account between De Vries Bros. and Du Plessis. In March, 1907, this year, the present plaintiff, another De Vries (A. H.), took over the business of De Vries Bros., and this note came into his possession as part of the assets of that business then taken over by him. He now sues upon the note as legal holder, but he became legal holder years after the due date of the note, and he could be in no better position in respect of his rights on the note than De Vries Bros. were. De Vries Bros., under the circumstances disclosed in the affidavits, could not have sued for the balance of the note, because it had already been liquidated by the contra claim, and the plaintiff is in no better position than they would be in. There may be a matter of account between the parties, but as far as the promissory note is concerned, there seems to have been a contra claim, which arose two years ago, which would wipe out the total amount of the balance claimed upon the note. Provisional sentence must be refused, with costs. If the principal case be gone into, the costs may be sued for then. It would seem that the proper course now would be to have a debate of accounts between the parties, and to sue for the balance of such account.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte EDWARDS.

Mr. De Villiers moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, Ernest H. Edwards in forma pauperis for divorce by reason of his alleged adultery with some person or persons unknown.

Petitioner appeared, and said that she was without means with which to institute an action.

Mr. De Villiers said that he was prepared to certify in favour of the application.

Rule nisi granted, returnable on the 18th June; personal service.

Ex parte HOFFMAN.

Mr. Lewis moved for leave to petitioner to sue the Cape Town Municipality in forma pauperis for £200 damages.

Petitioner said that on the 15th June, 1906, a fire broke out on certain premises, No. 53, Harrington-street, where he occupied two rooms, one of which he used as a storeroom. He intended to remove the goods, and while he was doing so certain workmen employed by the Corporation of Cape Town entered the premises, and although a special constable, whom he had placed there to guard his goods, warned them that petitioner had goods on the premises, they pulled down a wall forming part of the storeroom and damaged and rendered worthless his goods. Petitioner immediately thereafter instructed his attorney to institute an action against the Municipality of Cape Town for recovery of the sum of £200, the amount of damages sustained. He paid his attorney the sum of £21 16s. 3d. towards the expenses, but his attorney did not issue summons. He thereupon withdrew the matter from his said attorney and handed it over to another attorney, with instructions to institute immediate proceedings. He prayed for leave to prosecute the suit in forma pauperis.

Buchanan, J.: You may take it as a direction from the Court that this affidavit should be sent to the Law Society, with the name of the attorney referred to, so that they may investigate your complaint. The application will be referred to counsel for certificate, and, on certificate being given, rule to issue, returnable on the 18th June.

Ex parte VAN DEN BIGGELAAR.

Mr. Toms moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, Cornelis Johannes van den Biggelaar, in forma pauperis for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Petitioner had not heard anything from her husband for a few years. She had six children.

Petitioner appeared, and said that she maintained herself and family by taking in boarders.

The matter was referred to counsel for report.

Ex parte WOODMAN.

Mr. De Villiers moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, William Alfred Woodman, by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, with forfeiture of his half-share in the property. Respondent had been recently heard of in Southampton, England.

Leave to sue by edict granted, citation returnable on the 12th August, personal service, failing which one publication in the Government Gazette and in the "Daily Telegraph" (London), copy of citation to be sent by registered letter to respondent's brother, with leave to serve interdict and notice of trial with citation.

Ex parte GRAY.

Mr. Howes moved for an order authorising petitioner, who is liquidator of the Imperial Brick and Tile Company, to take transfer of certain landed property registered in the name of the company, which he had bought at public auction.

Leave granted to Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer as prayed.

LEWIS V. TRUSTEE. INSOLVENT ESTATE WILLIAMS.

This was an application upon notice to the trustee in the insolvent estate of James E. Williams to show cause why he should not be ordered to hand over to applicant, W. M. Lewis, of Longmarket-street, Cape Town, certain property which had been taken possession of on behalf of the insolvent estate at the premises, Saxmundham, Sea Point.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. Close was for respondent.

Applicant claimed that he was entitled to a billiard table and contents of the billiard room at Saxmundham, which, he said, he had bought in August last from insolvent for £125, and to four oil paintings, two Japanese screens, book-cases, etc., which he had bought from insolvent for £75. He had not removed the goods from the premises, but he claimed to have exercised possession by locking up the rooms where the goods were obtained for a certain period and then returning the keys to the insolvent. The original receipt given by insolvent had been lost, but he had issued a copy. Cheques drawn by applicant in favour of Williams for the amounts named were also put in.

Respondent complained that he had been rushed into this matter, and that the case had been brought into the Court prematurely, and unnecessary costs incurred. In any case, he submitted that the matter was one which could only be determined by action.

Applicant said, in reply, that he had given Mr. Currey due notice of the application, and that he had afforded him facilities for recognising the genuineness of his claim.

Mr. Close said that he had not come into Court prepared to go into the case, but he submitted that the matter was one in which applicant should be ordered to proceed by action, as the Court had decided in the previous application of a similar nature by Mrs. Williams. Unless this were done, he should have to apply for a postponement.

Dr. Greer contended that the facts were sufficiently set forth on the affidavits to enable the Court to come to a conclusion, and it was especially desirable that the matter, if possible, should be decided now as the applicant, he understood, intended to leave by the Home-going mail steamer to-morrow.

Buchanan, J.: The estate of Williams was surrendered in March last, and respondent was appointed as trustee. At the time of the surrender of Williams's estate, a certain billiard-table and fittings, oil paintings, and books were found in the possession of Williams, the insolvent. Lewis, the present applicant, gave notice to the Master that he claimed this property. The ordinary proceedings in insolvency followed, and the present respondent was appointed trustee. But until the 5th June this year no formal demand was made by Lewis upon the trustee for the delivery of these goods. Correspondence then ensued, in which certain receipts were alleged to have been given in a transaction, which took place between Williams and Lewis before insolvency. The originals were demanded, but were never produced to the trustee. Certain cheques which were passed and paid by Lewis to Williams were produced, showing that money had passed between the two. It was alleged by Lewis that there had been a transaction in the nature of a sale between Williams and Lewis some months before insolvency. The goods alleged to have been sold remained on the premises of Williams, where they were found on the surrender of his estate. Application is now made upon notice of motion for an order to compel the trustee to deliver up this property. There is no virtue specially in an action in a case in which all the facts can be brought before the Court by notice of motion, and there is no reason why an order of this kind should not be given upon notice of motion if the facts are sufficiently before the Court to enable it to come to a conclusion. But there are several disputable points in this case which I cannot now decide without hearing witnesses. I do not think it desirable to discuss the disputed points, seeing that an action will have to be brought to decide the ownership of this property. As I, therefore, cannot make an order now, I will not go into the details of the affidavits, as I do not wish to express any opinion as to the result of any action which may yet be brought. I would suggest, however, that the applicant in this case should submit his case fully to the trustee, and the trustee, I am sure, will take a reasonable view of the matter, and it will be far better for all the parties if they can come to a settlement. I think if this had been done in the first instance, this application to the Court would not have been necessary. If further proceedings are taken, there is no objection to the notice of motion standing in place of summons. No order will now be made, and the question of costs will stand over, pending further proceedings.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

MOSES V. WEBB. { 1907.
{ June 12th.

Contract—Breach.

A hired servant who receives instructions from his master to perform certain services is not a contractor in respect of those special services.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matatiele in a case in which the plaintiff (now appellant), summoned defendant, who was a servant of his, for breach of contract. Plaintiff was Robert Webb, a farmer, and the defendant was a servant of his named Moses. The action in the Court below was to recover damages fixed at £2 10s. in respect of an undertaking in regard to the transport of a load of goods. The appeal was based on the grounds that the Magistrate had given his judgment on a ground which was not claimed on.

From the evidence given in the Court below it appeared that Moses was employed by Webb to transport a load of goods from Matatiele to Umzimkulu, and to bring back another load. It was alleged that Moses, when he got to Umzimkulu, found that there was not a load there for him to take back, so he hired himself to one Strachan to take a load to Modderfontein stables, and charged £3 12s. for doing so. By the action of the defendant the plaintiff had suffered loss to the amount of £2 10s. The defendant's plea was that he did everything in the interests of his employer, and that when he returned he paid over to his master £2 12s., and accounted for the balance by stating that he had spent it on incidental expenses. This the plaintiff denied, stating that he only received £1, and in this was corroborated by his wife.

The Magistrate, in his reasons, considered the conduct of the defendant most unsatisfactory, and gave a decree for £1 13s. 6d., the amount due to plaintiff.

Mr. Long, for the appellant; Mr. P. S. T. Jones for the respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Hopley, J.: It seems clear that the Magistrate has travelled beyond the issues that were raised before him in the case as it was presented before him in his Court. The only question raised by the summons in the Court below was whether there had been a breach of contract by the native servant of the plaintiff, whereby the native servant had agreed, as a contract between himself and his master to receive delivery of a certain load at Umzimkulu, consigned to Taylor Bros., of Matatiele, and bring it back to Matatiele, and whether by such breach of contract he had caused the plaintiff damage in the sum of £2 10s., which was claimed. It would appear from the evidence that it was not a matter of contract at all between these parties, but that Mr. Webb sent his own wagon and oxen with his own native servants, chief of whom was the defendant Moses, to do certain bidding of his, that is, to go down to Umzimkulu, deliver there a load which he had on the wagon, to wait there, and on his return to bring back a load to the same firm, which he would find waiting or arriving for them at Umzimkulu. It does not seem to me that there was a contract at all; it was a case of a hired servant having to obey the orders of his master. However, the man was in a certain position of responsibility, and had to use his own judgment, as the agent of Mr. Webb, and finding at Umzimkulu that there was no load waiting, and after waiting for a considerable period, and no load arriving for him to take back to Matatiele (whether or not he acted under instructions from Mr. Strachan, and whether or not a message came from Mr. Webb), he took from Messrs. Strachan and Co., the post-cart contractors, a load of forage to be delivered at one of their posting stations. After the native had accounted to him for certain money and expenditure, plaintiff brought an action, not for an account, and not for the money had and received, but for a breach of contract whereby he was damaged. Now, that is what the Magistrate had to enquire into, and it is perfectly clear that the first thing he had to do was to settle whether there were such final instructions to this servant that he must look upon them as an absolute order to wait for the load for Taylor Bros., and, if he did not do so, whether the plaintiff was thereby damaged in the amount of £2 10s. The fact that the defendant took Strachan's load and received certain money for it, might very well be taken into consideration as part of the evidence on an attempt to ascertain the quantum of damages, if there were any damages at all.

In the circumstances, I think it is extremely improbable that the Court ought to have found that defendant had committed a breach of contract at all. He had simply used his judgment to the best of his ability in the interests of his master, and had taken the load which, apparently, was a fairly paid load, and done certain work with his wagon which his master would not have objected to at all if he had received the full amount of the money according to his view of the matter. Therefore, on that point alone, I think the case for the plaintiff should have failed as presented, but the matter went further, and the Magistrate inquired into the other contract that defendant had undertaken, and on an estimate of the moneys spent and earned for and on behalf of plaintiff, he gave judgment as though the whole action had been conceived as a matter of account for moneys had and received by defendant on behalf of the plaintiff.

Now, it is said that no injustice is done to defendant by such a course, that substantial justice has been done, and that the Magistrate had a right to look broadly at the matter. It is by no manner of means clear to me that no injustice may be done to defendant by the course adopted by the Magistrate, because it appears that he did not come into Court to meet the case, which was actually decided against him, seeing that he did not come into Court to fight a matter of account, but a question of whether by an alleged breach of contract the opposite party had sustained damage. The class of evidence that you might collect for the one case is not necessarily the class of evidence you would collect for the other case. At all events, though a good deal of laxity is allowed and a great deal of latitude given to inquiries in Magistrates' Courts in such cases, and though one does not wish to interfere with their findings, I do think they must not be allowed to go too far or to travel outside the case before them for their consideration. When the breach of contract had not been proved, when the damages had not been proved resulting from the defendant's alleged breach of contract, I think the proper course for the Magistrate would have been to have said: "Whatever case you may have against this man as a matter of account, you have failed in the case you have put before me, and I give absolution from the instance." I think that is what the Magistrate ought to have done, and that is what this Court will do.

The appeal will be allowed, and the Magistrate's judgment changed to one of absolution from the instance, with costs in this Court and costs in appeal.

KHAN V. DEENIK.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Wynberg, dismissing a claim for £20 damages, made by Khan against Deenik, in respect of the latter's negligence and failing to keep to an agreement.

It appeared that in February last plaintiff was indebted to defendant in the sum of £1 ls. 8d., and defendant issued a summons against plaintiff for recovery of that amount. On receipt of the summons, plaintiff called on defendant, and paid him the amount due, and defendant agreed to withdraw the summons. This defendant failed to do, and as a result plaintiff's name appeared in "Dunn's Gazette," and that caused his credit to suffer to such an extent that many firms refused to supply him with goods, and he was summoned by several other firms. In the Court below, evidence was called to show that plaintiff's credit suffered.

The defendant's plea was that he wrote to the Magistrate's office, authorising the case to be withdrawn, but that the letter must have miscarried.

The Magistrate, in his reasons, found that an agreement had been entered into, but also found that Deenik had taken all the necessary steps to apologise, and, therefore, dismissed the case.

Dr. Greer for appellant; Mr. Upington for respondent.

Dr. Greer submitted that all the necessary steps had not been taken. The defendant agreed to withdraw the case, and he should have taken proper steps to do so, communicating either with the Magistrate's clerk personally, or sending directions by registered letter.

Mr. Upington contended that there was no agreement to withdraw the summons, it was only a voluntary offer. With such an offer there was a certain obligation, but that was not enforceable as an agreement. If it could be shown that there was anything amounting to gross negligence or a breach of contract, then it was possible that there was a remedy in law.

Dr. Greer having been heard in reply, Hopley, J.: I do not think that the judgment in this case should be disturbed. The facts are simple. Mr. Deenik having a cause of action against the appellant in the Small Debts Recovery Court, summoned him therefor. There was personal service. Instead of entering appearance in the Magistrate's Court, Cape Town, to contest the case, the debtor came to Mr. Deenik's place of business and paid his debt, with the exception of a small amount which does not affect the present case, and thereupon Deenik, through his clerk, agreed to withdraw the case.

Now, had the respondent done nothing whatever, it might have been taken that he had so carelessly, negligently, or perhaps maliciously neglected to do what he had undertaken that a cause of action founded upon tortious conduct might possibly have arisen. He, however, did not neglect his promise, but immediately sent off a letter, posted by himself, asking the Magistrate's clerk to withdraw the case, and so he was in perfect innocence as to the fact that the case had not been withdrawn by reason of some faulty step somewhere or other—we cannot at present say where. The Magistrate has found that the letter was posted, properly addressed, to the Magistrate's Clerk, Cape Town; and, either because somebody in the postal service or the messenger in the Magistrate's Court was negligent, the letter does not seem to have reached its destination, with the result that the case, both parties being perfectly innocent of the fact, was called on, and, as authorised by the Small Debts Recovery Act, the Magistrate, without requiring any persons to be present, there having been personal service, gave judgment against the debtor. There was nobody before him to say the case had been settled, and so, when the case came on, judgment was given.

The judgment appeared in a Gazette which is supplied to business men, and the name of the appellant was thus put into something of the nature of a black list which merchants see. No doubt he did suffer damage in consequence—damage to his credit. But, in my opinion, this is a case of damnum absque injuria. The appellant may have suffered damages, but nothing was done by Deenik to render him liable therefor. The case that the appellant made in the Magistrate's Court was conceived in contract. He said that there was a contract by Deenik that he would withdraw the case, and that by reason of the failure to carry out this contract he has been damaged.

I consider, however, that it has been rightly argued that there was no enforceable contract, because no consideration was given for any such contract. I think that is the correct view to take, because nothing at all that I can see was given in consideration of such a contract. The money which was paid was for the goods which the appellant had bought from Deenik, and not in consideration that he should withdraw the case. Consequently, it seems to me that any case founded upon contract must fail.

Upon tort no case arises, because, as far as I can see, upon the undertaking voluntarily made by the clerk to withdraw, he did what was reasonably sufficient under the circumstances. I do not say that if there had been a contract upon good consideration he would not have had to do something more, and not merely have relied upon the Post Office as his agent.

But when it comes to a matter of tort there must be some element of malice or fraud, or something or other of that nature, to enable the Court to give judgment against a defendant. . . . In this case the defendant has done what is usual and customary in such matters, in writing the letter and posting it, as the Magistrate found had been done. There was nothing in the way of fraud or malice or anything else to give rise for an action for tort. Therefore, whether the matter be viewed as an action in contract or in tort, it seems to me that the plaintiff in the Court below must fail, that the Magistrate's judgment was correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HARVEY V. FRANKS.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate of Woodstock in a case in which the plaintiff (now respondent) sued the defendant for £1, being carriage of certain furniture from one house to another, and a counter-claim by defendant, against plaintiff for the recovery of £1 4s. 6d., the value of certain goods lost or stolen in transit.

The Magistrate found for plaintiff for 10s., and costs, and for defendant on the claim in reconvention for the full amount and costs.

Dr. Greer appeared for the appellant; Mr. Lewis appeared for the respondent. Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts, Hopley, J.: I do not think these appeals on small matters like costs should be encouraged, and although a good deal might be said, and has been said by Mr. Greer in support of the view that the Magistrate ought to have taken a view of the whole case and put himself into the position of the defendant in that case and have found that the defendant ought to have the whole of the costs, yet in support of the view taken by him there is something to be said on the way the pleadings were drawn and the way the case was presented to him. There was a claim for work and labour done in and about the carriage of goods, and to this claim no tender was made by the defendant; all he says is that he denies the debt, and counter-claims for £1 4s. 6d. for goods lost in transit. He had never previously demanded these goods from the plaintiff, but his brother had told him vaguely that some things were missing, but it did not follow that the plaintiff knew he was being held liable for these goods. He came into court with his own case, not knowing of this other claim, or expecting that he was to be called upon to make good the loss. The Magistrate heard the case, and because the pleadings had been filed in the way they had, he gave plaintiff judgment with costs for the claim in convention, and defendant judgment and costs for the claim in reconvention. If he had given judgment the other way I should not have found any particular reason for upsetting his decision. That is the way he thought proper to exercise his judicial discretion, and I must say that it has not been so exercised that I can disturb it. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

BRADY V. ROBERTSON. { 1907.
June 12th.

Mr. De Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £30, made in favour of Marion J. Daly, with interest from the 4th September, 1906, and costs. Defendant was sued by edictal citation, personal service having been effected.

Order granted.

Mr. De Villiers moved for certain funds in the hands of the executor of estate Robertson, belonging to defendant, which had been attached ad fundandum jurisdictionem, to be declared executable to the judgment.

Order granted accordingly.

Ex parte KNOX.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, John James Barry Knox, in forma pauperis, and by edictal citation for divorce by reason of respondent's malicious desertion. The parties were married at Simon's Town, and, after living together for a few years, they parted. In February, 1905, respondent went to England, and was now believed to be employed in H.M. Dockyard, Devonport.

Petitioner appeared in person, and said that she had not heard anything from her husband since he had gone to England. Respondent did not support her, while they were living together, and they thereupon agreed to live apart.

Mr. Buchanan asked the Court to grant a rule nisi on the application to sue as a pauper, and at the same time to grant leave to sue by edictal citation, and he quoted the note at 6 Juta, 61 (Nelson v. Nelson, Hardey v. Hardey, Edgercombe v. Edgercombe, and Born v. Born). He also cited Brownell's case (17 C.T.R., 446).

Buchanan, J.: I don't like this practice. It does not seem to me to be sound. A rule nisi will be granted, returnable on the 14th August, calling upon respondent to show cause why petitioner should not sue him in forma pauperis, personal service to be effected. It seems to me to be an improper practice to grant leave to sue by edictal citation at the present stage, before it is decided whether or not the applicant will get leave to sue as a pauper, and before counsel and attorney are appointed.

SUPREME COURT

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

MOLL, SCHUTTE AND CO. } 1907.
 V. TIEDEMAN. } June 13th.

Provisional sentence — Foreign judgment—Set-off of unliquidated claim.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a judgment of the Court of Judicature of Fort William, Bombay, India, for £633 4s., with interest from the 11th December, 1905, together with taxed costs amounting to £27 2s.

Defendant, who was formerly in plaintiff's service in India, and for some time had charge of their office in Bombay, had since January, 1904, been resident in East London, where he had obtained an appointment from Messrs. Malcomess and Co. He admitted indebtedness to the amount of £351 6s. 4d., but said that the Bombay Court had no jurisdiction over him, that he was living in East London when the judgment was taken, and that he had not entered appearance to defend the action.

Plaintiffs said defendant was served with writ of summons and entered appearance in the action. They denied that defendant was entitled to any set-off.

Mr. Benjamin was for plaintiff; Mr. Close was for defendant.

Mr. Close said that the defence was: (1) That there had been no proper service upon defendant; (2) that the Bombay Court had no jurisdiction on the ground of defendant being domiciled here; and (3) that the amount claimed was not due, there being subsequent reductions. On the question of service, counsel referred to the case of Wessels and Co. v. Venter (17 C.T.R., 473), and submitted that the handing of documents in the purely informal manner in this case was not service in a proper sense. Counsel also cited Acutt, Blaine and Co. v. Colonial Marine Assurance Co. (1 Juta, 406). Defendant had not, he contended, submitted to the jurisdiction of the Bengal Court.

Mr. Benjamin contended that the defendant having entered appearance, had submitted to the jurisdiction of the Bengal Court.

Buchanan, J., said that he would like to hear counsel on the question of set-off.

Mr. Benjamin said that Moll met defendant in a very generous manner after his account had been overdrawn, and in view of defendant's state of health. That offer, however, was conditional on Tiedeman returning to plaintiff's service in India. If defendant had a claim then he should establish it in the ordinary way. He was not entitled to set off that claim on the present proceedings.

Buchanan, J.: Provisional sentence is claimed upon a judgment obtained in the High Court of Bombay for the sum of £633 4s. An action was instituted in the High Court of Bombay. In this action a summons was served upon defendant, who was then in this Colony. The defendant instructed an attorney in India to appear, and appearance was duly entered on the defendant's power of attorney in the Court of Bombay. The particulars of the claim were demanded by defendant's attorney and served upon him. Thereafter no further steps were taken by defendant; he allowed judgment to go as undefended against him in the Court at Bombay. Provisional sentence being now claimed on this judgment, three objections are taken by the defendant. The first objection is that there was no proper service of summons upon defendant. In my opinion, there was a proper service, and if there was any irregularity in the service, it was cured by defendant entering appearance. The second objection is that the Court of Bombay had no jurisdiction over the defendant. I am of opinion that the Court had jurisdiction in this particular action. The contract which grounded the action was made in India, it was to be performed in India, and the parties were in India at the time when the contract was made, and the defendant ought to have returned to India at the expiration of the contract. He did not return; he absented himself; but he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Court, and the Court, therefore, had power to give judgment against him. The third objection is that the amount for which judgment was obtained was not due, but was subject to certain deductions. It is very difficult in a provisional case to determine the question whether the defendant has a right to a set-off or not. He admits that he owed the plaintiffs the sum originally sued for, but claims that a certain amount should be reduced by a set-off. Defendant does not dispute the contract made. From the statements made it appears that defendant, who was in the service of plaintiffs, had overdrawn the amount, or drawn more money than he was entitled to for salary. Plaintiffs say it was done without their knowledge; the defendant states that plaintiffs knew of it. However, he admits that he did, as a fact, overdraw the account. He says, according to the contract, he is entitled to certain salary after the date of the contract which was not paid to him. It appears that he entered into a contract not to leave India until this indebtedness had been paid off, but afterwards, in consequence of his ill-health, plaintiffs entered into a new contract giving him six months' leave, and advancing him 600 rupees for the purpose of paying his passage money. They also allowed him salary for the months of April and May at 500 rupees, and from that time, June, July, August, and September at 200 rupees, and agreed to allow him to draw against salary for April and May 300 rupees per month, and for June, July, August, and September 200 rupees per month. The total amount of salary which would have accrued to defendant from April to the 15th November, the date on which he undertook to return to India, was 2,300 rupees. I believe this works out at the rate of exchange accepted by counsel at £153 6s. 8d. The defendant claims also further salary after the 15th November, but he is clearly not entitled to any salary after the 15th November, even if he is entitled to salary up to the 15th November, about which I will not now decide definitely. He said his failure to return was due to the fact that the plaintiffs did not forward him his passage money to go back to India, as they had undertaken to do. Well, if any breach of contract was made on their part, it may give rise to a claim for damages, but that could not be set-off against the liquid amount which the defendant owes to plaintiffs. No objection has been taken to this being a provisional case, and it is admitted that on the claim sued for the defendant is indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount sued for. The only defence is that he is entitled to a certain set-off. Defendant claims set-off considerably more than I am inclined to allow to him. I think I can deduct only the amount of salary due to defendant from April to November 15, when he ought to have gone back to India. I do not think he ought to be allowed the 600 rupees, or £40, which he claims for his passage back to India, seeing that he never returned to India. Instead of returning he took service with somebody else, and came out to this colony. On the admissions of the defendant it is clear that he is indebted to plaintiffs in £633 4s., which, less his claim for salary to November 15, viz., £153 6s. 8d., leaves an amount of £479 17s. 4d. It may well be that the plaintiffs are entitled to the whole amount of their claim, or that the defendant is entitled to a claim against plaintiffs for damages for breach of contract, but at any rate the plaintiffs are entitled to £479 17s. 4d., and provisional sentence will be given for this amount, with costs, and with interest from the 11th December, 1906. Either party may go into the principal case for any claim beyond that amount. The case which has been cited in argument of Acutt, Blaine and Co., in which the Court held that a judgment of the Court of Natal did not give any right of action against a defendant in this colony, was quite a different one from this case. In that case the defendant was not a native of Natal, and was never subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts there, and he was never served with any legal process. To found jurisdiction in that case, the Natal Court attached certain property in Natal, and it was held, that as far as the judgment of the Natal Court, given under these special circumstances, was concerned, it could only affect property attached within the jurisdiction. This is quite another case, and in no way differs from the judgment of the Court in Wessels and Co. v. Venter, with which I am in full accord.

JANSON V. JANSON.

This was an action brought by Svon Anton Janson, of Claremont, against his wife, Sarah M. Janson, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce.

Mr. Toms was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

W. T. Birch, officer in charge of the marriage register, Colonial Secretary's Office, gave formal evidence of registration of the marriage.

Plaintiff said he was married to defendant in Cape Town in August, 1899. In March, 1898, his wife deserted him. He did not know what the reason of the desertion was, and in fact he had had no warning that she was going. Witness had £85 in the house on the morning when she left, and later in the day he missed the money. He went to look for his wife, but afterwards he did not bother any more. He had not had any communications with his wife since.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to plaintiff on or before the 30th June, failing which to show cause on the 12th July why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage.

MAREE V. MAREE.

Mr. Roux moved for a decree of divorce in default of the defendant's compliance with an order on respondent for the restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule made absolute with costs.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

In re THE CAPE CANNING } 1907.
CO. (IN LIQUIDATION) } June 13th.

Mr. Benjamin presented the official liquidator's final report.

The usual order was granted.

Ex parte FRIEDLANDER BROTHERS.

Mr. Close applied, on behalf of the applicants, for an order authorising the cancellation of certain sales.

Mr. Howel Jones appeared on behalf of the Colonial Government.

Mr. Percy Jones mentioned that there was a similar one in which one Albrecht was concerned, and he would like it taken with the present case.

Mr. Close: In this matter of Friedlander, it is a case where a number of allotments in the township of De Aar were sold in 1902, and we wish to have a cancellation. The Court made an order for the publication of the rule in the "Richmond Era" and the "Gazette." The day after the instructions for the insertion of the notice in the papers had been made, a communication was received stating that the "Richmond Era" did not exist, and a second application was made to have the notice inserted in the "Midland News." After this order was made, it was found that the information about the "Richmond Era" was wrong, and that it did exist, so the notice was inserted in both papers. I just mention this to show—

Mr. Close: Yes, my lord. Continuing, he explained that the rule of Court was a rule nisi, calling on all persons to show cause why the sales by petitioner of the township lots in De Aar should not be declared cancelled, and why the costs of the case should not come out of the money already paid. There was a further prayer in the petition, that on cancellation of this sale that the Court would make an order relieving the applicants from paying transfer dues.

Mr. Percy Jones said his case was the same as that made by Mr. Close.

Mr. Howel Jones said he appeared to oppose the application for the return of the transfer dues. He had just seen the papers in the Albrecht case. He wished to ask the Court to consider the circumstances very carefully before the rule nisi was made absolute.

[Buchanan, J.: Go on with your second application, Mr. Close.]

Mr. Close, having explained the second portion of the petition, proceeded to argue that where the Court cancelled a sale there should be a remission of the transfer dues. He contended that they were legally entitled to ask the Court to cancel the sale, and when that was done, under the section they were entitled to a remission of the transfer dues. The duty payable would be over £200, and £130 had only been received out of the sale, and there were heavy expenses incurred besides.

Mr. Howel Jones said this was a new point, which had never before been raised.

Mr. Percy Jones made formal application for the cancellation of the sale in his case.

Mr. Howel Jones said he wished to ask the Court to be careful before they cancelled the sale. The true meaning of section 18 was where there had been fraud or some such circumstances, then the Court could remit the transfer dues, but to this case he held that the 18th section did not refer. In the case of Friedlander, it was stipulated in the conditions of sale that if the purchasers did not take transfer within a month than the sale should be cancelled. They only asked for an order confirming a cancellation that had taken place by mutual consent. It was quite unnecessary for the Court to cancel the sale.

[Buchanan, J.: In cases where no money was paid do you claim transfer dues?]

Mr. Howel Jones: Yes, my lord, if the cancellation is not exercised before six months have elapsed.

His Lordship: But would that not come under the 32nd section?

Mr. Howel Jones: Yes, my lord. His argument was that the only thing that was necessary for the Court to do was to confirm the cancellation of a sale already agreed upon, and the payment of the transfer dues would be considered by the Civil Commissioner when a new sale was effected. It was unnecessary for them to come to the Court for confirmation of the cancellation. He would ask the Court not to make an order under section 18 unless the Court had no other alternative. He contended that if Friedlanders wished to sell the lots again, they could do so, without applying to the Court for permission.

Mr. Percy Jones said a similar action to that he proposed had been granted in the Transvaal. They asked that the sale be cancelled, and the balance paid in to the Master.

Mr. Close, having been heard in reply,

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 12th).

Further argument was heard. Mr. P. S. T. Jones cited in argument Ex parte Stevens (6 C.T.R., 150), Liquidators, South African and Orange Free State Mining Association (1906, T.S.C., 346), Scott v. Isaacs (12, C.T.R., 791), and Estate Owen (16 C.T.R., 79, 220, and 439).

Buchanan, J.: There are three applications before the Court. In each case application is made for the cancellation of certain contracts of sale under the 18th section of the Transfer Duty Act, No. 5, 1884, which reads: "As often as any contract of sale, upon which duty shall be payable, shall be set aside, or cancelled, or declared or made void by the judgment of any competent Court, the transfer duty upon such sale, if unpaid, shall not be payable; and if paid shall be returned." I take it, therefore, that though no transfer duty is payable on a sale cancelled by the Court, the judgment of the Court may impose any condition that seems required by the justice of the case in granting this order for the cancellation of the sale. In the case of the Fernwood Estate, the Court will order that the sale be cancelled without any further condition. The rule will be made absolute, and no condition will be imposed. The effect of the order will be that there will be no transfer duty payable at all. In that case there has been no portion of the purchase price paid. In the two subsequent applications there have been payments made on account. When we look at the two subsequent sections of the Act, we find that this Act imposes a duty upon the transfer of any land from one person to another, but where no transfer is effected, then only in certain cases is the duty payable. Under the 20th section, it is competent for the purposes of a contract of sale by mutual consent to cancel that contract within six months, and if no part of the purchase price has been paid, or no consideration given for the cancellation of the contract, then under section 20 of the Act there is no duty upon such sale. In the case of Albrecht, there was no written contract put in, and I do not think that that section applies to Albrecht's case, but it does apply to Friedlander's case. In the case of Friedlander a number of lots of ground were put up by the applicants for sale, a number of them were bought by different people, and on a number of these sales no portion of the purchase price has been paid at all. In regard to those sales, the Court, in ordering the cancellation of these sales, finds that they come under the 18th section, and the rule will be the same as the rule in the Fernwood Estate. All sales by which no purchase price of any kind has been paid will be cancelled under the 18th section of the Ordinance, and consequently no duty will be paid on those sales. In regard to the sales on which portions of the purchase price have been paid, the Court will apply the principle of the 21st section of the Act, which is to the effect that as often as a contract of sale upon which duty is payable shall be by mutual consent cancelled, and a part of the purchase price has been paid, then transfer duty shall be payable only upon the part of the purchase price which has been paid. The 21st section, it is true, is a section by which cancellation takes place by mutual consent, but where persons under written declarations of sale give the right of cancellation, if the conditions are not carried out, it is in effect a mutual consent to cancel the sale, and, therefore, in ordering the cancellation under the 18th section, I think I should follow the principle laid down in the 21st section. The spirit of the Act seems to be that where a sale is cancelled, and no portion of the purchase price has been paid, no duty should be payable, but where there has been a portion of the purchase price paid, duty will be payable on that portion of the purchase price which has been paid, and as to the balance in Friedlander's case, any balance after the duties have been paid the seller is entitled to keep, that will be declared forfeited, and the rule will be made absolute, duty to be paid on the portions of the purchase price paid, the balance declared forfeited, with costs against the parties. With regard to Albrecht's estate, the same order will be made, and the sale will be declared cancelled, on condition that the transfer duty is paid on any portion of the purchase price which has been paid. From that amount, the sellers will be entitled to deduct their interest and costs, and the balance, if any, will be ordered to be paid over to the Master. In the Fernwood estate the rule will be made absolute, with costs; in Albrecht's case the rule will be made absolute on paying transfer duty on the amount of the purchase price paid, from the balance the sellers to deduct interest and costs, and the balance, if any, to be paid to the Master; and in Friedlander's case the sale is cancelled, on condition that the duty is paid on the amount of the purchase price paid, the balance to be forfeited, with judgment for costs against respondents.

THOMAS V. ROBERTSON. { 1907.
 { June 13th.

Mining — Prospector's rights —
Transfer of land subject to rights—Interdict.

Respondent had agreed to sell certain prospecting rights over his farm with option of purchase for two years to applicant. It was admitted that this period was extended for at least six months. During the currency of this agreement respondent sold the farm to his brother.

Held, that respondent must be interdicted from passing transfer until the lapse of the agreement, unless the transferee should acknowledge applicant's rights.

This was an application to make absolute a certain rule nisi restraining respondent from passing transfer of a certain farm, Zandkraal, in the district of George, unless there be therein a recognition of applicant's rights.

The affidavit of the petitioner (David P. Thomas) set forth that he claimed to have entered into an agreement with respondent (Arthur Nightingale Robertson), on the 15th March, 1905, which gave him certain rights of prospecting for minerals for a period of two years on payment of £5 a year and an option of purchase at the end of that period. The rent was paid from time to time. On the 18th June, 1906, the agreement was extended for a further period of two years. Petitioner had expended a good deal of money on the property as a mineralised property. He had recently been informed that respondent had alienated the property to his brother, Frederick Augustus Robertson, but that transfer had not been passed. Applicant submitted that he was entitled to have his agreement attached to the transfer of the property, so as to protect his rights under the agreement.

Respondent, in answering affidavits, denied having entered into a renewal for two years, and said that his impression was that the contract had been extended for six months. As far as he knew, petitioner had not spent much money in prospecting, and had not done any work on the farm for a period of about ten months. Deponent had not attached much importance to the option, as applicant had gone to Europe, and had not been on the farm for some months, and when he agreed to sell to his brother, he was under the impression that the contract had only a few months to run. Respondent was in pecuniary difficulties, and the sale was entered into with his brother in order to help him out of his difficulties. It was not until after the sale had gone through, that respondent mentioned the option to his brother. It was further stated that had F. A. Robertson not come to the assistance of respondent the latter would have had to surrender his estate.

Applicant, in replying affidavits, said that he carried on operations on the farm for a period of sixteen months until he went to Europe. The work was stopped while he was away, owing to certain causes, and he was detained in Europe longer than he had anticipated.

Mr. Benjamin was for applicant; Mr. Upington was for respondent.

Mr. Upington submitted that the application was quite unprecedented. Applicant was attempting to obtain a declaration of rights under this agreement upon motion. It had never been laid down that these mining agreements were leases of land. No reason had been shown for restraining transfer in the present case. Counsel cited Henderson and Another v. Hanecke (20 S.C., 505), Estate Thomas v. Carr and Another (20 S.C., 354), Johns v. Colonial Government (15 S.C., 245), and United Mines of Bulfontein v. De Beers Consolidated Mines (17 S.C., 419). No right in the land itself was, he submitted, conveyed by the agreement with applicant. He cited Voet 18, 1, 2. The application was to interfere with a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. It was not alleged that a fraudulent transaction had taken place between respondent and his brother. There was no reason whatever for making the rule nisi absolute.

Buchanan, J.: The respondent, A. N. Robertson, entered into an agreement with the applicant giving him the right to prospect on the respondent's farm and with option of purchase. This agreement was entered into on March 15, 1905, and was for a period of two years, ending on March 15, 1907. The consideration of agreement was £5 a year, which was paid. Afterwards the parties agreed to extend the agreement for an additional two years, ending on March 15, 1907. The respondent, A. N. Robertson, says in his affidavit that he was under the impression that the extension was to be for only six months, and not two years, but even that period has not yet been reached. Applicant left the country on business, and when he came back, he found that during his absence A. N. Robertson had sold the farm to his brother—the other respondent. Applicant, on hearing of the sale immediately took steps to interdict the transfer of the property from one Robertson to the other. A rule nisi was granted, and this rule is now before the Court for the purpose of being made absolute. It is contended that that agreement is not one which runs with the land, and that whether the property is transferred or not, it makes no difference to the remedy of the applicant, which is only a claim for damages. But if the transfer is allowed to pass free from the obligations under the agreement, the rights of the applicant will be entirely defeated. On the question of whether the transferee had notice of this agreement, I will not express an opinion. There are enough affidavits to show that he had. This matter will not now be decided, but if A. N. Robertson is allowed to dispossess himself of the land, he will not be able to carry out the agreement with Thomas, and as that agreement, according to the written contract, exists for two years, the interdict will have to last as long as the agreement lasts, but leave will be given to respondents to bring an action to set aside the interdict, such action to be brought within three months. It was alleged that the property was mortgaged at the time of the agreement. If so, the mortgage being prior to applicant's agreement, the agreement cannot affect the mortgagee. That question is not before the Court at present. The order will be that Thomas will be entitled to have an order restricting respondents from transferring the property while the agreement lasts, unless the transferee acknowledges the applicant's rights.

ANDREWS V. RAWBONE.

Mr. Van der Byl moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £58, and for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £1 18s., being costs of collection.

Buchanan, J.: The Court cannot grant costs twice over. Costs of this action will be costs of collection. Provisional sentence will be granted on the promissory note as prayed, but there will be no order on the other claim.

Postea (June 17).

Counsel repeated the application for the commission, and cited Lindenberg and De Villiers v. Palmer (16, C.T.R., 827).

Buchanan, J., said he did not see how the attorney could claim more than his taxed costs, and would have to refuse the application.

Municipality — Closed road —
Owners of adjoining land.

S., being the owner of land within a Municipality, sold it in lots with proper roads for the use of the owners and the roads were taken over by the Municipal Council. Subsequently one of the roads was lawfully closed by direction of Government, and S., having been called upon to show cause why transfer of the land should not be made in favour of the owners of the adjacent land on both sides of the road raised no objection. The Council raised no objection but insisted upon a condition authorizing the use of the road for carrying off storm water from a cross road.

Held that, subject to such condition, the transfer should be allowed.

This was an application for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

At the last hearing of the action an application was made to close the De Villiers-road, Wynberg, and that was granted. The petitioners now applied for an additional order vesting in them the title to the land over which that road originally existed. The papers showed that the lands were still vested in the estate of the late John Stewart, who died in 1882, and the result is that the land is unrepresented. The Wynberg Municipality contended that if the rights in the De Villiers-road were transferred there would be no outlet for the stormwater at the foot of Stamford-road unless some arrangements were made by petitioners for taking it away.

The petitioners contended that any provision for the carrying off of the water should be carried out by the Municipal Council of Wynberg. Hitherto no arrangements had been made for carrying off the water.

Mr. Benjamin moved

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan appeared on behalf of the Wynberg Municipal Council to oppose.

Mr. Buchanan argued that probably as soon as the petitioners got title to this road they might erect a wall or take other steps to prevent this water from going over its present course.

[Buchanan, J.: What becomes of the water now?]

Mr. Buchanan: It runs on to this road.

[Buchanan, J.: Well, then, it will continue to run on there.]

Mr. Buchanan contended that once the road was vested in the petitioners, that they could take steps to interfere with the course of this water. It was not the duty of the Municipal Council to erect this arrangement for taking away the stormwater. The fact was that this property was either vested in Stewart's Estate, because the petitioners had not shown any cause for coming under the Derelict Lands Act or else under section 106 of Act 45 of 1882, was vested in the Municipality.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that if the transfer was to go through it should go through subject to the conditions imposed by the Council.

Mr. Benjamin said the petitioners should get transfer from Stewart's Estate.

[Buchanan, J.: But what claim have you against the estate?]

Mr. Benjamin: We claim that this road has been closed, and we are the adjacent owners.

[Buchanan, J.: But you have not held for 40 years.]

Mr. Benjamin argued that in view of the decision in the case of Cape Breweries v. Whitehead that they were entitled to claim. Under the Derelict Lands Act, they were entitled to claim by prescription or any other grounds.

[Buchanan, J.: You can't claim by prescription.]

Mr. Benjamin: Well, by grant. He submitted that the land was not vested in the Municipality, but in Stewart's estate.

[Buchanan, J.: Then what are the grounds for claiming against Stewart's estate?]

Mr. Benjamin replied that that road was there for the use of the adjoining owners, and Stewart's estate had no land there now.

Mr. Benjamin: They have, if they own all the adjoining lots. Every title of title had gone from Stewart, and this land was not vested in the Municipality, who only had a right of way. The Municipality claimed no right to the sub-soil. This road had been dedicated to the petitioners, and that was the title on which they came into court.

Buchanan, J., stated that as this case was ordered to stand over when the rule nisi was granted, to be heard before two Judges, it would have to stand over for two Judges.

Postea (June 17).

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice BUCHANAN.]

Mr. Buchanan argued that the Municipality claimed that some provision should be made for carrying away the stormwater from Stamford-road, which ran into the road which the applicants wished to close up. The applicants could not claim transfer of the road, because they did not allege title by prescription or contract as required by the Derelict Lands Act. The dominium in the road was vested either in the Municipality or in Stewart's estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I should like to hear Mr. Benjamin on that point. In whom is the dominium in the road vested?]

Mr. Benjamin: When the road was granted, it was vested in the Municipality. Subsequently, when it was closed up again, it reverted to Stewart's estate. The road was a reservation in favour of the proprietors of the adjacent lots of land. The dominium in the soil was granted to them. Counsel cited Philips v. Porter (1876 B., 182) and Hofmeyr's Case (1 S.C., 424). The Municipality no longer had any interest in the matter. The Colonial Secretary closed the road, and his decision, subject to the conditions he imposed by section 8 of Act 41 of 1899, was final.

Mr. Buchanan was heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J., asked Mr. Benjamin if it would not be well for the petitioners to consent to the conditions made by the Wynberg Municipality.

Mr. Benjamin: The position we take up is that the Municipality has nothing to do with this matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, yes; because it was on their appeal that the Colonial Secretary gave his decision.]

De Villiers, C.J.: When this application was first made, the Court was careful to provide that the notice of the application, with the rule, should be served on the executors or representatives of the late Mr. Stewart (17 C.T.R., 318). It is contended now that the dominium is vested in the Council, but even if the dominium had been at one time vested in the Council, the road has been closed by the proper authority, and the only persons who could claim the ownership are the representatives of the late Mr. Stewart. Well, now, notice has been given to them, and no objection has been raised, and I am quite prepared to treat this case as a case where the respondent is in default. It is unnecessary for the Court to decide whether this case comes under the principle laid down in the case of Philips v. Porter, or the principles in the case of Hofmeyr v. De Waal, because it seems that no objection has been raised by the representatives of the estate concerned. It seems that there was no intention at the time of sale to retain the ownership of the land on which the road was marked out. Under those circumstances, I consider the rule ought to be made absolute. But the further question arises now, whether Wynberg Town Council had not so much interest in the matter as to appear before the Court for the purpose of pointing out what the rule nisi meant. It must be borne in mind that at the time the Colonial Secretary settled this point Stamford-road did not appear on the plans, and now, of course, some provision ought to be made for the stormwater. The Wynberg Municipal Council are quite right in seeing that some arrangement is made for carrying off the stormwater, but they are not right in saying that petitioners should do it. I think power should be given to the Municipality to carry off the stormwater which comes down the Stamford-road. Therefore the rule will be made absolute, with the condition that the Wynberg Municipality shall be entitled to use the road in question for the purpose of carrying off the stormwater. As to costs, Wynberg Municipal Council were quite right in raising the question, and therefore the costs of the Council will have to be paid by the petitioners.

Buchanan, J., concurred, and said the question of dominium still remained an open one.

STARLING AND OTHERS V. { 1907.
NANNUCCI LTD. { June 14th.

Limited Liability Company — Shares — Over issue — Cancellation — Registration.

Three persons, N. B. and S., having three separate businesses, all engaged in the same trade, agreed to amalgamate their businesses and form a limited liability company. Each of these persons and also four others, among whom was one R., signed the Articles of Association, and one share was allotted to each. The capital of the Company was divided into 25,000 shares, and the whole of these were allotted to N., B. and S. The above seven shares were never registered, and the directors, on discovering this oversight, resolved to cancel these shares. At that time S. had ceased to be a director and had disposed of all his shares, save the share originally allotted to him. S. and R. now each applied for the registration of his original one share.

Held that, as S. had been a director of the Company and ought as such to have been aware of the over issue of shares he was not entitled to take advantage of his own negligence and obtain registration of his share.

Held further that as R. had agreed to the cancellation of the seven shares over issued, and had never before applied for the registration of his share or other shares which he had received gratuitously, his application must be refused.

One Newsome claimed the registration of 100 shares purchased from a former secretary of the Company. But as the secretary was alleged to have stolen the scrip from the offices of the Company:

Held, that Newsome could establish his rights only by action.

This was an application for an order directing that the share register of the respondent company be amended so as to show the number of shares held by each shareholder and for further relief.

The applicants' affidavit stated that the company was incorporated and registered in this colony on the 3rd August, 1899, with a capital of £25,000, for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the business heretofore carried on by Oreste Z. Nannucci as steam-dye works and steam laundry, and certain other two businesses. Petitioners, who said they were shareholders of the company, alleged that in several respects the company had been mismanaged. They said that statutory meetings which ought to have been held at certain periods had not been held, that balance-sheets and statements of account had not been framed as required, and that Mr. Nannucci had utilised moneys of the company for purposes not connected with the business of the company. Petitioners said that Mr. Nannucci had treated the business for some years past as if it had been his own, and they, as shareholders, had not been able to ascertain the true position of the company's affairs, and had been refused inspection of the books. Petitioners did not hold one-quarter of the shares in the company, and were consequently unable to avail themselves of the 116th and 120th sections of the Companies Act, 1892. Petitioners alleged that more shares had been issued than was authorised, viz., 25,007. They prayed for an order that the share register of Nannucci, Limited, be forthwith amended, so as to show the correct holdings of all shareholders, including the shares of petitioners, so that the total shares issued therein should not exceed the authorised capital of the company; that petitioners, or some person on their behalf, be given an inspection of the books; that the accounts of the company be properly made up; the books audited, and a balance-sheet prepared and submitted to the shareholders at a meeting to be held not later than a date to be fixed by the Court; that respondents be ordered to affix the common seal of the company to all share certificates held by the petitioners; and that respondents pay costs of the present application.

The answering affidavit of O. Z. Nannucci stated that it was the intention of the company to carry on the business as a co-operative concern. He entered into an explanation as to the issue of seven shares beyond the authorised capital, and said that this was done under a misapprehension, and that he had been quite ready to refund to the holders the amount they had paid. He said that meetings of shareholders had been called from time to time, but, owing to the absence of a quorum, meetings had had to be adjourned. He denied that he had ever used his position as managing director for his own private benefit, and said that the present trouble was due to one Wyndham Bishop having obtained shares evidently with the intention of inducing deponent to take over his shares at par. Deponent had been willing to discuss the affairs of the company with any person who was interested. He was quite prepared to submit the affairs of the company to the inspection of any reputable person at the expense of petitioners. He believed that the object of the petitioners was to find out trade secrets for the benefit of a competing firm or firms. An affidavit by Denis Edwards, one of the directors, was also read, in which he said that he had been well acquainted with the affairs of the company, and, as far as he was aware, no improper transaction had taken place between O. Z. Nannucci and the respondent company.

Certain replying affidavits were also read, in which Mr. Nannucci's statements were traversed.

Mr. Benjamin was for applicants; Mr. Close was for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin, in answer to the Court, said that three of the petitioners wished to have their shares registered, and all the petitioners claimed to have the common seal of the company affixed to their shares. Counsel said that the irregularities in connection with the company were sufficient to justify the petitioners in demanding an inspection, but, even apart from that, there was ample authority to entitle them to inspection. A company could not issue extra shares without the sanction of an extraordinary meeting of shareholders.

Counsel contended that Nannucci should forego the seven shares. With regard to the irregularity of the non-printing of the articles this was also only a detail, but under the Company Laws they were compelled to print them.

[Buchanan, J.: There is nothing in that. It was typewritten and accepted by the Registrar.]

Mr. Benjamin said that the sealing of the shares was necessary under the 82nd section of the Act. The 14th section provided for the common seal being provided. The holding of meetings was provided for under the 107th section of the Act. A very drastic penalty required that a meeting be held within six months, but in the present case over seven months had elapsed. The 108th section provided for a general meeting every year. With regard to the meetings to be held under the articles of association, these were dealt with in the 28th section of schedule "A." There was, in addition, a special provision in the articles for these meetings. Section 78 of the articles provided for the revision of accounts, and stipulated that seven days previous to the annual general meeting, a printed copy of the balance sheet was to be circulated amongst the members. With regard to the audit of the accounts, it was ordered that one auditor be appointed by the directors and the other by the shareholders.

[Buchanan, J.: How many shareholders are there now?]

Mr. Benjamin: I cannot say, my lord.

Mr. Close: Mr. Nannucci holds over 2,300 shares, and the other director holds 500.

Mr. Benjamin, continuing, said it appeared from the affidavits that no proper meetings had been held. The 97th section stipulated that auditors should have access to all the books of the company, and yet, Mr. Mouatt was unable to obtain access to them when he applied. There were further allegations to the effect that disbursements were being made for Nannucci's private account and debited against the company in the books. With regard to those allegations they could not put anything beyond the bald statement until they had inspected the books. There had undoubtedly been irregularities. No meetings had been held except the one in 1900, when the law on the point was not complied with. The annual general meeting had not been held for all these years. They were told that one was held in December, but nothing was before them. Nannucci, in his affidavit, stated that meetings had been held, but the shareholders had not received notice of it. If Nannucci and a couple of others got together and said, "Now we are holding a meeting," that was not a meeting of the shareholders. It was impossible for the shareholders to know how matters stood when no meetings had been held. With reference to the position taken up by respondent with regard to these irregularities, counsel went on to point out that the allegation against the shares held by Newsome could not stand, seeing that they were properly endorsed and had been held throughout by Newsome since he bought them from Mrs. Harrison. The accounts had not been audited and submitted to the shareholders, as required and no attempt had been made to prove that they had. The reason put forward by Nannucci for not having this audit was absurd. He said he had had litigation but that turned out to be private, and then again he objected to an audit because of the peculiar nature of the business. That was absurd. With regard to the inspection of the books, it was urged that they were desirous of ascertaining trade secrets. That was foolish. What secrets could be learned from the accounts? The right to inspect the books was provided for under the 77th section of Schedule "A." He did not know that it was necessary to quote authority on that point, but there was authority.

[Buchanan, J.: I do not think that is disputed.]

The respondents did not decline an inspection, but they suggested that some independent accountant should make it at petitioners' expense, but Mr. Wyndham Bishop was an experienced accountant, and was also a shareholder. They applied for an inspection of the books on the 10th, and on the 14th they received a notice of the meeting to be held on the 21st to alter the articles of association. The way in which they were drafted was to allow the shareholder with the large number of shares to crush the small shareholders. It was intended under the new articles that no share should be transferred to anybody except a member without the sanction of the directors. Under the articles the majority of shareholders decided the value of the shares, and—

Mr. Buchanan: We have nothing to do with that under this application.

Mr. Benjamin said he only pointed that out, to enable the Court to see the bona fides of Mr. Bishop's application to inspect the books. Continuing, he read extracts from the proposed new articles of association, which he contended vested nearly all the powers in Mr. Nannucci, who was the holder of the majority of shares. He just mentioned that to show the necessity for the minority being protected, and quoted a decision on a similar point in Buckley, page 216. He submitted their only redress was to come before the Court.

Mr. Close said that if any person had a certificate which was not stamped he had a perfect right to go to the company, and have it stamped. The present application was unnecessary. The same held good with regard to registration (section 86 of the Companies' Act quoted). Counsel also cited the English case of Trevor v. Whitworth (12, A.C., 440). He submitted that applicants had not shown that they were aggrieved. The matter of the seven shares was purely trumpetry in relation to the affairs of the company. As to the claim for an inspection of books and accounts, counsel submitted that the petitioners had not made out a case of refusal. On the claim for the accounts to be made up, and books audited, he said that more than two meetings had been held as alleged by petitioners, and balance-sheets had been framed. The petitioners had alleged irregularities which, where they were of importance, had been answered by Mr. Nannucci, or, if they were not answered, they were of a trivial character. He did not propose to touch upon the proposed new articles of association. That was a matter for the company, and if anybody thought he was aggrieved then he could oppose the confirmation. If there was anything that the Court thought required investigation, the respondents would not take the exception under section 116, and he was prepared to consent to an investigation by an independent person. The application was wholly unnecessary, and should be refused, with costs.

Mr. Benjamin, in reply, said that his learned friend now came into court prepared to recognise the seven shares. Hitherto recognition had been refused. Petitioners were entitled to an order that their rights, so far as the seven shares were concerned, should be recognised on the share register. As to the new articles, the new articles would have been passed at the meeting on the 21st May, had it not been for the proceedings that were taken, and the petitioners would then have been deprived of redress. Mr. Bishop had been put off time after time, and he was finally told to come back on the 21st, and he would then have found that the only course petitioners could take would have been to move to have the articles upset. In consequence of the 116th section, the petitioners had been compelled to come to the Court for redress. The Governor would not have been able to appoint a commissioner, even if Nannucci did not object, because the section clearly said one-fourth of the shareholders. With regard to the balance-sheets, it was clear that balance-sheets in accordance with the Act had not been presented. The irregularities had been going on for eight years, and the unfortunate shareholders were entitled to come to the Court for relief.

Buchanan, J.: In 1899 three persons, Mr. Nannucci, Mr. Burge, and Mr. Starling, were carrying on business in the Peninsula. These three persons resolved to float their businesses into a limited liability company, and they arranged between themselves that all the shares in the company should be taken by themselves, and that there should be no shares allotted to the public. In other words, that the capital of the several businesses should be converted into scrip capital. For the purpose of meeting the requirements of the Company's Act, in the registration of the company, it was necessary that the articles of association should be signed by seven shareholders, and for this purpose seven persons signed the articles of association, and each of these seven took one share in the company. These shareholders were the three persons to whom the property belonged, and four other persons. After the formation of the company, the whole of the 25,000 shares, which were proposed to be the capital of the company, were issued to the persons to whom the businesses had belonged, overlooking the fact that seven shares had been issued for the purpose of floating the company. Of those seven shares the Court is now asked to order the registration of the one which was issued to Starling, and one which was issued to Ross. The over-issue, as it is called, of the shares by seven was discovered at the time, and it was resolved to cancel the seven shares originally issued. Nannucci distributed certain shares gratuitously amongst certain employees. He gave Ross 15 shares, and it is alleged on the affidavits afterwards that Ross, who was absent from the Colony at the time, when it was resolved to cancel the seven shares, acquiesced in the cancellation. That is not denied. Of the other three persons, who signed the trust deed, Michelsen, who had one share, had received a gratuitous distribution of 10 shares, and had subsequently surrendered his one share to Nannucci. Dennis Edwards, the sixth person who had signed the deed, had acquired certain other shares of the company, and has become a director of the company, and he takes no part to insist upon his share being registered. The seventh signatory, E.

Nannucci, was also one of those who received a gratuitous distribution of shares, and he, too, agreed to the cancellation, and does not wish to have his one share registered. As to the share of the petitioner Starling, which it is alleged has not been cancelled he was one of the original persons for whose benefit the company was floated, and he, as one of the floaters of the company, took his portion of the shares in the company, and said nothing about his additional share. Moreover, he was one of the directors, and I do not think he can now be heard to take advantage of his own oversight as a director and claim the registration of that share. He had originally a number of shares in the company, which he had disposed of, and he has now no interest in the company, and I do not think it is equitable to allow him to come in in respect of the one share agreed to be cancelled. Ross, it is alleged, agreed to the cancellation; he had received gratuitous shares, and though he now asks for it, I think it is unnecessary to make any order on the subject, because he never before made a request to be registered in respect of the one of these shares. The more important application is that of Harry Newsome to have 100 shares registered in his name. He had nothing to do with the original floating of the company, and he alleges that he bought these shares in 1903 from the then secretary of the company, Mr. Hilliar. He did nothing at the time to get these shares registered, but towards the end of 1905 he instructed his attorney to apply to the company to have the shares registered, and he received an answer that Hilliar, who had sold him these shares, had no right whatever to sell the shares. The shares were 100 of those originally distributed by Nannucci amongst the employees, and were given to Mrs. Harrison. Nannucci purchased them from Mrs. Harrison with the object of having them transferred to Hilliar, on his paying the price of same, but it is said that Hilliar never paid the price. It is alleged on affidavits that Hilliar improperly abstracted the scrip of these shares from the offices of the company, and that he embezzled certain moneys of the company, and then suddenly disappeared. Under these circumstances the Court cannot say at this stage that Newsome has established his right to have these shares registered in his name. It will be open to Mr. Newsome to bring an action to have his right to the shares declared, should he be so advised. So far as the first prayer of the petition, therefore, is concerned, no order can be made. In reference to the application of the common seal of the company to be affixed to certain shares, it appears from the articles of association that if the common seal is affixed 15 per cent certificate is to be paid to the company. If that 1s. per certificate is tendered to the company, and the stamp is refused, then there may well be an application to the Court, but it does not appear that there has been any such tender, or any refusal in this case. The next thing asked for is that petitioners, or some one on their behalf, be given inspection of the books of account at such reasonable times as the Court may seem meet. Now, the only person who has made any application for an inspection of the books is the applicant Bishop, and it is not clear on the affidavits that there was any refusal to give him such inspection. An appointment was made for the purpose, and he went at a time when the respondent Nannucci was not there to keep the appointment, but an inspection was almost immediately after offered, and Bishop could have had inspection at any other time. If the company had refused to give him inspection he would certainly have been entitled to an order, because the company is bound to allow every shareholder an inspection at all reasonable times. The next prayer is that the accounts of the company be properly made up, and the books audited and a balance-sheet framed and submitted to a meeting of shareholders to be fixed by the Court. The books of the company for two years, 1903-5, were not audited, but the respondents say they are now being audited. The accounts for the past year are being audited, but no meeting has been held as yet in this year. Under the articles of association the company is bound to have two half-yearly meetings, one in February and the other in July, and the Act also requires that the accounts shall be brought up at such annual meetings to a date not more than three months previous to the date of such meeting. There has been no meeting this year. The directors are at fault here, and they should have taken more prompt action and should have had the accounts prepared and submitted to the shareholders. The applicants are shareholders, and they are entitled to have these meetings duly held, and they are entitled to come to the Court in the failure of the company to have these meetings. That is the only point on which the applicants have succeeded, and I think they are entitled to an order that a meeting of the company, which ought to have been held in February last, shall be held within a reasonable time, and I think that one month would be ample time to allow, because there will have to be a meeting in July. It is part of the duty of the directors to have the accounts printed and sent to the shareholders one week before the meeting takes place. The directors in this matter have certainly been at fault. It is alleged that there has been a good deal of laxity in the management of the company. Whether there has been more than irregularity does not clearly appear, but the directors certainly have failed in regard to holding the meetings. As to costs, I think that as the applicants had some cause for coming to the Court, the company should pay the costs of the motion, except the costs of Starling and Newsome, which must be borne by themselves, as they have failed to establish their position. They are neither of them shareholders, and neither of them is entitled to any order. The order of the Court will be that a meeting of the company be called by the directors within one month from this date, and that the respondents submit at such meeting the company's accounts from January 1, 1901, to December 31, 1905, duly audited, the costs incurred by or against Starling and Newsome to be paid by them, the other costs of the application, that is, of the shareholders, to be paid by respondents.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte TAYLOR. { 1907.
{ June 17th.

Mr. Palmer moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, Barnet Taylor, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce, with custody of the child and forfeiture of benefits of the marriage. The parties were married in community of property in Cape Town last year, and respondent, it was alleged, deserted applicant in February of this year, and was residing at Kimberley. He had failed to contribute to petitioner's support.

Petitioner appeared, and said that she was without means with which to bring an action.

Rule nisi granted, upon counsel's certificate of probabilis causa being filed with the Registrar, rule returnable on the 2nd July.

Ex parte BURGER.

Mr. Roux moved on the petition of the executors testamentary of estate Burger for an order authorising a mortgage of the minors' share of certain property at Eendekuil bequeathed by testator to his three sons. The petitioners asked leave to mortgage the minors' share jointly and equally with the shares of the other legatees in the sum of £775.

Order granted in terms of Master's report, Petrus Olthoff authorised to pass the mortgage on behalf of the minor.

Ex parte ESTATE COWLING.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved on the petition of the executrix testamentary for leave to mortgage certain property in Cape Town for the sum of £275, in order to satisfy certain debts. Petitioner, it appeared, was the sole heiress under the will. She and her late husband were married in England.

[Maasdorp, J.: Why can't she administer her own property without coming to the Court.]

Mr. Buchanan: The Registrar refuses to allow the bond to go through.

Order granted as prayed.

AJAM V. TALEBODIEN AND OTHERS.

This was an application upon notice of motion to the respondents calling upon them to show cause why an order should not be granted in the following terms: (1) Setting aside the proceedings which took place in the Bethel Hall on the 3rd April, 1907; (2) restraining you from holding yourselves out to the public as persons in authority and having power to control and administer the affairs of the Moslem Cemetery Board, and preventing you from in any way dealing with the cemetery affairs; (3) compelling Imaun Talebodiën and Abdol Cader to deliver up all books relating to the Moslem Cemetery now in their possession; (4) interdicting the Standard Bank from parting with the funds to the credit of the Moslem Cemetery Board Fund account.

When the application originally came before the Court, the Chief Justice, by consent, appointed Advocate W. Porter Buchanan as commissioner to examine the credentials of all who claimed a right to vote, to receive nominations, and to accept votes for the election of a new Board, and reserved the question of costs (17 C.T.R., 370). Mr. Buchanan had sat and received nominations and votes, and, as a result, had declared applicant and his supporters elected, the respondent and his party having retired from the field after nominations had been handed in.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones) was for respondents.

Dr. Greer said he took it that the respondents now appeared on the question of costs.

Mr. McGregor said their contention was that the applicants had taken the wrong remedy, and that they should be ordered to pay costs.

Dr. Greer briefly traced the course of events which led up to the application. On May 18, 1886, he said, the Moslem community in Cape Town purchased a burial ground, and £1,000 was raised by subscription for the purchase of the ground. There was a deed of transfer, together with certain conditions attached, and those conditions governed the election of the Board by whom the ground was to be administered, and provided that persons who subscribed to the fund of £1,000 should be electors of the Board. As a matter of fact, a Board was elected originally, and after that nothing seemed to have been done. The old Board went on from time to time, apparently filling up vacancies as they arose up to the beginning of this year, when the existing Board, as then constituted, elected as secretary one Abdol Cader. It was alleged that the secretary could only be elected by the members of the Board. As a matter of fact, Abdol Cader was not a member of the Board. Then the present applicant and his supporters said that as the then existing Board had contravened the conditions a new election must be held. An election was held. After further disputes, an action was brought in the Magistrate's Court by Ajam and his party to prevent Talebodiën and his supporters from continuing in office. The Magistrate said that as there was some doubt about the legality of the election of the Ajam Board, they should give notice of the election, and elect a fresh Board. That course was adopted, and a meeting was held on the 9th March. At that meeting, which, the affidavits said, was attended by 700 people, Ajam and his Board were elected. Notice was given in the "Cape Times" of this election. On the 3rd April a meeting was held by the respondent and his party, and applicants alleged that they were prevented from attending that meeting, that there were 73 people at the meeting, and that more than 100 people were refused admittance. At that meeting Talebodiën and some of his followers were elected as the Board.

Mr. McGregor (interposing) said that respondents contended that the second election of applicant and his party was informal, and that fourteen days' notice should have been given under rule 6, instead of seven merely.

Dr. Greer (proceeding) said that the Court appointed Mr. W. Porter Buchanan as commissioner, and he had held meetings of subscribers for the purpose of receiving nominations and votes. Both parties put in nominations at the first meeting, but before the meeting was held at which votes were received by the commissioner, Talebodiën and his supporters intimated that they retired from the contest, and at the meeting Ajam and his party were declared elected. Counsel argued that the respondents should pay costs of the proceedings. Applicants said that they were a properly constituted Board, and that respondents by their opposition had caused needless expense. The Board elected before the commissioner was appointed was precisely the same as that which had now been elected, with one exception only, out of a total of eleven members. Counsel cited Du Toit v. Domingo (14 S.C., 127) and Berhardien v. Intillah (6 C.T.R., 41).

Mr. McGregor submitted that applicant should pay costs of the proceedings. Domingo's case could be clearly distinguished from the present case. The form of the application was wrong. Neither party apparently persisted in saying that his Board was the right one, and a new Board had to be constituted. Furthermore, the course of events showed that applicants were not the proper parties to get what they asked for in the notice of motion.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that in this case the old Cemetery Board that managed the cemetery for the Moslem community was, in course of time, by certain irregular proceedings, rendered illegal in its constitution. It seems that all parties were satisfied that the Board could continue no longer. Thereupon the applicant and his party took it upon themselves to undertake a new election, and when the members of that alleged new Board had been elected, they proceeded against the members of the old Board in respect of certain funds. The question came before the Magistrate, and the Magistrate seems to have had some difficulty in deciding who exactly were the legal representatives of the Moslem community in respect of their interests in this cemetery, and he advised the parties to have a new election and to settle their disputes in that way. Thereupon the applicant seems to have taken it upon himself to give notice for a new election, which took place. What exactly were the powers and the rights of the applicant in taking those duties upon himself does not appear. However, his authority was not questioned so much as the nature of the proceedings. The respondent and his party contended that there had been certain irregularities in the election, and they, on their part, set about having a new Board elected. The result was that two antagonistic Cemetery Boards came into existence, and the question was raised by them before this Court as to which was the legally-constituted body entitled to represent the Moslem community. It was found necessary because of the difficulties which had been created to direct that a new election should take place, and to secure regularity and order in that election a commissioner was appointed by the Court to see that everything took place in due form. That election has taken place, and the body elected must be regarded as the legal representatives of the community, although even now the respondent and his party do not seem satisfied with the results. The only question which this Court has now to decide is as to the payment of the costs incurred in the different proceedings. When the applicant set about making arrangements for the election of the new Board, he said not to have given sufficient notice, and that was the irregularity upon which the respondent contended that the election had been illegal. Now, it does seem to me that the respondent had some ground of complaint, but then his proper course would have been not to set about having another party election of his own, but to have had the previous election set aside on the ground of irregularity. Instead of that he sets about what seems to me to be also quite irregular and illegal, having a Board elected which, instead of representing the community, seems to me to have represented merely a fraction of the people interested. It is quite clear that there were irregularities on both sides, and that the parties could not have settled this matter without coming to court, and having the aid of the Court and the directions of the Court to clear up their difficulties. Under the circumstances it seems to me that each party should pay his own costs and half the costs of the commission.

Dr. Greer: Will your lordship declare the new Board elected? The attorneys on both sides agree that a fee of 25 guineas would be a fair fee for the commissioner, who had very hard and arduous work to do.

Maasdorp, J., said the persons mentioned in list B of the declaration would be declared duly elected as members of the Cemetery Board. The commissioner's fee would be fixed at 25 guineas.

Mr. McGregor: I take it half the costs of the commission does not mean that my learned friend's clients can take half the money standing to the credit of the Board to pay their costs.

Maasdorp, J.: They are fighting out their private quarrels, and they cannot use the money of the Board.

Ex parte ESTATE BADENHORST.

Mr. Toms moved, on behalf of the petitioners, the executors testamentary in the estate of Margaretha Elizabeth Badenhorst, of Colesberg, for an extension of six months in order to file the liquidation and distribution account, the costs of the application to be borne by the estate.

Order granted as prayed.

BRAUDE V. BRAUDE.

Mr. M. Bisset was for the applicant, and Mr. Benjamin was for respondent,

Ex parte FRIEDLANDER BROTHERS.

Mr. Close applied, on behalf of the applicants, for an order authorising the cancellation of certain sales.

Mr. Howel Jones appeared on behalf of the Colonial Government.

Mr. Percy Jones mentioned that there was a similar one in which one Albrecht was concerned, and he would like it taken with the present case.

Mr. Close: In this matter of Friedlander, it is a case where a number of allotments in the township of De Aar were sold in 1902, and we wish to have a cancellation. The Court made an order for the publication of the rule in the "Richmond Era" and the "Gazette." The day after the instructions for the insertion of the notice in the papers had been made, a communication was received stating that the "Richmond Era" did not exist, and a second application was made to have the notice inserted in the "Midland News." After this order was made, it was found that the information about the "Richmond Era" was wrong, and that it did exist, so the notice was inserted in both papers. I just mention this to show—

Mr. Close: Yes, my lord. Continuing, he explained that the rule of Court was a rule nisi, calling on all persons to show cause why the sales by petitioner of the township lots in De Aar should not be declared cancelled, and why the costs of the case should not come out of the money already paid. There was a further prayer in the petition, that on cancellation of this sale that the Court would make an order relieving the applicants from paying transfer dues.

Mr. Percy Jones said his case was the same as that made by Mr. Close.

Mr. Howel Jones said he appeared to oppose the application for the return of the transfer dues. He had just seen the papers in the Albrecht case. He wished to ask the Court to consider the circumstances very carefully before the rule nisi was made absolute.

[Buchanan, J.: Go on with your second application, Mr. Close.]

Mr. Close, having explained the second portion of the petition, proceeded to argue that where the Court cancelled a sale there should be a remission of the transfer dues. He contended that they were legally entitled to ask the Court to cancel the sale, and when that was done, under the section they were entitled to a remission of the transfer dues. The duty payable would be over £200, and £130 had only been received out of the sale, and there were heavy expenses incurred besides.

Mr. Howel Jones said this was a new point, which had never before been raised.

Mr. Percy Jones made formal application for the cancellation of the sale in his case.

Mr. Howel Jones said he wished to ask the Court to be careful before they cancelled the sale. The true meaning of section 18 was where there had been fraud or some such circumstances, then the Court could remit the transfer dues, but to this case he held that the 18th section did not refer. In the case of Friedlander, it was stipulated in the conditions of sale that if the purchasers did not take transfer within a month than the sale should be cancelled. They only asked for an order confirming a cancellation that had taken place by mutual consent. It was quite unnecessary for the Court to cancel the sale.

[Buchanan, J.: In cases where no money was paid do you claim transfer dues?]

Mr. Howel Jones: Yes, my lord, if the cancellation is not exercised before six months have elapsed.

His Lordship: But would that not come under the 32nd section?

Mr. Howel Jones: Yes, my lord. His argument was that the only thing that was necessary for the Court to do was to confirm the cancellation of a sale already agreed upon, and the payment of the transfer dues would be considered by the Civil Commissioner when a new sale was effected. It was unnecessary for them to come to the Court for confirmation of the cancellation. He would ask the Court not to make an order under section 18 unless the Court had no other alternative. He contended that if Friedlanders wished to sell the lots again, they could do so, without applying to the Court for permission.

Mr. Percy Jones said a similar action to that he proposed had been granted in the Transvaal. They asked that the sale be cancelled, and the balance paid in to the Master.

Mr. Close, having been heard in reply,

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 12th).

Further argument was heard. Mr. P. S. T. Jones cited in argument Ex parte Stevens (6 C.T.R., 150), Liquidators, South African and Orange Free State Mining Association (1906, T.S.C., 346), Scott v. Isaacs (12 C.T.R., 791), and Estate Owen (16 C.T.R., 79, 290, and 439).

Buchanan, J.: There are three applications before the Court. In each case application is made for the cancellation of certain contracts of sale under the 18th section of the Transfer Duty Act, No. 5, 1884, which reads: "As often as any contract of sale, upon which duty shall be payable, shall be set aside, or cancelled, or declared or made void by the judgment of any competent Court, the transfer duty upon such sale, if unpaid, shall not be payable; and if paid shall be returned." I take it, therefore, that though no transfer duty is payable on a sale cancelled by the Court, the judgment of the Court may impose any condition that seems required by the justice of the case in granting this order for the cancellation of the sale. In the case of the Fernwood Estate, the Court will order that the sale be cancelled without any further condition. The rule will be made absolute, and no condition will be imposed. The effect of the order will be that there will be no transfer duty payable at all. In that case there has been no portion of the purchase price paid. In the two subsequent applications there have been payments made on account. When we look at the two subsequent sections of the Act, we find that this Act imposes a duty upon the transfer of any land from one person to another, but where no transfer is effected, then only in certain cases is the duty payable. Under the 20th section, it is competent for the purposes of a contract of sale by mutual consent to cancel that contract within six months, and if no part of the purchase price has been paid, or no consideration given for the cancellation of the contract, then under section 20 of the Act there is no duty upon such sale. In the case of Albrecht, there was no written contract put in, and I do not think that that section applies to Albrecht's case, but it does apply to Friedlander's case. In the case of Friedlander a number of lots of ground were put up by the applicants for sale, a number of them were bought by different people, and on a number of these sales no portion of the purchase price has been paid at all. In regard to those sales, the Court, in ordering the cancellation of these sales, finds that they come under the 18th section, and the rule will be the same as the rule in the Fernwood Estate. All sales by which no purchase price of any kind has been paid will be cancelled under the 18th section of the Ordinance, and consequently no duty will be paid on those sales. In regard to the sales on which portions of the purchase price have been paid, the Court will apply the principle of the 21st section of the Act, which is to the effect that as often as a contract of sale upon which duty is payable shall be by mutual consent cancelled, and a part of the purchase price has been paid, then transfer duty shall be payable only upon the part of the purchase price which has been paid. The 21st section, it is true, is a section by which cancellation takes place by mutual consent, but where persons under written declarations of sale give the right of cancellation, if the conditions are not carried out, it is in effect a mutual consent to cancel the sale, and, therefore, in ordering the cancellation under the 18th section, I think I should follow the principle laid down in the 21st section. The spirit of the Act seems to be that where a sale is cancelled, and no portion of the purchase price has been paid, no duty should be payable, but where there has been a portion of the purchase price paid, duty will be payable on that portion of the purchase price which has been paid, and as to the balance in Friedlander's case, any balance after the duties have been paid the seller is entitled to keep, that will be declared forfeited, and the rule will be made absolute, duty to be paid on the portions of the purchase price paid, the balance declared forfeited, with costs against the parties. With regard to Albrecht's estate, the same order will be made, and the sale will be declared cancelled, on condition that the transfer duty is paid on any portion of the purchase price which has been paid. From that amount, the sellers will be entitled to deduct their interest and costs, and the balance, if any, will be ordered to be paid over to the Master. In the Fernwood estate the rule will be made absolute, with costs; in Albrecht's case the rule will be made absolute on paying transfer duty on the amount of the purchase price paid, from the balance the sellers to deduct interest and costs, and the balance, if any, to be paid to the Master; and in Friedlander's case the sale is cancelled, on condition that the duty is paid on the amount of the purchase price paid, the balance to be forfeited, with judgment for costs against respondents.

THOMAS V. ROBERTSON. } 1907.
} June 13th.

Mining — Prospector's rights —
Transfer of land subject to rights—Interdict.

Respondent had agreed to sell certain prospecting rights over his farm with option of purchase for two years to applicant. It was admitted that this period was extended for at least six months. During the currency of this agreement respondent sold the farm to his brother.

Held, that respondent must be interdicted from passing transfer until the lapse of the agreement, unless the transferee should acknowledge applicant's rights.

This was an application to make absolute a certain rule nisi restraining respondent from passing transfer of a certain farm, Zandkraal, in the district of George, unless there be therein a recognition of applicant's rights.

The affidavit of the petitioner (David P. Thomas) set forth that he claimed to have entered into an agreement with respondent (Arthur Nightingale Robertson), on the 15th March, 1906, which gave him certain rights of prospecting for minerals for a period of two years or payment of £5 a year and an option of purchase at the end of that period. The rent was paid from time to time. On the 18th June, 1906, the agreement was extended for a further period of two years. Petitioner had expended a good deal of money on the property as a mineralised property. He had recently been informed that respondent had alienated the property to his brother, Frederick Augustus Robertson, but that transfer had not been passed. Applicant submitted that he was entitled to have his agreement attached to the transfer of the property, so as to protect his rights under the agreement.

Respondent, in answering affidavits, denied having entered into a renewal for two years, and said that his impression was that the contract had been extended for six months. As far as he knew, petitioner had not spent much money in prospecting, and had not done any work on the farm for a period of about ten months. Deponent had not attached much importance to the option, as applicant had gone to Europe, and had not been on the farm for some months, and when he agreed to sell to his brother, he was under the impression that the contract had only a few months to run. Respondent was in pecuniary difficulties, and the sale was entered into with his brother in order to help him out of his difficulties. It was not until after the sale had gone through, that respondent mentioned the option to his brother. It was further stated that had F. A. Robertson not come to the assistance of respondent the latter would have had to surrender his estate.

Applicant, in replying affidavits, said that he carried on operations on the farm for a period of sixteen months until he went to Europe. The work was stopped while he was away, owing to certain causes, and he was detained in Europe longer than he had anticipated.

Mr. Benjamin was for applicant; Mr. Upington was for respondent.

Mr. Upington submitted that the application was quite unprecedented. Applicant was attempting to obtain a declaration of rights under this agreement upon motion. It had never been laid down that these mining agreements were leases of land. No reason had been shown for restraining transfer in the present case. Counsel cited Henderson and Another v. Hanecke (20 S.C., 505), Estate Thomas v. Carr and Another (20 S.C., 354), Johns v. Colonial Government (15 S.C., 245), and United Mines of Bultfontein v. De Beers Consolidated Mines (17 S.C., 419). No right in the land itself was, he submitted, conveyed by the agreement with applicant. He cited Voet 18, 1, 2. The application was to interfere with a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. It was not alleged that a fraudulent transaction had taken place between respondent and his brother. There was no reason whatever for making the rule nisi absolute.

Buchanan, J.: The respondent, A. N. Robertson, entered into an agreement with the applicant giving him the right to prospect on the respondent's farm and with option of purchase. This agreement was entered into on March 15, 1906, and was for a period of two years, ending on March 15, 1907. The consideration of agreement was £5 a year, which was paid. Afterwards the parties agreed to extend the agreement for an additional two years, ending on March 15, 1907. The respondent, A. N. Robertson, says in his affidavit that he was under the impression that the extension was to be for only six months, and not two years, but even that period has not yet been reached. Applicant left the country on business, and when he came back, he found that during his absence A. N. Robertson had sold the farm to his brother—the other respondent. Applicant, on hearing of the sale immediately took steps to interdict the transfer of the property from one Robertson to the other. A rule nisi was granted, and this rule is now before the Court for the purpose of being made absolute. It is contended that that agreement is not one which runs with the land, and that whether the property is transferred or not, it makes no difference to the remedy of the applicant, which is only a claim for damages. But if the transfer is allowed to pass free from the obligations under the agreement, the rights of the applicant will be entirely defeated. On the question of whether the transferee had notice of this agreement, I will not express an opinion. There are enough affidavits to show that he had. This matter will not now be decided, but if A. N. Robertson is allowed to dispossess himself of the land, he will not be able to carry out the agreement with Thomas, and as that agreement, according to the written contract, exists for two years, the interdict will have to last as long as the agreement lasts, but leave will be given to respondents to bring an action to set aside the interdict, such action to be brought within three months. It was alleged that the property was mortgaged at the time of the agreement. If so, the mortgage being prior to applicant's agreement, the agreement cannot affect the mortgagee. That question is not before the Court at present. The order will be that Thomas will be entitled to have an order restricting respondents from transferring the property while the agreement lasts, unless the transferee acknowledges the applicant's rights.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte BEARD AND
OTHERS. { 1907.
June 14th
„ 17th.

Municipality — Closed road —
Owners of adjoining land.

S., being the owner of land within a Municipality, sold it in lots with proper roads for the use of the owners and the roads were taken over by the Municipal Council. Subsequently one of the roads was lawfully closed by direction of Government, and S., having been called upon to show cause why transfer of the land should not be made in favour of the owners of the adjacent land on both sides of the road raised no objection. The Council raised no objection but insisted upon a condition authorizing the use of the road for carrying off storm water from a cross road.

Held that, subject to such condition, the transfer should be allowed.

Dr. Greer moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £33 17s. 11d., amount of a certain bill of costs, taxed and allowed between attorney and client, for services rendered and disbursements made, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Order granted.

Mr. Van der Byl moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £38, and for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £1 18s., being costs of collection.

Buchanan, J.: The Court cannot grant costs twice over. Costs of this action will be costs of collection. Provisional sentence will be granted on the promissory note as prayed, but there will be no order on the other claim.

Postea (June 17).

Counsel repeated the application for the commission, and cited Lindenberg and De Villiers v. Palmer (16, C.T.R., 827).

Buchanan, J., said he did not see how the attorney could claim more than his taxed costs, and would have to refuse the application.

REX V. JACOBS.

Splitting of criminal charge—
Forgery—Uttering.

The same person cannot be convicted and sentenced on the double charge of forging and uttering one and the same document.

Buchanan, J.: This matter came before me as Judge of the week. The case had been remitted by the Attorney-General on a charge of forgery and uttering. The Magistrate (Resident Magistrate's Court, Beaufort West), had split it up into two separate charges, and imposed two different sentences. The second sentence will be quashed, otherwise the proceedings will be confirmed.

This was an application for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

At the last hearing of the action an application was made to close the De Villiers-road, Wynberg, and that was granted. The petitioners now applied for an additional order vesting in them the title to the land over which that road originally existed. The papers showed that the lands were still vested in the estate of the late John Stewart, who died in 1882, and the result is that the land is unrepresented. The Wynberg Municipality contended that if the rights in the De Villiers-road were transferred there would be no outlet for the stormwater at the foot of Stamford-road unless some arrangements were made by petitioners for taking it away.

The petitioners contended that any provision for the carrying off of the water should be carried out by the Municipal Council of Wynberg. Hitherto no arrangements had been made for carrying off the water.

Mr. Benjamin moved

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan appeared on behalf of the Wynberg Municipal Council to oppose.

Mr. Buchanan argued that probably as soon as the petitioners got title to this road they might erect a wall or take other steps to prevent this water from going over its present course.

[Buchanan, J.: What becomes of the water now?]

Mr. Buchanan: It runs on to this road.

[Buchanan, J.: Well, then, it will continue to run on there.]

Mr. Buchanan contended that once the road was vested in the petitioners, that they could take steps to interfere with the course of this water. It was not the duty of the Municipal Council to erect this arrangement for taking away the stormwater. The fact was that this property was either vested in Stewart's Estate, because the petitioners had not shown any cause for coming under the Derelict Lands Act or else under section 106 of Act 45 of 1882, was vested in the Municipality.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that if the transfer was to go through it should go through subject to the conditions imposed by the Council.

Mr. Benjamin said the petitioners should get transfer from Stewart's Estate.

[Buchanan, J.: But what claim have you against the estate?]

Mr. Benjamin: We claim that this road has been closed, and we are the adjacent owners.

[Buchanan, J.: But you have not held for 40 years.]

Mr. Benjamin argued that in view of the decision in the case of Cape Brexeries v. Whitehead that they were entitled to claim. Under the Derelict Lands Act, they were entitled to claim by prescription or any other grounds.

[Buchanan, J.: You can't claim by prescription.]

Mr. Benjamin: Well, by grant. He submitted that the land was not vested in the Municipality, but in Stewart's estate.

[Buchanan, J.: Then what are the grounds for claiming against Stewart's estate?]

Mr. Benjamin replied that that road was there for the use of the adjoining owners, and Stewart's estate had no land there now.

Mr. Benjamin: They have, if they own all the adjoining lots. Every tittle of title had gone from Stewart, and this land was not vested in the Municipality, who only had a right of way. The Municipality claimed no right to the sub-soil. This road had been dedicated to the petitioners, and that was the title on which they came into court.

Buchanan, J., stated that as this case was ordered to stand over when the rule nisi was granted, to be heard before two Judges, it would have to stand over for two Judges.

Postea (June 17).

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice BUCHANAN.]

Mr. Buchanan argued that the Municipality claimed that some provision should be made for carrying away the stormwater from Stamford-road, which ran into the road which the applicants wished to close up. The applicants could not claim transfer of the road, because they did not allege title by prescription or contract as required by the Derelict Lands Act. The dominium in the road was vested either in the Municipality or in Stewart's estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I should like to hear Mr. Benjamin on that point. In whom is the dominium in the road vested?]

Mr. Benjamin: When the road was granted, it was vested in the Municipality. Subsequently, when it was closed up again, it reverted to Stewart's estate. The road was a reservation in favour of the proprietors of the adjacent lots of land. The dominium in the soil was granted to them. Counsel cited Philips v. Porter (1876 B., 192) and Hofmeyr's Case (1 S.C., 424). The Municipality no longer had any interest in the matter. The Colonial Secretary closed the road, and his decision, subject to the conditions he imposed by section 8 of Act 41 of 1899, was final.

Mr. Buchanan was heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J., asked Mr. Benjamin if it would not be well for the petitioners to consent to the conditions made by the Wynberg Municipality.

Mr. Benjamin: The position we take up is that the Municipality has nothing to do with this matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, yes; because it was on their appeal that the Colonial Secretary gave his decision.]

De Villiers, C.J.: When this application was first made, the Court was careful to provide that the notice of the application, with the rule, should be served on the executors or representatives of the late Mr. Stewart (17 C.T.R., 318). It is contended now that the dominium is vested in the Council, but even if the dominium had been at one time vested in the Council, the road has been closed by the proper authority, and the only persons who could claim the ownership are the representatives of the late Mr. Stewart. Well, now, notice has been given to them, and no objection has been raised, and I am quite prepared to treat this case as a case where the respondent is in default. It is unnecessary for the Court to decide whether this case comes under the principle laid down in the case of Philips v. Porter, or the principles in the case of Hofmeyr v. De Waal, because it seems that no objection has been raised by the representatives of the estate concerned. It seems that there was no intention at the time of sale to retain the ownership of the land on which the road was marked out. Under those circumstances, I consider the rule ought to be made absolute. But the further question arises now, whether Wynberg Town Council had not so much interest in the matter as to appear before the Court for the purpose of pointing out what the rule nisi meant. It must be borne in mind that at the time the Colonial Secretary settled this point Stamford-road did not appear on the plans, and now, of course, some provision ought to be made for the stormwater. The Wynberg Municipal Council are quite right in seeing that some arrangement is made for carrying off the stormwater, but they are not right in saying that petitioners should do it. I think power should be given to the Municipality to carry off the stormwater which comes down the Stamford-road. Therefore the rule will be made absolute, with the condition that the Wynberg Municipality shall be entitled to use the road in question for the purpose of carrying off the stormwater. As to costs, Wynberg Municipal Council were quite right in raising the question, and therefore the costs of the Council will have to be paid by the petitioners.

Buchanan, J., concurred, and said the question of dominium still remained an open one.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

STARLING AND OTHERS V. { 1907.
NANNUCCI LTD. { June 14th.

Limited Liability Company —
Shares — Over issue — Cancellation—Registration.

Three persons, N. B. and S., having three separate businesses, all engaged in the same trade, agreed to amalgamate their businesses and form a limited liability company. Each of these persons and also four others, among whom was one R., signed the Articles of Association, and one share was allotted to each. The capital of the Company was divided into 25,000 shares, and the whole of these were allotted to N., B. and S. The above seven shares were never registered, and the directors, on discovering this oversight, resolved to cancel these shares. At that time S. had ceased to be a director and had disposed of all his shares, save the share originally allotted to him. S. and R. now each applied for the registration of his original one share.

Held that, as S. had been a director of the Company and ought as such to have been aware of the over issue of shares he was not entitled to take advantage of his own negligence and obtain registration of his share.

Held further that as R. had agreed to the cancellation of the seven shares over issued, and had never before applied for the registration of his share or other shares which he had received gratuitously, his application must be refused.

One Newsome claimed the registration of 100 shares purchased from a former secretary of the Company. But as the secretary was alleged to have stolen the scrip from the offices of the Company:

Held, that Newsome could establish his rights only by action.

This was an application for an order directing that the share register of the respondent company be amended so as to show the number of shares held by each shareholder and for further relief.

The applicants' affidavit stated that the company was incorporated and registered in this colony on the 3rd August, 1899, with a capital of £25,000, for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the business heretofore carried on by Oreste Z. Nannucci as steam-dye works and steam laundry, and certain other two businesses. Petitioners, who said they were shareholders of the company, alleged that in several respects the company had been mismanaged. They said that statutory meetings which ought to have been held at certain periods had not been held, that balance-sheets and statements of account had not been framed as required, and that Mr. Nannucci had utilised moneys of the company for purposes not connected with the business of the company. Petitioners said that Mr. Nannucci had treated the business for some years past as if it had been his own, and they, as shareholders, had not been able to ascertain the true position of the company's affairs, and had been refused inspection of the books. Petitioners did not hold one-quarter of the shares in the company, and were consequently unable to avail themselves of the 116th and 120th sections of the Companies Act, 1892. Petitioners alleged that more shares had been issued than was authorised, viz., 25,007. They prayed for an order that the share register of Nannucci, Limited, be forthwith amended, so as to show the correct holdings of all shareholders, including the shares of petitioners, so that the total shares issued therein should not exceed the authorised capital of the company; that petitioners, or some person on their behalf, be given an inspection of the books; that the accounts of the company be properly made up; the books audited, and a balance-sheet prepared and submitted to the shareholders at a meeting to be held not later than a date to be fixed by the Court; that respondents be ordered to affix the common seal of the company to all share certificates held by the petitioners; and that respondents pay costs of the present application.

The answering affidavit of O. Z. Nannucci stated that it was the intention of the company to carry on the business as a co-operative concern. He entered into an explanation as to the issue of seven shares beyond the authorised capital, and said that this was done under a misapprehension, and that he had been quite ready to refund to the holders the amount they had paid. He said that meetings of shareholders had been called from time to time, but, owing to the absence of a quorum, meetings had had to be adjourned. He denied that he had ever used his position as managing director for his own private benefit, and said that the present trouble was due to one Wyndham Bishop having obtained shares evidently with the intention of inducing deponent to take over his shares at par. Deponent had been willing to discuss the affairs of the company with any person who was interested. He was quite prepared to submit the affairs of the company to the inspection of any reputable person at the expense of petitioners. He believed that the object of the petitioners was to find out trade secrets for the benefit of a competing firm or firms. An affidavit by Denis Edwards, one of the directors, was also read, in which he said that he had been well acquainted with the affairs of the company, and, as far as he was aware, no improper transaction had taken place between O. Z. Nannucci and the respondent company.

Certain replying affidavits were also read, in which Mr. Nannucci's statements were traversed.

Mr. Benjamin was for applicants; Mr. Close was for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin, in answer to the Court, said that three of the petitioners wished to have their shares registered, and all the petitioners claimed to have the common seal of the company affixed to their shares. Counsel said that the irregularities in connection with the company were sufficient to justify the petitioners in demanding an inspection, but, even apart from that, there was ample authority to entitle them to inspection. A company could not issue extra shares without the sanction of an extraordinary meeting of shareholders.

Counsel contended that Nannucci should forego the seven shares. With regard to the irregularity of the non-printing of the articles this was also only a detail, but under the Company Laws they were compelled to print them.

[Buchanan, J.: There is nothing in that. It was typewritten and accepted by the Registrar.]

Mr. Benjamin said that the sealing of the shares was necessary under the 82nd section of the Act. The 14th section provided for the common seal being provided. The holding of meetings was provided for under the 107th section of the Act. A very drastic penalty required that a meeting be held within six months, but in the present case over seven months had elapsed. The 108th section provided for a general meeting every year. With regard to the meetings to be held under the articles of association, these were dealt with in the 28th section of schedule "A." There was, in addition, a special provision in the articles for these meetings. Section 78 of the articles provided for the revision of accounts, and stipulated that seven days previous to the annual general meeting, a printed copy of the balance sheet was to be circulated amongst the members. With regard to the audit of the accounts, it was ordered that one auditor be appointed by the directors and the other by the shareholders.

[Buchanan, J.: How many shareholders are there now?]

Mr. Benjamin: I cannot say, my lord.

Mr. Close: Mr. Nannucci holds over 2,300 shares, and the other director holds 500.

Mr. Benjamin, continuing, said it appeared from the affidavits that no proper meetings had been held. The 97th section stipulated that auditors should have access to all the books of the company, and yet, Mr. Mouatt was unable to obtain access to them when he applied. There were further allegations to the effect that disbursements were being made for Nannucci's private account and debited against the company in the books. With regard to those allegations they could not put anything beyond the bald statement until they had inspected the books. There had undoubtedly been irregularities. No meetings had been held except the one in 1900, when the law on the point was not complied with. The annual general meeting had not been held for all these years. They were told that one was held in December, but nothing was before them. Nannucci, in his affidavit, stated that meetings had been held, but the shareholders had not received notice of it. If Nannucci and a couple of others got together and said, "Now we are holding a meeting," that was not a meeting of the shareholders. It was impossible for the shareholders to know how matters stood when no meetings had been held. With reference to the position taken up by respondent with regard to these irregularities, counsel went on to point out that the allegation against the shares held by Newsome could not stand, seeing that they were properly endorsed and had been held throughout by Newsome since he bought them from Mrs. Harrison. The accounts had not been audited and submitted to the shareholders, as required and no attempt had been made to prove that they had. The reason put forward by Nannucci for not having this audit was absurd. He said he had had litigation but that turned out to be private, and then again he objected to an audit because of the peculiar nature of the business. That was absurd. With regard to the inspection of the books, it was urged that they were desirous of ascertaining trade secrets. That was foolish. What secrets could be learned from the accounts? The right to inspect the books was provided for under the 77th section of Schedule "A." He did not know that it was necessary to quote authority on that point, but there was authority.

[Buchanan, J.: I do not think that is disputed.]

The respondents did not decline an inspection, but they suggested that some independent accountant should make it at petitioners' expense, but Mr. Wyndham Bishop was an experienced accountant, and was also a shareholder. They applied for an inspection of the books on the 10th, and on the 14th they received a notice of the meeting to be held on the 21st to alter the articles of association. The way in which they were drafted was to allow the shareholder with the large number of shares to crush the small shareholders. It was intended under the new articles that no share should be transferred to anybody except a member without the sanction of the directors. Under the articles the majority of shareholders decided the value of the shares, and—

Mr. Buchanan: We have nothing to do with that under this application.

Mr. Benjamin said he only pointed that out, to enable the Court to see the bona fides of Mr. Bishop's application to inspect the books. Continuing, he read extracts from the proposed new articles of association, which he contended vested nearly all the powers in Mr. Nannucci, who was the holder of the majority of shares. He just mentioned that to show the necessity for the minority being protected, and quoted a decision on a similar point in Buckley, page 216. He submitted their only redress was to come before the Court.

Mr. Close said that if any person had a certificate which was not stamped he had a perfect right to go to the company, and have it stamped. The present application was unnecessary. The same held good with regard to registration (section 86 of the Companies' Act quoted). Counsel also cited the English case of Treavor v. Whitworth (12, A.C., 440). He submitted that applicants had not shown that they were aggrieved. The matter of the seven shares was purely trumpetry in relation to the affairs of the company. As to the claim for an inspection of books and accounts, counsel submitted that the petitioners had not made out a case of refusal. On the claim for the accounts to be made up, and books audited, he said that more than two meetings had been held as alleged by petitioners, and balance-sheets had been framed. The petitioners had alleged irregularities which, where they were of importance, had been answered by Mr. Nannucci, or, if they were not answered, they were of a trivial character. He did not propose to touch upon the proposed new articles of association. That was a matter for the company, and if anybody thought he was aggrieved then he could oppose the confirmation. If there was anything that the Court thought required investigation, the respondents would not take the exception under section 116, and he was prepared to consent to an investigation by an independent person. The application was wholly unnecessary, and should be refused, with costs.

Mr. Benjamin, in reply, said that his learned friend now came into court prepared to recognise the seven shares. Hitherto recognition had been refused. Petitioners were entitled to an order that their rights, so far as the seven shares were concerned, should be recognised on the share register. As to the new articles, the new articles would have been passed at the meeting on the 21st May, had it not been for the proceedings that were taken, and the petitioners would then have been deprived of redress. Mr. Bishop had been put off time after time, and he was finally told to come back on the 21st, and he would then have found that the only course petitioners could take would have been to move to have the articles upset. In consequence of the 116th section, the petitioners had been compelled to come to the Court for redress. The Governor would not have been able to appoint a commissioner, even if Nannucci did not object, because the section clearly said one-fourth of the shareholders. With regard to the balance-sheets, it was clear that balance-sheets in accordance with the Act had not been presented. The irregularities had been going on for eight years, and the unfortunate shareholders were entitled to come to the Court for relief.

Buchanan, J.: In 1899 three persons, Mr. Nannucci, Mr. Burge, and Mr. Starling, were carrying on business in the Peninsula. These three persons resolved to float their businesses into a limited liability company, and they arranged between themselves that all the shares in the company should be taken by themselves, and that there should be no shares allotted to the public. In other words, that the capital of the several businesses should be converted into scrip capital. For the purpose of meeting the requirements of the Company's Act, in the registration of the company, it was necessary that the articles of association should be signed by seven shareholders, and for this purpose seven persons signed the articles of association, and each of these seven took one share in the company. These shareholders were the three persons to whom the property belonged, and four other persons. After the formation of the company, the whole of the 25,000 shares, which were proposed to be the capital of the company, were issued to the persons to whom the businesses had belonged, overlooking the fact that seven shares had been issued for the purpose of floating the company. Of these seven shares the Court is now asked to order the registration of the one which was issued to Starling, and one which was issued to Ross. The over-issue, as it is called, of the shares by seven was discovered at the time, and it was resolved to cancel the seven shares originally issued. Nannucci distributed certain shares gratuitously amongst certain employees. He gave Ross 15 shares, and it is alleged on the affidavits afterwards that Ross, who was absent from the Colony at the time, when it was resolved to cancel the seven shares, acquiesced in the cancellation. That is not denied. Of the other three persons, who signed the trust deed, Michelsen, who had one share, had received a gratuitous distribution of 10 shares, and had subsequently surrendered his one share to Nannucci. Dennis Edwards, the sixth person who had signed the deed, had acquired certain other shares of the company, and has become a director of the company, and he takes no part to insist upon his share being registered. The seventh signatory, E.

Nannucci, was also one of those who received a gratuitous distribution of shares, and he, too, agreed to the cancellation, and does not wish to have his one share registered. As to the share of the petitioner Starling, which it is alleged has not been cancelled he was one of the original persons for whose benefit the company was floated, and he, as one of the floaters of the company, took his portion of the shares in the company, and said nothing about his additional share. Moreover, he was one of the directors, and I do not think he can now be heard to take advantage of his own oversight as a director and claim the registration of that share. He had originally a number of shares in the company, which he had disposed of, and he has now no interest in the company, and I do not think it is equitable to allow him to come in in respect of the one share agreed to be cancelled. Ross, it is alleged, agreed to the cancellation; he had received gratuitous shares, and though he now asks for it, I think it is unnecessary to make any order on the subject, because he never before made a request to be registered in respect of the one of these shares. The more important application is that of Harry Newsome to have 100 shares registered in his name. He had nothing to do with the original floating of the company, and he alleges that he bought these shares in 1903 from the then secretary of the company, Mr. Hilliar. He did nothing at the time to get these shares registered, but towards the end of 1905 he instructed his attorney to apply to the company to have the shares registered, and he received an answer that Hilliar, who had sold him these shares, had no right whatever to sell the shares. The shares were 100 of those originally distributed by Nannucci amongst the employees, and were given to Mrs. Harrison. Nannucci purchased them from Mrs. Harrison with the object of having them transferred to Hilliar, on his paying the price of same, but it is said that Hilliar never paid the price. It is alleged on affidavits that Hilliar improperly abstracted the scrip of these shares from the offices of the company, and that he embezzled certain moneys of the company, and then suddenly disappeared. Under these circumstances the Court cannot say at this stage that Newsome has established his right to have these shares registered in his name. It will be open to Mr. Newsome to bring an action to have his right to the shares declared, should he be so advised. So far as the first prayer of the petition, therefore, is concerned, no order can be made. In reference to the application of the common seal of the company to be affixed to certain shares, it appears from the articles of association that if the common seal is affixed to a certificate it is to be paid to the com-share jointly and equally with the shares of the other legatees in the sum of £275.

Order granted in terms of Master's report, Petrus Olthoff authorised to pass the mortgage on behalf of the minor.

Ex parte ESTATE COWLING.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved on the petition of the executrix testamentary for leave to mortgage certain property in Cape Town for the sum of £275, in order to satisfy certain debts. Petitioner, it appeared, was the sole heiress under the will. She and her late husband were married in England.

[Maasdorp, J.: Why can't she administer her own property without coming to the Court.]

Mr. Buchanan: The Registrar refuses to allow the bond to go through.

Order granted as prayed.

AJAM V. TALEBODIEN AND OTHERS.

This was an application upon notice of motion to the respondents calling upon them to show cause why an order should not be granted in the following terms: (1) Setting aside the proceedings which took place in the Bethel Hall on the 3rd April, 1907; (2) restraining you from holding yourselves out to the public as persons in authority and having power to control and administer the affairs of the Moslem Cemetery Board, and preventing you from in any way dealing with the cemetery affairs; (3) compelling Imaun Talebodiën and Abdol Cader to deliver up all books relating to the Moslem Cemetery now in their possession; (4) interdicting the Standard Bank from parting with the funds to the credit of the Moslem Cemetery Board Fund account.

When the application originally came before the Court, the Chief Justice, by consent, appointed Advocate W. Porter Buchanan as commissioner to examine the credentials of all who claimed a right to vote, to receive nominations, and to accept votes for the election of a new Board, and reserved the question of costs (17 C.T.R., 370). Mr. Buchanan had sat and received nominations and votes, and, as a result, had declared applicant and his supporters elected, the respondent and his party having retired from the field after nominations had been handed in.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones) was for respondents.

Dr. Greer said he took it that the respondents now appeared on the question of costs.

Mr. McGregor said their contention was that the applicants had taken the wrong remedy, and that they should be ordered to pay costs.

Dr. Greer briefly traced the course of events which led up to the application. On May 18, 1896, he said, the Moslem community in Cape Town purchased a burial ground, and £1,000 was raised by subscription for the purchase of the ground. There was a deed of transfer, together with certain conditions attached, and those conditions governed the election of the Board by whom the ground was to be administered, and provided that persons who subscribed to the fund of £1,000 should be electors of the Board. As a matter of fact, a Board was elected originally, and after that nothing seemed to have been done. The old Board went on from time to time, apparently filling up vacancies as they arose up to the beginning of this year, when the existing Board, as then constituted, elected as secretary one Abdol Cader. It was alleged that the secretary could only be elected by the members of the Board. As a matter of fact, Abdol Cader was not a member of the Board. Then the present applicant and his supporters said that as the then existing Board had contravened the conditions a new election must be held. An election was held. After further disputes, an action was brought in the Magistrate's Court by Ajam and his party to prevent Talebodiën and his supporters from continuing in office. The Magistrate said that as there was some doubt about the legality of the election of the Ajam Board, they should give notice of the election, and elect a fresh Board. That course was adopted, and a meeting was held on the 9th Maroh. At that meeting, which, the affidavits said, was attended by 700 people, Ajam and his Board were elected. Notice was given in the "Cape Times" of this election. On the 3rd April a meeting was held by the respondent and his party, and applicants alleged that they were prevented from attending that meeting, that there were 73 people at the meeting, and that more than 100 people were refused admittance. At that meeting Talebodiën and some of his followers were elected as the Board.

Mr. McGregor (interposing) said that respondents contended that the second election of applicant and his party was informal, and that fourteen days' notice should have been given under rule 6, instead of seven merely.

Dr. Greer (proceeding) said that the Court appointed Mr. W. Porter Buchanan as commissioner, and he had held meetings of subscribers for the purpose of receiving nominations and votes. Both parties put in nominations at the first meeting, but before the meeting was held at which votes were received by the commissioner, Talebodiën and his supporters intimated that they retired from the contest, and at the meeting Ajam and his party were declared electd. Counsel argued that the respondents should pay costs of the proceedings. Applicants said that they were a properly constituted Board, and that respondents by their opposition had caused needless expense. The Board elected before the commissioner was appointed was precisely the same as that which had now been elected, with one exception only, out of a total of eleven members. Counsel cited Du Toit v. Domingo (14 S.C., 127) and Berhardien v. Intillah (6 C.T.R., 41).

Mr. McGregor submitted that applicant should pay costs of the proceedings. Domingo's case could be clearly distinguished from the present case. The form of the application was wrong. Neither party apparently persisted in saying that his Board was the right one, and a new Board had to be constituted. Furthermore, the course of events showed that applicants were not the proper parties to get what they asked for in the notice of motion.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that in this case the old Cemetery Board that managed the cemetery for the Moslem community was, in course of time, by certain irregular proceedings, rendered illegal in its constitution. It seems that all parties were satisfied that the Board could continue no longer. Thereupon the applicant and his party took it upon themselves to undertake a new election, and when the members of that alleged new Board had been elected, they proceeded against the members of the old Board in respect of certain funds. The question came before the Magistrate, and the Magistrate seems to have had some difficulty in deciding who exactly were the legal representatives of the Moslem community in respect of their interests in this cemetery, and he advised the parties to have a new election and to settle their disputes in that way. Thereupon the applicant seems to have taken it upon himself to give notice for a new election, which took place. What exactly were the powers and the rights of the applicant in taking those duties upon himself does not appear. However, his authority was not questioned so much as the nature of the proceedings. The respondent and his party contended that there had been certain irregularities in the election, and they, on their part, set about having a new Board elected. The result was that two antagonistic Cemetery Boards came into existence, and the question was raised by them before this Court as to which was the legally-constituted body entitled to represent the Moslem community. It was found necessary because of the difficulties which had been created to direct that a new election should take place, and to secure regularity and order in that election a commissioner was appointed by the Court to see that everything took place in due form. That election has taken place, and the body elected must be regarded as the legal representatives of the community, although even now the respondent and his party do not seem satisfied with the results. The only question which this Court has now to decide is as to the payment of the costs incurred in the different proceedings. When the applicant set about making arrangements for the election of the new Board, he said not to have given sufficient notice, and that was the irregularity upon which the respondent contended that the election had been illegal. Now, it does seem to me that the respondent had some ground of complaint, but then his proper course would have been not to set about having another party election of his own, but to have had the previous election set aside on the ground of irregularity. Instead of that he sets about what seems to me to be also quite irregular and illegal, having a Board elected which, instead of representing the community, seems to me to have represented merely a fraction of the people interested. It is quite clear that there were irregularities on both sides, and that the parties could not have settled this matter without coming to court, and having the aid of the Court and the directions of the Court to clear up their difficulties. Under the circumstances it seems to me that each party should pay his own costs and half the costs of the commission.

Dr. Greer: Will your lordship declare the new Board elected? The attorneys on both sides agree that a fee of 25 guineas would be a fair fee for the commissioner, who had very hard and arduous work to do.

Maasdorp, J., said the persons mentioned in list B of the declaration would be declared duly elected as members of the Cemetery Board. The commissioner's fee would be fixed at 25 guineas.

Mr. McGregor: I take it half the costs of the commission does not mean that my learned friend's clients can take half the money standing to the credit of the Board to pay their costs.

Maasdorp, J.: They are fighting out their private quarrels, and they cannot use the money of the Board.

Ex parte ESTATE BADENHORST.

Mr. Toms moved, on behalf of the petitioners, the executors testamentary on the estate of Margaretha Elizabeth Badenhorst, of Colesberg, for an extension of six months in order to file the liquidation and distribution account, the costs of the application to be borne by the estate.

Order granted as prayed.

BRAUDE V. BRAUDE.

Mr. M. Bisset was for the applicant, and Mr. Benjamin was for respondent,

This was an application to have a rule nisi restraining the husband of the petitioner from interfering with the child of the marriage pending the result of an action for judicial separation, made absolute. The applicant, Mischa Braude, of Matjes River, Oudtshoorn, obtained in 1899 a decree of judicial separation. Thereafter she lived apart from her husband for about two years. In 1901 she was induced to return to him, and she lived with her husband until last September. Shortly after she rejoined the respondent he ill-treated her, and consequently she had to leave him. He carried a revolver, and petitioner was afraid he would injure herself and the child. On one occasion he shut the child in a sugar bin for half an hour.

Mr. Benjamin, having read affidavits, said the position he took up was that the application was quite unnecessary.

Maasdorp, J., said the rule would be made absolute, costs to be costs in the cause.

AUERBACH V. SCHWERS.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi restraining the respondent from dealing with certain goods pending the result of an action to be instituted by applicants for delivery of the goods and damages, and also restraining the respondent from holding himself out as the representative of the petitioners. It was suggested that Mr. E. C. Fitzpatrick should take charge of the books pending the receipt of a power of attorney. The respondent, in an answering affidavit, stated that there was an agreement between the applicants and himself, whereby it was stipulated that all disputes should be settled in the Hamburg Law Courts. Provision was made for a division of the profits. There was a deed of partnership between the parties, and he had control of the goods in South Africa. He had given in terms of the agreement six months' notice to terminate it, and he suggested the appointment of Mr. J. M. P. Muirhead, and that the business should go on.

Dr. Greer for applicant; Mr. Benjamin for respondent.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp: Will Mr. Schwere undertake to act under the directions of Mr. Muirhead?

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, my lord.

Maasdorp, J.: Many points are raised which the Court cannot decide upon these affidavits. The application is mainly brought on the ground that the parties living in Europe are jeopardised through the conduct of Mr. Schwere. I am not satisfied on the affidavits that it has been made out so far that Mr. Schwere's conduct has been of such a nature that his immediate removal is necessary in order to secure those interests. On the other hand, Mr.

Schwere says that it would be better the business between them should be terminated, and he himself has given six months' notice of the termination of the relationship of the parties. The only question the Court has to decide is, there being this dispute, what would be the best way of securing the interest of all the parties? Mr. Schwere was appointed to carry on the business here, and if he carries on the business under the supervision of Mr. Muirhead, as he consents to do, I think Mr. Muirhead will see that no loss was suffered by Auerbach. Under the circumstances, the Court will appoint Mr. Muirhead as receiver, pending an action, Mr. Muirhead to have control of the business, and Mr. Schwere to act in the management of the business, under the direction of Mr. Muirhead, the question of costs to stand over.

The S.A.S. company recently carried on business in this Colony, its head office was however in England. Thereafter the Colonial department of the business was closed and the company went into liquidation. G., the liquidator, carried on the business of liquidating in Cape Town and certain legal process relating to claims against the company was served upon G's clerk at his office. G. appeared to have certain assets of the company in his hands. He now objected to the service and excepted to the jurisdiction of the Court.

Held, that as the company was being liquidated in this Colony the Court had jurisdiction and that the service of process was good.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for judgment under Rule 319 against defendant in his capacity as liquidator of the South African Supply and Cold Storage Co., Limited, for £3,774 10s. 4d., being transfer dues upon the sale made to the company from one Combrinck in regard to certain property in Cape Town.

Mr. Benjamin (for defendant) raised a question as to whether there had been service upon Mr. Graaff, and whether the Court had jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. Benjamin submitted, on the affidavits, it would appear clearly that the defendant company, on the authorities, is not, and was not, domiciled within this jurisdiction. If the plaintiffs had any ground of action, they ought to proceed by way of edictal citation. Counsel thought he could show if they had proceeded ad fundandam jurisdictionem, the Court would not have granted an order. He submitted that the domicile was in London, and he referred the Court to the case of Wallace v. Gordon Diamond Mining Company (6 H.C.R., 43), Dacey in his Conflict of Laws (pp. 154-156), Finwald v. German West Africa Company (5 S.C.R., 86), McLeod v. Benjamin (9 S.C.R., 183). He submitted that the domicile of the defendant company was in London. All it had to do with the Cape Colony was that it formerly had an office here. All the assets had been sent out of the jurisdiction. Before jurisdiction could be assumed there must be attachment ad fundandam jurisdictionem.

Mr. Jones said when application was made for judgment the defendant came forward and filed a long affidavit, the purport of which was not quite clear, and then he raised the argument as to the jurisdiction of the Court. It was not clear, on the affidavit, that he was objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court. The defendant did not now say he wished to plead.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that the defendant is sued by the Government in his capacity as the South African liquidator of the South African Supply and Cold Storage Company, Limited. The first objection taken to these proceedings now is that service was not duly effected of this summons upon the defendant. It appears that as liquidator he carried on the business of the liquidation in a certain office in Cape Town and at that time one Van der Horst was his clerk in the matter of the liquidation. It is admitted that the defendant is still the liquidator, and that the place at which the service was effected is a place where he carries on some business, and it is described by the Sheriff as the defendant's office. If that be the defendant's office where he carries on business, and he carried on the business of liquidation, it was the proper place where service should be effected on him in his official capacity as liquidator. The service was effected on Mr. Van der Horst, who, in some capacity, has acted for the defendant, but it does not matter what is exactly his capacity. He is engaged in the office as a clerk, or in some other capacity, and as clerk he receives the service in the liquidator's office, and that is wholly sufficient service on the liquidator himself. The liquidator having been duly served, it became incumbent upon him to put in an appearance. No appearance was put in on his behalf, and the plaintiff proceeded to issue a declaration against him, giving him notice that unless he pleaded within a certain time he would be barred. And now, under one of the Rules of Court, as the plaintiff did not appear, but being in default of appearance and default of plea, the judgment is prayed for. The defendant now comes forward to raise objections to the jurisdiction of this Court. Now, he is described in the summons as the liquidator of the company, which had lately carried on business in South Africa. As such liquidator he is said to have in his possession certain assets belonging to the company, and in the ordinary course an order was obtained for the attachment of such assets. The objection is raised that the Court has no jurisdiction in this matter, but clearly the Court would have jurisdiction against the liquidator of a company that is being wound up if he has the full power as liquidator of a company carrying on the business of this company. That is all that is now alleged in this declaration: That lately there was a company carrying on business in this country. He is liquidator, and he has assets in his possession, and the company itself is bound in respect of certain business carried on in this country. Now, it seems to me that all the ingredients that establishes jurisdiction are alleged in the declaration. Upon the defendant's plea he may dispute the allegations contained in the declaration, but I think he has taken the wrong course in coming before the Court to raise the question of jurisdiction in this form. It is stated he is only one of several liquidators, and it is contended that the plaintiff should have brought all the liquidators into court, but the allegation in the summons is that he is the liquidator. There is no reference in the summons to other liquidators. The ordinary procedure, if other defendants should come before the Court, is to take objection to the declaration by a plea of abatement. Then it is contended that even upon the face of the declaration itself there is nothing to show that the defendant has the power to represent the company in such form as to accept service of definite action for them in this colony. That may be so, but if a declaration is defective in that shape, then exception may be taken to it. The only question now to decide is whether the objection is raised in the present matter in the proper form, and I think the defendant has mistaken his procedure. Having been made a defendant by proper service, and there being allegations in the declaration which, if true, brings him within the jurisdiction of the Court, he can only take exceptions to the manner in which he has been brought into court upon the plea or exception which he may hereafter plead to the declaration. None of the questions as to the jurisdiction are consequently now decided, and from what has appeared it is quite possible that the plaintiff may find himself in this difficulty: that whatever procedure he may take against the present defendant, it may be found that the present defendant does not represent the company in such a form that he can take anything by any judgment hereafter given against this defendant. That is a matter which will have to be decided when further proceedings are taken. Leave will be granted to the defendant to purge his default and plead within eight days; the question of costs will stand over, as it may turn out that the Government was absolutely wrong in taking proceedings in this form.

MALAN V. FURTER.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for leave to sign judgment against respondent (Furter) for not proceeding with his action within the time stipulated by Rules of Court.

BOXALL V. DRAKENSTEIN MANGANESE MINING AND DEVELOPING SYNDICATE, LTD.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for judgment under Rule 329d for (1) £24 13s. 11d., balance of a sum of £38 8s., due by the defendant syndicate to plaintiff; (2) costs from the 17th May, 1907; (3) interest on the sum of £38 a tempore morae, and (4) an order directing defendant syndicate to forthwith indemnify plaintiff in terms of special agreement in respect of certain lease rents already accrued and amounting to £22 6s. 11d., and any lease rents which may become due on or before the 18th July, 1907, plaintiff tendering delivery of the lease.

Judgment granted in terms of prayers (1), (2), and (3).

Mr. Justice Maasdorp: I am prepared to give judgment for the moneys that are due, but nothing more. Plaintiff must go on with his declaration if he wants anything more.

CELLIERS AND OTHERS V. CELLIERS.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan, for the plaintiff, moved for an order on the curator ad litem to show cause why the defendant should not be judged incapable of managing his affairs, and why a curator should not be appointed to his property.

Dr. Thomas Henry Osler stated that the defendant was mentally incapable. On one occasion, after a conversation on various topics, the defendant, who knew witness very well, asked him who he was. The defendant, in witness's opinion, was incapable of managing his affairs. The defendant abused Mr. Nel, and did not know who he was speaking to.

The curator ad litem did not oppose the application, as he was of opinion the defendant had no memory.

Mr. Buchanan suggested the appointment of the defendant's son Jacob Petrus Celliers, who is an attorney of Somerset West, and that he should be relieved of giving security as all the heirs consented.

The defendant was declared incapable of managing his own affairs, Jacob Petrus Celliers appointed curator to his property, costs to come out of the estate, the curator of the property to be relieved of giving security, with full powers to administer the estate.

LAWLOR V. LAWLOR AND ANOTHER.

This was an application brought by Henry George Lawlor for a commission to issue to take the evidence of one of his witnesses at Coimvaba, Tembuland.

It appeared that applicant, Henry George Lawlor, was plaintiff in an action in which he claimed as against the first respondent (his wife) a decree of divorce, on the ground of her alleged adultery with one John Archibald G.

Hearns (the second respondent), against whom damages in the sum of £5,000 were claimed. The case had been set down for hearing on the 28th inst. Applicant now asked for a commission to issue to take the evidence of his brother, John Edward Lawlor, at Cofimvaba, on account of the great difficulty of his coming to the Court in Cape Town. Respondents opposed the application, and urged that the evidence of the witness was so important that it should be given under the eyes of the Judge.

Mr. Close was for applicant; Mr. Burton was for the first respondent, and Mr. Sutton was for the second respondent.

Counsel were heard on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: Plaintiff in the case has brought his suit in the Supreme Court, and it now appears that the witnesses live at very great distances from the Supreme Court, both parties and witnesses being resident in Tembuland. It is found that it would be a very great inconvenience for one particular witness to come that long distance. The case has been set down for the 28th June, and it would be very difficult, it seems to me, that a commission should be returned before the 28th. The case has been set down by the plaintiff for trial; he has, therefore, himself put another difficulty in the way of this commission effecting the purpose of having the evidence heard by the 28th. This witness is undoubtedly, from what plaintiff has said, a witness of great importance in the case, having to give evidence on the main issue between the parties with reference to the adultery, and the Court is therefore reluctant to allow, as a rule, when the case largely depends upon the evidence of certain witnesses, the evidence of those witnesses to be taken on commission. It has been said that certain subpoenas have already been issued, and that it would be, I take it, impossible to countermand them. Here again upon the action taken by plaintiff in setting down the case the other parties have prepared for the trial, and their evidence will be heard on the appointed day. Taking it altogether, I think the Court cannot now grant this commission. The plaintiff must do his best to secure the attendance of his witness on the day of trial. If, however, owing to insurmountable difficulties, the witness, without any default on his part for which he can be called to task by the Court, does not appear, then the plaintiff may make what application he thinks fit. The case must now proceed for trial upon the day for which it was fixed. The application will be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

SMYTH V. FURTER. { 1907.
June 19th.

Purchase and Sale—Movable and immovable property—Fixtures—Brandy kettle and appurtenances.

The plaintiff having sold and transferred a farm to the defendant under a written contract which did not mention a certain distilling kettle masoned in and affixed to the soil, afterwards claimed delivery of the kettle and its appurtenances, including the helm and coil.

Held, that the kettle was included in the sale and that the helm and coil although temporarily dismantled, were also so included as being essential appurtenances for the proper use of the kettle.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M., of Wellington. The plaintiff sold to the defendant a certain farm, and he agreed to let the defendant have the use of a certain brandy kettle and its appurtenances, which were on the farm, and which were to be returned to the plaintiff when demanded. The defendant had the use of the kettle and other articles for some time, and refused to return them, and plaintiff claimed their return or £12 10s., the value thereof. Judgment was for the plaintiff for the return of the still, or its value, with costs.

The Magistrate, in his reasons, held that the defendant's plea was insufficient, that he should have pleaded specially that the still belonged to him when he bought the farm. In that case the defendant would have had to prove his case first, and the plaintiff would then have been in a position to call rebutting evidence.

Mr. Benjamin was for the appellant, and Mr. Watermeyer was for the respondent.

Counsel submitted that the Magistrate was wrong in this case. Clearly the kettle itself went with the farm, and the helm itself was handed over.

Mr. Watermeyer said it was entirely a question of fact. In this case there was a distinct dispute, and the plaintiff said he did not sell the kettle with the farm. It was entirely a question of fact which the Court could not decide without further evidence. The kettle and still were often used for other purposes on these farms. The maxim "Quod solo radicitur solo cedit" merely applied to immovables, which were fixed to the soil at the time, and did not apply to the accessories of these immovables, especially in a case like this. When the farm was sold the helm and the coil were not fixed on the kettle.

Mr. Benjamin, in reply, pointed out that the property was sold in 1905, and the action was not instituted until two years afterwards. He submitted that the kettle passed with the farm, and the helm passed as an accessory, and in addition to that the appurtenances passed under an expressed agreement.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff, in the summons, alleges that on the 3rd May, 1905, he sold a certain farm, his property, to the defendant as agreed. He says he let the defendant have the use of his still and its appurtenances, which articles were to be returned to the plaintiff. What was proved was that the farm itself was sold, and that nothing was said about the kettle and the appurtenances. That is to say, in the written contract which is put in there is nothing said about the kettle and the appurtenances. The conclusion, therefore, would be that whatever was fixed into the soil, was built into the soil at the time of the purchase, was intended to be sold and delivered to the purchaser, and the only question which the Magistrate had to decide was whether the plaintiff had proved his statement that there was a special arrangement that the kettle and the appurtenances were not to be delivered to the purchaser. In my opinion, the written contract put in settles the whole point in regard, at all events, to the kettle, because as the kettle was not mentioned, and it is admitted that the kettle was built into the soil by masonry, that kettle at all events passed to the purchaser. Now, it is said, on behalf of the plaintiff, that at all events the helm and the coil should be held still to belong to the plaintiff. It is admitted that these are appurtenances to the still, and I am satisfied that if they are appurtenances they should also pass if the kettle passes. Everybody knows what a still is like — the ordinary farmer's still. The helm is essential to the use of the still. It is of no use whatever without the still, and as to the coil. I do not see what possible use could be made of it except in connection with the still. The coil is firmly fixed to the down pipe of the helm, and the spirit being condensed by the cool water outside the still issues below as brandy. Although the helm and the coil were on the farm the plaintiff claimed to be the owner, on the ground, inter alia, that they are not actually affixed to the kettle. But, in the ordinary course, they would be so affixed while distilling is going on, and as they are admitted in the summons to be appurtenances of the kettle, they should be regarded as part of the property sold. The mere fact that they are not actually affixed does not necessarily entitle the seller to claim their return to him. According to the Digest (19.1.17), and Voet (19.1.5), the keys of a dwelling house and moveable bars for fastening doors, although removable, are included in the sale of the house, as being part of the appurtenances thereof; and according to another passage in the digest (19.1.17, section 8), even the cover of a well, although not affixed to the soil, passes with the sale of the property. The helm is the cover of the kettle, and serves to prevent the escape of the fumes of the distilled spirit, and to concentrate them into the coil. The coil, which passes through cold water, serves to condense the fumes into the form of brandy. They are both essential appurtenances of the still; and if the kettle, which is admittedly affixed to the soil, passes, they should also be held to pass.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the Magistrate erred in his judgment, and that the appeal should be allowed with costs, and judgment entered for the defendant, with costs in the Court below.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

Mr. Pohl moved for the admission of Andries Christoffel de Villiers as an attorney and notary.

BENNING V. CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL.

This was an application upon notice to the Town Council of Cape Town calling upon them to show cause why they should not be ordered to desist from continuing with the construction of a certain mole at the foot of Adderley-street, at the expense of certain funds amounting to £30,000, which funds were specifically voted for a promenade pier and bathing places.

Applicant's affidavit stated that as a ratepayer in Cape Town he strongly objected to the Town Council proceeding with the construction of a mole estimated to cost £5,400, being conducted at the expense of certain funds, amounting to £20,000 and £10,000, which were specifically voted for a promenade pier and bathing places by special meetings of ratepayers held on the 9th November, 1891, and the 20th July, 1897. Thousands of pounds had already been spent on the said mole. The declared object of the work was to afford protection by way of breakwater to the fishermen at Rogge Bay from rough seas, and the mole could not in any sense be found necessary for the ultimate erection of a promenade pier and bathing places. As a Town Councillor, he had endeavoured to procure the cessation of the said works; but without avail. Applicant attached to his affidavit a copy of the draft Bill proposed to be submitted to the ensuing session of Parliament by the Council.

The answering affidavit of the Town Clerk, J. R. Finch, quoted from the Mayor's Minutes of 1891 and 1892 and the resolutions adopted at the ratepayers' meetings. Mr. Finch also quoted a report from the Markets Committee, who had recommended that the work should be carried out, inasmuch as the committee and Council were of opinion the formation of the mole would be the first step towards securing the means of access to any promenade pier which might hereafter be constructed at the foot of Adderley-street. This report was adopted at a meeting of the Council held on the 28th September, 1906. Deponent went on to say that the work was essential to the formation and beginning of what was required in the event of a pier being completed for the purpose of a promenade and sea baths. The work which had been carried out was a solid construction forming a mole, sea wall, or promenade, and was now used by numbers of the citizens of Cape Town for such purpose, although unfinished. Applicant had not exhausted the rights and remedies open to him as a member of the Council to procure the cessation of the works in question, and he was not entitled to come to the Court unless and until he had brought up the alleged irregularity before the Council for consideration. The action of the Council was absolutely legal, and the money in question was being expended in direct furtherance of the objects for which it was intended.

Applicant's replying affidavit denied that the work which was being carried on was essential to the beginning of the works which had been sanctioned by the ratepayers when they granted the loan. He was under a misapprehension in stating that the amounts voted were £20,000 and £10,000, and he should have said £20,000 and £25,000. Applicant said that when he raised the question at a recent meeting of the Council he was ruled out of order. He claimed that he was within his rights as a ratepayer in bringing the present application.

Mr. Burton for applicant; Mr. McGregor for respondent.

Mr. Burton contended that no such thing as a mole or a sea wall had been sanctioned. What the ratepayers authorised at the meetings in 1891 and 1897 was the construction, from the foot of Adderley-street by way of extension from the old central wharf or jetty, of a pier or promenade. The draft Bill which had been prepared on behalf of the Council for submission to the ensuing session of Parliament contemplated an entirely different state of affairs from that which was authorised in 1891 and 1897. In that Bill the Council asked for powers for what they were already busy doing. They were proposing to construct harbour works for the better protection of the fishing industry, and for affording better protection for pleasure yachts. The works which were going on were part of a reclamation scheme, and by-and-bye all the land would be reclaimed beside the filling in, and there would be no promenade pier at all, thus defeating the object of the ratepayers in sanctioning these loans.

[Maasdorp, J.: I hope they will go beyond the Rogge Bay fishery, because that is not a very healthy place.]

Mr. Burton: Quite so; I have no doubt that was intended by the people who authorised the expenditure of the money originally.

Mr. McGregor said that where a body was engaged in administrative duties the Court only on very good ground shown, fraud or ultra vires, interfered. Where there were administrative acts of an elective public body, the Court did not readily interfere so as to make itself a kind of supervisor. The ratepayers in 1897 voted funds for a promenade pier, "with the necessary approaches thereto." Respondent said that the work was essential as a beginning or foundation for a promenade pier. Applicant denied this. Counsel cited Shorr v. Cape Town Council (15 S.C., 119), and submitted that the matter was not one in which the Court could adjudicate by way of motion. The question of fact was too important to be decided on motion for a permanent interdict. Applicant should bring an action. It was rather late in the day for applicant to come to the Court, seeing that so much of the work had been done, and that it was already being partially used by the ratepayers. In matters of internal management which were within the province of the Council, one could not come to the Court and ask it to interfere.

Mr. Burton, in reply, submitted that applicant, first as a Councillor and afterwards as a ratepayer, had acted timeously throughout. Prima facie, it did not appear that this mole was part of the promenade pier. Respondent said that it was part of the promenade pier. This applicant denied. At all events, as matters stood now, he contended that temporary relief could be granted until the question could be decided by action.

Maasdorp, J.: The applicant in this case moves for an order interdicting the respondents from continuing the construction of a certain mole at the foot of Adderley-street, Cape Town, at the expense of certain funds, amounting to £30,000, which funds were specifically voted for a promenade pier and bathing places. It appears that in the past certain meetings of ratepayers were held at which the Council was authorised to expend certain moneys for the construction of a promenade pier and bathing places, and the applicant has stated that, in so far as the objects there authorised are concerned, he raises no objection to the Council performing the necessary work. But he sets forth his objection in the following form: "My main objection is that the said works, the estimated cost whereof is £5,400, are being conducted at the expense of certain funds amounting to £20,000 and £10,000, which funds were specifically voted for a promenade pier and bathing places by special meetings of the ratepayers of the said City." The applicant contends that the respondents are now undertaking certain works, and are illegally expending upon those works the moneys which were voted by the citizens for another purpose. Now, it is quite clear that if it is conclusively proved that the Council is doing an illegal act or threatening to do an illegal act, the Court will interfere to prevent it, and the question the Court will have to decide is whether it has been satisfactorily proved that such illegal act is being done in order to justify the Court in using its powers by means of an interdict. This is certainly a very large question raised by the parties both as to the question of fact and as to matters of law. Now, as a rule, the Court will not grant upon motion a perpetual interdict. In the ordinary course, it would have to form the subject of an action, but there are cases in which it has been made to appear to the Court that no additional facts could be placed before the Court by resorting to a trial, and that the matters which appear to the Court clear upon the affidavits are such that the Court can dispose of the matter upon motion. But that is not the case here; there is a conflict of evidence upon the affidavits as to matters of fact, which the Court cannot now dispose of. The question arises whether the work which is being done at present by the Council forms part of the works which were authorised by the ratepayers, and if that is so the applicant raises no objection to their being continued. But he, on his part, states that the work that is being done is of a different description altogether; instead of its amounting to the building of a sea promenade or pier, it is really the filling in of a place it is really the filling in of a place called Rogge Bay, and constructing a mole for the purpose of protecting the fishery there. Now, it does appear that a sea-wall is being constructed of a certain description, and that a mole is being made, and it is stated that that sea wall will ultimately be a portion of the sea promenade, and it is also stated that this mole will ultimately be a necessary work for the erection of a pier. The Court cannot now decide that the works which are being carried on are not portion of the work contemplated by the ratepayers, and that they will not ultimately be constructions going towards the completion of the sea promenade, and of the pier. I find myself unable to decide whether a pier may or may not be constructed upon the mole, and I am unable to decide whether the material that is being thrown into a portion of Rogge Bay is not of such a character that it will necessarily form part of a future sea wall. It is contended that it clearly appears that this mole when built would protect the fisheries. Undoubtedly it may assist that purpose and at the same time be a necessary part of the pier. Under these circumstances, there is a serious dispute as to the nature of the works that are being carried on, and, as I have already said, the Court cannot decide that they will not form very useful parts of the works that were contemplated by the ratepayers. The Bill has been referred to for the purpose of showing that the Council had in contemplation very large works. That may be so, and it may be that they are contemplating what Parliament will sanction, but it is said that they are really doing the work, that they are at present executing in anticipation of the work which is to be sanctioned by Parliament. That is also denied. It is said whatever work may be sanctioned by Parliament hereafter, this will, nevertheless, be a portion of the sea wall and of the pier. Besides the disputed facts, I think there are very large questions of law which may be raised in this case as to the authority of the Council. The Court will, therefore, not now grant a perpetual interdict. Then, it is suggested that, if the applicant is not entitled to that, a temporary interdict should be granted, pending some further steps that he may take in the future. Now, for the purpose of a temporary interdict, which only serves for a limited period, it is necessary for the applicant to show that he has made out a clear right which has been infringed by the respondent, and not only that, but he must show that the wrong which has been done is of an irremediable character, which cannot be rectified hereafter by action. Now, I think, for the purposes of a temporary interdict, he has failed to establish those points. The right to interfere with the action of the Council, in doing the works which they are actually doing now, is not clearly established, and I do not think that any particular ratepayer will suffer an irremediable injury from the works which, I have no doubt, will, whatever their object may be in future, serve some useful purpose. I only mention that now as showing that there is no irremediable wrong being done to the applicant. Consequently, the Court will not grant a temporary interdict either. It is quite possible that the applicant will persist in an action in the future. I don't suggest that he would have very strong grounds to support his action. That is a matter for him to consider. Anyhow, if he does so, then I think the present proceedings can stand as a summons in those proceedings. The Court will, therefore, make no order in this case, and make no order as to the present payment of costs, but will give the applicant an opportunity, until the end of this term, to proceed with his action, and if he then fails to do so, then he should pay costs of this application. It does not necessarily mean that he must proceed to trial this term. He must file declaration before the end of this term, or pay costs of this application.

TUENBULL V. GILLITT.

Dr. Greer moved for an order upon respondent to forthwith hand over to one V. W. Russell, applicant's duly authorised agent, certain articles of furniture and a piano, referred to in a hire purchase agreement.

Respondent appeared in person, and said that he claimed to have a landlord's lien over the property. He also raised a question as to whether the applicant was solvent.

The matter was ordered to stand over till Friday next to enable respondent to file affidavits.

IMPERIAL COLD STORAGE AND SUPPLY CO., LTD., V. DISTRIBUTING SYNDICATE FOR COLD STORAGE

This matter came on for argument upon a reference from the referee appointed in the action brought by the plaintiffs to recover certain moneys from the defendants for goods supplied under a certain agreement.

It appeared that in the course of the proceedings before the referee appointed by the Court (Mr. A. T. Hennessy) certain questions had been raised as to the construction of the sixth clause of the agreement (annexure M), which is as follows: "The said syndicate shall be bound and obliged to purchase and obtain all their supplies of frozen or chilled meat or articles of chilled or frozen food from the company's cold storage works and from no other person or company, and shall pay therefor such sum as the said supplies shall cost laid down in the company's stores at Cape Town or Woodstock, plus one-eighth of a penny per lb. and 10 per cent., and the said syndicate shall be credited with any trade discounts on cost price and freight, in respect of all goods purchased by the said company and supplied to the said syndicate."

The referee, in his statement of the case, said (2) that the plaintiffs contended that, in reference to paragraph 6 of annexure M, the 10 per cent. therein referred to must be calculated on the one-eighth of a penny per lb. as well as on the cost laid down in the company's stores at Cape Town or Woodstock.

Defendants contended that 10 per cent. must be calculated on the latter amount only. (3) Plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to lead evidence to show that by the custom of trade the expression, "cost laid down," included the items referred to in schedule B. Defendants denied such contention. (4) Plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to lead evidence to show the significance attached to the expression, "cost laid down," by the course of dealing between the parties prior and subsequent to the date of the said annexure M. Defendants disputed such contention. (5) Plaintiffs contended that, irrespective of the evidence referred to in paragraphs 3 and 4, the referee must take into account in determining the cost laid down in the company's stores at Cape Town or Woodstock, as referred to in paragraph 6, the items included in schedule A, part 1, and a reasonable proportion of the charges referred to in part 2 thereof, and a reasonable proportion of the charges referred to in schedule "b." Defendants contended that only the charges referred to in schedule A must be taken into account. The defendants' representative had set out their contentions in the following terms: "Defendants object to general management charges and salaries of managers and clerks, etc., who are not employed in actually laying down supplies in the cool chambers. They object to expenses of working the company being charged to cost laid down. They maintain the one-eighth of a penny and the 10 per cent. in clause 6 of agreement cover all expenses after the supplies have been laid down. They maintain that the general staff exists for the numerous purposes of such a company, and that the agreement does not contemplate the allocation of either the salaries of any particular officials or a proportion of all salaries to the cost laid down. Such cost was to be ascertained from the particulars in Schedule "A."

The referee reported that he ruled that the intention of the agreement was that the 10 per cent. should be calculated on the "cost laid down," plus one-eighth of a penny per lb. As to the question of what was the cost laid down, the syndicate objected to any part of the London office or Cape Town administrative expenses being calculated in the "cost laid down." He considered that it was impossible to draw a line in the manner in which defendants proposed. The whole machinery in existence to handle these supplies, whether indoor or outdoor, must be included. Whether the whole of the men's time so employed was spent on the supplies coming under the contract or only a portion of it was purely a question of the proportion of their wages or salaries to be charged to the "cost laid down."

The defendants were dissatisfied with these rulings.

Mr. Burton appeared for the Imperial Co.; Mr. McGregor appeared for the Distributing Syndicate.

Mr. McGregor submitted that 10 per cent. mentioned in the agreement was 10 per cent. of the cost laid down. Counsel went on to discuss the question of what constituted "cost laid down."

[Maasdorp, J.: Was not that decided in the case of the Bulawayo Electric Light Company?]

Mr. McGregor: The point of cost was raised, but the matter is not disposed of by that case, because that was not a matter of commerce, but of manufacture. In this case we are dealing, not with a firm of manufacturers, but a big firm of importers. Counsel proceeded to contend that the defendants should not in the calculation as to "cost laid down" be debited with a proportion of the establishment charges. The clause went on to say that a trade discount should be allowed to the syndicate. That was important as showing that what was meant was the cost price, not the sum of the amounts necessary to bring the goods to the market. The referee had evidently overlooked the provision as to trade discount, and that was the flaw in his finding. Counsel quoted the Encyclopædia of Accounting, Vol. 2, pp. 252-267, and submitted that, this being a non-manufacturing concern, the establishment charges did not come in.

[Maasdorp, J.: Was not the question of London office expenses in relation to cost raised in a railway case?]

Mr. McGregor said that Hills v. Colonial Government (20 S.C., 107, and 21 S.C., 59) was a special case, and stood on a different footing from the present matter.

Mr. Burton contended that it was clearly intended by the agreement that the 10 per cent. was to be charged on the cost, and the eighth of a penny per lb. As to what constituted the cost laid down, he submitted that the expenses of the London office must be taken into account. The carcasses had to be bought, and if the company did not do their own buying they would have to employ a broker. All the plaintiffs wanted was to take a reasonable proportion of the various expenses against the "cost laid down." The existence of the London office was a direct connection for the supply of this meat to the company. The London office was kept for the purpose of arranging freights, and, if it did not exist, then the defendants would not get the benefit of the trade discounts, rebates, etc. As to the Cape Town office expenses, the line drawn by the defendants between the expenses they admitted and the expenses they repudiated was incomprehensible.

Mr. McGregor, having been heard in reply,

Maasdorp, J.: The question at issue between the parties arises upon the construction of the sixth paragraph of their agreement, which is to the following effect: "The said syndicate shall be bound and obliged to purchase and obtain all their supplies of frozen or chilled meat or articles of chilled or frozen food from the company's cold storage works and from no other person or company, and shall pay therefor such sum as the said supplies shall cost laid down in the company's stores at Cape Town or Woodstock, plus one-eighth of a penny per lb. and 10 per cent., and the said syndicate shall be credited with any trade discounts on cost price and freight, in respect of all goods purchased by the said company and supplied to the said syndicate." This matter having been referred to the referee in order to ascertain how much the syndicate is indebted to the company, the referee has laid down certain principles upon which he intends to ascertain what the cost of the meat supplied to the syndicate by the company would be as laid down in the company's stores in Cape Town. For that purpose the referee says he intends to include what it costs the company to keep their office in London, and the cost of the officers whom they have in London. He also intends to include the cost of the employment of officers for the purpose of carrying on this work in Cape Town and the offices in which they carry on their work. The object of the company is to buy goods in foreign ports and import these goods into the Colony. For that purpose, it is quite clear that they would require officers somewhere out of the Colony, and if they have officers to carry on certain work, it may not be impossible, from the ordinary business point of view, to have men doing work without contemplating at the same time that they would require to do their work in certain buildings. The referee intends to consider what it costs the company in the employment of these officers and in the use of such premises in London, and, in his opinion, that should be included in the cost which is to be taken into account of the meat when laid down in the stores in Cape Town. He has given his reasons for the position he takes up in the matter, and I do not think that it is necessary for me to add much to what he has said. Generally, I think I may say he acts upon a correct principle. In order to ascertain what the meat costs the company as laid down in their stores here, it is necessary to take into consideration the expenditure they have in the employment of officers at the place where the meat is bought. It appears that in this case it is considered that London is the most convenient place for carrying out the business of the company, and there they employ those who purchase the meat, and who despatch the meat, and who enter into the necessary contracts for the purpose of placing the meat at the disposal of the syndicate here. It appears that those who are there employed are in a position, in their contracts with those from whom they purchase, to arrange for discounts, and that they are in a position to make arrangements for rebate to the trade, and obtain both freight and meat at the cheapest possible rate, and it is provided here that when their officers in their work manage to get these advantages, the benefit of those advantages should be allowed to the syndicate. It is contemplated that these very officers, in their employment in London, do something actually for the benefit of the syndicate themselves. They work in reduction of the prices which the syndicate will have to pay. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the principle laid down by the referee is correct—that the expenses of the London offices and offices should be allowed and the expenses of the Cape Town officers and offices should be allowed, and in the manner in which he has to allow these expenses, of course, he will use his discretion. He ascertains what they are, and then only a fair proportion is to be allocated so far as the syndicate is concerned. If, in carrying out his principle in practice, he should allow what the syndicate considers ought not to be allowed even under his own principle, then that question can be raised afterwards. The only person who can deal with the general matter and ascertain the cost, and use his reason as to the proper proportion is the referee. Then, there is a further question raised upon the following phrase: "The said syndicate . . . shall pay (for the meat) such sum as it shall cost laid down in the company's stores at Cape Town or Woodstock, plus one-eighth of a penny per lb., and 10 per cent." Now, there is a difference between the parties as to what the 10 per cent. is to be calculated upon, and, as has been rightly said, it is not a matter which allows any wide scope of argument, or for comparison of phrases and words which might throw light upon the matter. The whole question is confined in a very small compass. The words are that the cost is to be paid, plus one-eighth of a penny per lb., and then after that it is said that there is to be an additional 10 per cent. I use the word "additional," and it may mean, it conveys this meaning, that after it was arranged that the cost and one-eighth of a penny per lb. should be paid, it was then considered that you have a sum now to deal with, that is, the cost plus one-eighth of a penny, and dealing with the cost, plus one-eighth of a penny, the parties agreed that something more should be paid, that is 10 per cent. on that sum.

On the sum which had been calculated, a further 10 per cent. was to be paid, and what was calculated up to that point was the cost laid down in the company's stores, plus one-eighth of a penny. Here, again, I think the referee was correct in the conclusion he arrived at—that the 10 per cent. must be reckoned upon the cost, together with one-eighth of a penny per lb. The direction of the Court, as required by the referee, is, therefore, in accordance with the view he has already taken in the matter. Costs of this application will be costs in the cause.

SUPREME COURT

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

Ex parte BISHOP AND OTHERS. { 1907.
June 20th.

Mr. Benjamin moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Wyndham Bishop and others, for an order in reference to the affairs of Nannucci, Limited. Counsel said that when the matter was last before the Court, Mr. Justice Buchanan said that there could be no objection to Mr. Bishop or other representative of the shareholders making an inspection of the company's book of accounts. It appeared, however, that a meeting of the shareholders had been held, at which it had been resolved that certain new articles of association should be adopted. This resolution was to be submitted for confirmation at a further meeting of the company this (Thursday) afternoon. Mr. Bishop had applied for leave to inspect the books, and had been to the company's office at Woodstock for that purpose, but had been unable to complete his investigations owing to having been molested by the managing director, Mr. Oreste Z. Nannucci. If the proposed new articles of association were passed and confirmed, then the petitioner and other shareholders would be deprived of the right of inspection of the books. One of the proposed regulations read: "No member shall have the right to inspect any account, or book or document of the company, except as conferred by statute or authorised by the Board or by a resolution of the company in general meeting." Counsel added that he understood that the shareholder who went to inspect the books was actually assaulted, and was refused permission to inspect the books.

Maasdorp, J., asked what the petitioners' prayers were.

Mr. Benjamin said that the prayers were for a rule calling upon the respondent to show cause why certain provisions of the new articles should not be declared ultra vires, and why the company should not be interdicted from confirming the special resolution passed on the 5th June, 1907.

[Maasdorp, J.: If they are ultra vires or illegal, you can move at any time.]

Mr. Benjamin said that petitioners also prayed that they, or someone on their behalf, should forthwith be given an inspection of the books.

[Maasdorp, J.: That can be done after notice.]

Mr. Benjamin: It will be too late after the resolutions have been confirmed.

Maasdorp, J.: The Court cannot prevent this company from amending their articles of association as long as they do it in a regular and lawful manner, and there is nothing now put before the Court to show that they intend to have recourse to any unlawful action. If the articles be found to be of such a description as to characterise them as ultra vires or illegal, then at any time redress can be obtained by the parties who are injured by the new articles of association. If the applicant wishes to have an inspection of the books, he must give the ordinary notice calling upon respondents to show cause why such inspection should not be granted. It is said that if the resolution is passed it will be out of the power of the Court to amend such an order. I think that would be rather an extraordinary position to take up, if it is contended that the Court under circumstances where a shareholder proves that he is likely to be injured, could not grant redress, and that he can never obtain inspection of the books, should he be refused simply because the company is making a rule that no such inspection should be granted. I express no opinion upon that: I merely say it would be an extraordinary position if it were so. Applicant should give notice if he wishes to have inspection of the books, and then the question can be considered whether the resolution which may be passed to-day will debar the Court from granting redress. No order will be made.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte ESTATE TEBB. { 1907.
June 20th.

Mr. Upington moved for an order authorising the release of Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinne from office as executors, administrators, and guardians of the minors, if any, of the testator. It appeared that the estate was being administered by the Colonial Orphan Chamber, and the petitioners thought it was desirable in all the circumstances to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Orphan Chamber. The testator's widow was dead, and there was no issue of the marriage, but it appeared that a considerable time would elapse before the estate was finally distributed, i.e., after the death of the usufructuary.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ESTATE CONRADIE.

Mr. De Waal moved on behalf of petitioner, as tutor of certain minors, for confirmation of a certain partition, and leave to raise a loan on mortgage of the property. The Master reported favourably.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

Ex parte SOUTH AFRICAN NEWSPAPER CO., LTD.

Mr. Burton moved, on the petition of the chairman of the South African Newspaper Co., Ltd., for an order authorising the reduction of the company's capital. Petitioner stated that the company was formed with a capital of £30,000, which was subsequently increased to £60,000, of which 54,000 shares had been issued and fully paid up. Subsequently the directors were authorised to dispose of a reserve of 15,000 preference shares. Of these, 14,000 were issued. On the 20th May, 1907, the following resolution was passed at an extraordinary meeting of shareholders, and duly confirmed at a subsequent meeting held on the 6th June, 1907: "That the directors of the company be authorised to cancel the preference on the 1,000 unissued £1 preferred shares still held by the company; that they be authorised to cancel the preference on the 14,000 preferred £1 shares already issued, upon obtaining consent thereto from the present holders; that the capital of the company be reduced from £60,000 to £30,000 £1 ordinary deferred shares, whereof 13,500 shall be distributed, in the proportion of one for every four shares of the 54,000 shares at present issued, between the shareholders as registered on the day of confirmation hereof by shareholders, in lieu of and in full satisfaction of their then holding in the capital stock of this company; that all fractions of shares accruing out of the distribution of the 13,500 shares to existing shareholders shall be pooled, and vested in the directors of the company, for them to sell and dispose of as they shall deem best, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid out proportionately to the persons to whom such fractions belonged; that 6,500 shares be held in reserve, not to be issued unless directors be specially authorised thereto at a duly-convened meeting of shareholders of the company; and that the directors be empowered to offer for subscription at par and to allot the remaining 10,000 shares, at such time or times, in such number or numbers, on such conditions or terms, and to such person or persons as they, the said directors, may deem fit." The consent of the holders of 13,997 of the 14,000 preferred shares of £1 each to the cancellation of such preference had been obtained by the company. The holders of the remaining three shares resided in Greytown, Natal (two shares), and in Matatiele, Griqualand (one share). The above shareholders had been written to asking their consent to the cancellation of the preference on their shares, but no reply had been received. Ample provision would, however, be made for securing their rights should they eventually refuse to waive their preference. Petitioners prayed for an order confirming the reduction of the capital of the company, as set forth, and dispensing altogether with the necessity of adding the words "and reduced", as the last words of the company's name, and provided for in section 32 of the Companies' Act, 1892.

Maasdorp, J., asked what would be the precise effect of the resolution adopted by the company?

Mr. Burton said that originally there were 60,000 shares, of which 54,000 were subscribed, so that the shareholders in bulk held 54 sixtieths in the were content, instead of holding 54 sixtieths, to hold 134 out of 30. In that way they released 10,000 of the 30,000 shares for the purpose of getting further capital. The matter was one in which the creditors of the company would not be in any way affected.

Maasdorp, J., granted a rule nisi, returnable on the 12th August, calling upon the two shareholders in question to show cause, if any, why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, and also authorised the omission of the words "and reduced" from the company's title.

In re EAST LONDON DAILY NEWS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.

Dr. Greer presented the third report of the liquidators, and applied for the usual order as to lying for inspection and as to publication.

Usual order granted, one publication in the "Cape Times," S.A. News," and "East London Dispatch."

Ex parte KORTJASS.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved, on behalf of petitioner, as guardian of her minor children, for leave to mortgage certain farms in the estate of her late husband. Petitioner desired to retain two of the farms, and proposed to mortgage the properties in the sum of £800. The other farm had been sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of debts, the mortgage being required to pay the balance of the debts. The executor dative in the estate did not object to the application. The Master, however, was of opinion that it would be better to sell two of the farms and pay the debts, and retain one farm free from debt.

Maasdorp, J.: The matter had better stand over, so that further inquiries may be made as to whether there is any reason why the two farms cannot be treated separately, and why, if one only is kept, it might not be for the benefit of the family.

BOYES V. BOYES.

Mr. Do Waal moved for an extension of time of the return day to sue by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. The defendant had moved from one town in India to another, and the papers had not yet been returned. Counsel asked for an extension until July 12, 1907.

It was ordered that the trial day be postponed until July 12.

Ex parte PROVIDENT LAND TRUST.

Mr. Benjamin moved for an order confirming a special resolution of the directors of the company to extend its objects in the memorandum of association. It was resolved inter alia to take over the assets and liabilities of any building societies and any going concern, to carry on the business of a building society in any place in South Africa, to constitute a fund by means of periodical instalments, to acquire interest in any land, and to undertake the building for people acquiring land. The proposed extension was to enable the company to carry on its business more efficiently. All the shareholders had had notice setting forth the special resolution, and they had accepted the notice.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ESTATE MULLER.

Mr. Gutsche moved for the removal of the executor testamentary, on account of his lunacy, and for the appointment of an executor dative in the estate of the late Daniel Muller.

Order granted, the Master to take the necessary steps for the appointment of another executor, costs to come out of the estate.

PIENAAR AND CO., LTD., V. ROSE.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order extending the return day of the citation until Tuesday, August 6, and for substituted service.

Order granted, substituted service to be effected as allowed by the previous order.

Ex parte BRANDON.

Mr. Waliach moved for leave to the petitioner to sue her husband, Charles Edward Brandon, by edictal citation, for the restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, and custody of the child of the marriage. The marriage took place on the 16th October, 1905, in St. George's Cathedral, Cape Town, and there was one child of the marriage. Three days after the marriage the defendant deserted the petitioner, and stated that he was leaving Cape Town to escape arrest on a warrant. Three months afterwards he was arrested and brought to Cape Town, and sentenced to seven months' imprisonment. Upon his release he called on the petitioner and endeavoured to obtain money from her and her mother, which was refused. He then said he would have nothing to do with her, and departed. She had received information that he had been resident in Durban, Natal. He had recently completed a sentence of three months' imprisonment for store breaking in that town. Since the marriage she had received nothing towards her maintenance. Counsel moved for leave to be granted for substituted service.

Leave granted to sue by edictal citation, return day 5th August, personal service if possible, failing which one publication in the "Gazette" and one in the "Natal Mercury," interdict and notice of trial to be served at the same time.

Ex parte HYDE.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the petitioner to pass transfer of certain property by virtue of a certain power of attorney passed by the mortgagees to the petitioner.

Order granted.

Ex parte ESTATE DE VILLIERS.

Mr. Louwrens moved for an order confirming, on behalf of certain minors, an agreement entered into between the executors in the estate. The major heirs had consented. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted as prayed.

O'CONNOR V. STANBURY.

This was an application for an order calling on the respondent to hand over certain furniture, the property of the applicant, Mrs. Mary O'Connor, of Commercial-street, Cape Town, which petitioner was desirous of removing from the Gloucester Arms Hotel, of which the respondent was the licensee, but the respondent refused to release the furniture, stating that the furniture belonged to the deceased son of the petitioner.

The answering affidavit of the respondent set out that the articles claimed were not in his possession. The furniture was claimed by Elizabeth Mary O'Connor, daughter of the respondent, and executrix in the estate of her late husband, Michael James O'Connor, son of the applicant.

Mr. Howes was for the applicant, and Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for the respondent.

Maasdorp, J.: I do not think the Court can dispose of this matter upon the application in this form. The ownership of the property in dispute will have to be decided by action. From the affidavits put in it appears that both the parties, the applicant on the one side, and the daughter-in-law on the other, claim the property, and although it happens to be on the premises of the respondent, it is the applicant's daughter-in-law that lays claim to the property for herself. That dispute will have to be settled before the Court can give any order in the matter. It seems to me—it is a question upon which I cannot speak with certainty—if she brings an action for this property, that her costs may exceed the value of the property, and if the costs exceed the value of the property and she succeeds in recovering the costs from her daughter-in-law, then there is something gained by her. If she ascertains she will get nothing from her daughter-in-law, she will spend more in the suit, and get nothing. I merely point out this circumstance for her to consider whether there should not be some effort now to settle this matter. It does appear that the daughter-in-law had the handling of this property, had kept it in repair from time to time, and that she has exercised some rights of ownership. It may be that she was only the possessor while her mother-in-law remained the owner. I think that the parties should consider the position, and those who advise them, otherwise everything may be swallowed up in costs. Perhaps the offer made by the claimant is a reasonable one, that she will pay what has been spent in repairs, and take the property if it belongs to her. The Court will make no order on this property. It does appear that as far as the matter of costs is concerned, the respondent must be treated as in the place of his daughter. It is quite clear that he took active proceedings in preventing the goods being taken by the present claimant, and it is now said that he represented to her that he himself would raise no difficulties to the property being taken. I am quite sure if that had been represented in a definite form, so that the Court should accept it as a renunciation of any claim he might previously have made, the proceedings would not have gone on further against him. The Court will refuse this order, and will make no order as to costs. The applicant was herself wrong in pressing these proceedings, when she had ascertained that the claim was made by her daughter-in-law; but, on the other hand, the respondent was wrong in aiding his daughter to resist the claim.

JOSEPH AND CO., AND OTHERS V.
FOURIE.

Mr. M. Bisset, for the plaintiff, moved for the removal of case to the Circuit Court at Oudtshoorn, for the benefit of all parties concerned.
Order granted.

SUTHERLAND V. ROBERTS. { 1907.
 { June 21st.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a Magistrate's Court judgment for £22 2s. 1d., being £20 for work and labour done, and £2 2s. 1d. costs. Counsel said that a writ had been issued, and a return of nulla bona had been made, and the defendant had left the jurisdiction of the Magistrate's Court.

[Maasdorp, J.: You want to follow up the defendant for purposes of civil imprisonment?]

Mr. Buchanan said that that was so. Maasdorp, J., said his attention had been called to the fact that there was a question as to whether the Sheriff had effected service of the writ in a proper manner. It did not appear from the Sheriff's return that a copy of the judgment of the R.M.'s Court had been served with the writ.

The matter was ordered to stand over pending a fuller return by the Sheriff.

About ten years ago defendant left his wife at Rosebank, but they continued to correspond for some years. The last letter that she received from defendant was in March, 1903. Defendant had failed to support her both before and subsequent to the desertion. She was aware that defendant was at present confined in gaol at Potchefstroom.

In case no objections are lodged by the expiration of fourteen days, the compromise to be allowed, this part of the order to appear in the notice. Costs to be paid out of the funds of the company.

Ex parte ESTATE FRASER

Mr. Close moved, on the petition of the curator bonis of estate Fraser, for leave to sell and transfer such landed property as may be necessary to satisfy liabilities, or pass a mortgage bond not exceeding £3,000. The curators, it appeared, had, in terms of their appointment, power to administer the estate, but had no power to deal with any of the landed property, except so far as collecting the rents was concerned.

Leave granted to sell enough of the landed property or to raise sufficient moneys on mortgage to pay the debts mentioned in the petition, and to pay the costs of this application.

Maasdorp, J.: It will be in the discretion of the curators to mortgage or sell.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

REX V. JACOBS. { 1907.
June 24th.

Juvenile offender—Acts 7 of 1879 and 8 of 1889.

A juvenile offender over the age of 16 can neither be sent to a reformatory nor apprenticed as a juvenile offender under Act 8 of 1889; but must be treated as an adult.

Buchanan, J., said a case came before him in review, that of the King against Jacobs, in which the accused was convicted of stock theft and sentenced to be detained in a reformatory or to be apprenticed. The Magistrate said the youth was about sixteen years of age, but from subsequent information it transpired that this same youth was convicted in 1905, two years ago, at the age of fifteen, and he is now seventeen instead of sixteen. The Act No. 7 of 1879, which provides for the punishment of juvenile offenders, allows the Magistrate to send a juvenile offender to the Porter Reformatory until he is of the age of sixteen. The subsequent Act 8 of 1889 authorises the apprenticeship of such juvenile offender until he is of the age of twenty-one, but in that case the accused must be under the age of sixteen. In this case the accused will have to be treated as an adult. The conviction is in order, but the sentence will be set aside and the case remitted to the Magistrate to pass a proper sentence.

REX. V. ISMAIL.

Perjury—Setting out in indictment foreign words actually used—Evidence of interpreter—Magistrate's finding on evidence.

Appellant had been convicted in an A. R. M. Court of perjury committed in the S. C. One of the grounds of appeal was that he was said to have spoken in Indian and that the actual Indian words used when committing the alleged perjury were not set out nor was the interpreter called to prove the correctness of his translation.

Held on appeal, that in an indictment for perjury it is sufficient to set forth in English the substance and effect of the words used, and that the notes of the official short-hand writer are sufficient evidence of the substance of such words.

The appeal was, however, allowed on the ground that the conviction was against the weight of evidence.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Cape Town, in a case which was heard on the 8th May last, and in which the appellant, Sheik Ismail, was charged on three separate counts with perjury in connection with a civil action which was heard in the Supreme Court sitting as a Divisional Court, before Mr. Justice Hopley (16 C.T.R., 266). The accused was found guilty on all charges, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. The grounds of appeal were that there was no, or insufficient, evidence adduced by the prosecution to warrant the finding of the Magistrate, that the offence was alleged to have been committed and sworn to by the appellant in the Indian language, whereas the prosecution adduced no evidence to that effect. The accused never uttered a word in the Indian language, and he gave the evidence in question either in the English or Dutch language, and consequently the prosecution failed to prove the charges. The prosecution failed to prove that the statements alleged to have been uttered and made by the appellant were material to the issue. The conviction was contrary to law, and against the weight of evidence. The evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution was unreliable and illegal.

Mr. Upington, with him Dr. Greer, was for the appellant; Mr. Nightingale appeared for the Crown.

Counsel said he was not prepared to support the third ground as to the material nature of the evidence. The second ground was not very artistically stated, but on that ground counsel intended to urge a further point, which really was included, and that was that the interpreter who interpreted the evidence in the Supreme Court gave no evidence to show either what the actual words used were, or that the words were correctly interpreted by him. That link in the evidence was absent. The interpreter was called for the defence, and he gave general evidence that the prisoner spoke either in the English or Dutch language, partly in English and partly in Dutch, and the charge was that he spoke in the Indian language. The charges were as follows: That upon the 22nd August, 1906, the trustee in the insolvent state of C. Allie complained that Sheik Ismail owed the estate £847, being the amount of moneys paid by C. Allie on behalf of the accused. Ismail, being duly sworn, stated in the Indian language to the effect (in the English language): "I was not there (Tulbagh-road) on the 8th January or 9th January, when Allie bought sheep from Olivier. I did not go to Olivier's shop about the 8th or 9th January with Allie to purchase sheep, whereas in truth and fact Ismail well knew that he was at Tulbagh-road on the 8th or 9th January, and that he did go to Olivier's shop on the 8th or 9th January to purchase sheep, and thus Ismail did commit the crime of perjury. The second count alleged that he unlawfully deposed and swore in the Indian language, in substance, and to the effect in the English language, "I never said anything about a telegram that Snyman would get £150 before sunset," or used the words, "What does the baas think of us?" He well knew he promised the payment of £150 to Snyman, and that he used the words: "What does the baas think of us." He also swore in the Indian language that "on the 19th December I did not buy oxen from Niehouse," and he well knew he did buy oxen on the said date there. The charges arose out of an action in which the trustee in the insolvent estate of Allie sued Ismail for £800 odd, being moneys which were alleged to have been disbursed by Allie on behalf of Ismail in connection with certain sheep transactions, and he set forth that in December, 1905, an arrangement was entered into between Allie and the defendant whereby it was arranged that the former should proceed to various country towns in this colony in order to select sheep for the defendant, Allie to notify him when he found sheep suitable for such purchase, and Allie to buy the sheep at a price to be fixed by the defendant. In December, 1905, in pursuance of the agreement, Allie concluded the purchase of sheep, and the defendant paid Allie the purchase price and also a commission and his expenses. Allie purchased 200 sheep from Olivier, at Tulbagh-road, on behalf of the defendant, who took the sheep over for £195, and agreed to give him 5 per cent. commission on the purchase. The defendant, however, had not paid anything in respect of this purchase, and he owed some £200 thereon. On the 23rd January, 1906, Allie, under the agreement, purchased 391 sheep from Snyman, at Ceres, for £381, which the defendant took for £391. The defendant paid to Allie £330 in respect of this transaction, and still owed the estate £61. On the 7th February, he purchased 432 sheep from Snyman for £475 4s., the defendant took over the sheep from Allie at the same price, and agreed to pay him commission. The defence was a denial of the agreement. He denied that Allie had any authority to purchase the sheep, and he had no knowledge of these transactions, and denied that he authorised Allie to make the purchases. The position taken up by him was that Allie carried out these transactions on his own behalf, and then sold to him at a profit and otherwise. Mr. Upington said in the case of a charge of perjury it was necessary to have the evidence of at least two competent and credible witnesses before a person could be convicted. Bearing in mind the defence the accused made to the charge, it was important to note the delay that had taken place. The civil case was heard on the 22nd August, 1906, and apparently the first intimation of any prosecution that was given to the accused himself was on the 24th January, 1907. The crime of perjury was one that required the strictest proof, and in the first place the charge itself stated in the baldest manner that certain evidence was given by the accused in the Indian language, and that evidence given in the Indian language when rendered into English was to a certain effect. There was no proof to his mind that evidence was given in the Indian language, and had there been any such evidence he submitted the correct procedure should have been that the interpreter who interpreted the evidence should have been called for the Crown, and deposed that evidence was given, and correctly interpreted by him. The intermediary should have been called to fill up the gap in the evidence. Counsel referred to the practice laid down in Odgers (pp. 119, 580). There it was stated where the words spoken were in a foreign language the original words should be set out in a statement of claim, with an exact translation, and, if that was true in a statement of claim, it was doubly so in a criminal charge. If the words were in a foreign language, they should be set out verbatim. Counsel also referred to Re v. Goldstein (3 Brodriek and Bingham, 201), Tredgold on Criminal Law (p. 377).

Mr. Nightingale referred to an extract from Archbold (27th Edition, p. 64), as to what the law required in an indictment. There could have been absolutely no prejudice to the prisoner in this case. Allie was made insolvent, and at first treated as the principal by the creditors. Allie stated that he was only acting in all these transactions for an undisclosed principal, and that undisclosed principal was the accused. It was necessary for the accused to prove that any transactions he had with Allie were independent ones, and not under any agreement. Counsel submitted, with reference to the form of the indictment, that it was not of such a form as to prejudice the prisoner.

Buchanan, J.: This is an appeal from a conviction obtained in the Resident Magistrate's Court for the district of Cape Town, in which the appellant was charged on three counts with having committed perjury in a civil case which was tried in August last year. The issue in that case was whether one Allie, who has since become insolvent, acted for himself or for the defendant, Sheik Ismail, in the purchase of certain stock. The sheep and oxen referred to were bought from one Snyman, one Olivier, and one Niehaus.

The accused, on being convicted and sentenced, appealed, and gave notice to the Attorney-General of several grounds of appeal. They are objections to the form of the indictment, and objections on the merits of the case. The indictment or charge sheet sets forth that the accused gave evidence in a certain case "in the Indian language, in substance and to the effect following, that is to say, in the English language," and then setting out the evidence given at the civil trial. Objection was taken that it was not proved that the accused did give evidence in the Indian language, and that no interpreter was called to say that what accused was alleged to have said in the Indian language was correctly interpreted. What has been proved was, the notes of the shorthand-writer of the evidence, and in these notes are to be found the allegations set forth in the different charges of perjury. As a matter of fact, it transpires, not from the case for the Crown, but from the evidence called for the defence, that the accused did not speak in the Indian language, but that he spoke partly in English and partly in Dutch, when giving his evidence. It was argued that on the analogy of cases of defamation it is necessary to set forth the exact words used by the accused, and in the language in which he uttered them. During the course of the argument, I called attention of counsel to the case of the King v. Thomas, which had been decided in the English courts, where the difference was drawn between an action for defamation and an indictment for perjury. In the case of Re v. Thomas, the indictment charged that the defendant at an investigation before a Magistrate, had sworn "in substance and effect the following: that is to say," and set out in English in the first person the words alleged to have been used by the defendant. It was proved that the defendant in that case was examined in the Welsh language through an interpreter, and that his examination was translated into the English language, taken down in writing, and signed by the accused, a procedure similar to our preparatory examination. It was argued that the indictment should have set forth the exact words used in the first person. The presiding judge, Vaughan Williams, J., said that it might be necessary in the case of libel where proof of the precise language was necessary, to set out the actual words used, but that in a criminal charge for perjury it was only necessary to prove the substance and effect, and in that case conviction followed, and there does not seem to have been any appeal. That case has been frequently quoted in the textbooks since. Therefore, as to the first objection, which is one as to the form, I think the charge-sheet or indictment in this case must be taken to be sufficient. In my opinion it is not necessary, where the evidence given at a trial is in a foreign language, to set forth the ipsissima verba, but that it is sufficient if a correct translation in the English language is given of the words used. That disposes of the principal objection as to the form. At the same time, the statement in the charge sheet is erroneous, and should have been corrected at the trial, which was not done. On the merits, a great deal of argument has been addressed to the Court as to the effect of the evidence which was led. Though several objections are stated in the notice given to the Attorney-General, they may more or less all be summarised into one, that the conviction was contrary to the weight of evidence. It is, no doubt, obligatory on the Court, in cases of criminal appeal, to see whether any illegality or irregularity which has been committed at the trial has prejudiced the prisoner, and if the prisoner has not been so prejudiced, the Court is required by the statute not to set aside the conviction in consequence of such irregularity. One objection on the ground of irregularity contained in the notice is, that evidence had been improperly admitted, but that ground has not been strongly relied upon in argument. There was another objection, and a serious one in all indictments for perjury, that the portion of the evidence upon which the charges have been founded was not material to the issue before the Court, but the learned counsel has, I think, properly abandoned this ground, and I need not further consider it, but assume that the evidence was material. It is necessary, therefore, to see in what the alleged perjury consists. The charges are three in number, and the first one refers to the dealings with Olivier. As to these transactions, the accused said: "I was not there on the 8th or 9th January when Allie bought sheep from Olivier. I did not go to Olivier's shop about the 8th or 9th January with Allie to purchase the sheep." This evidence was clearly material to the issue, because the question at the trial was whether

Allie or Sheik Iemal bought the sheep. On this point, Olivier, who was called for the Crown, merely stated generally that the extract from the evidence of accused, given in the indictment is not true, yet he goes on to state that when he sold the sheep in question he sold them to Allie and not to Iemal, that he dealt with Allie and took promissory notes for the price from Allie, and when Allie became insolvent he proved in Allie's estate, making no reference to Iemal, and in his affidavit of proof he stated that no one else except Allie was indebted to him for the amount. This evidence, I think, should have received more consideration from the Magistrate. In a question of mere credibility of the witnesses it is almost impossible for a Court of Appeal to decide against the finding of the Magistrate. He has the witnesses before him, and is the proper person to decide if a witness is or is not to be believed. But the statement of Olivier in so far as it implied that the accused was with Allie on the 8th or 9th January was positively contradicted by witnesses, who very strongly support the evidence given by the accused at the trial, and contradict the charge made in the indictment. It is in this connection that the Court may well draw a distinction between the mere credibility of witnesses and whether the evidence is sufficient to support the conviction. We have Olivier himself proving that he dealt only with Allie, and gave credit only to Allie, and that he proved only against Allie's estate. And on the point whether or not the accused was present on the 8th and 9th of January, at Olivier's shop, at Tulbagh Road, evidence, which was not put before the Court at the original trial, very strongly supports the statement of the accused. The evidence of the bank clerk, who is an altogether disinterested witness, makes it appear that the accused on the 8th January was at the Bank of Africa, in Cape Town, on three separate occasions on that day, and deposited money to his credit on slips signed by himself, so that it is almost impossible for him to have been at Tulbagh Road on the 8th January. Then, as to the 9th January, we have cheques put in signed by the defendant on the 9th January, and cashed by the bank. These cheques, which are bona-fide documents, could not have been manufactured for the case, which had not then arisen. We have the evidence of Mr. Blaine, the manager of the slaughter-house at Matland, who says from his books it appears that the accused on the 8th January purchased from him sheep, and again on the 9th January, he purchased sheep, and he says: "I believe I sold to him personally." If the Magistrate had given due weight to this evidence and to these documents produced before him, I think he ought, at least, to have said that it was not sufficiently proved that the accused was at Olivier's shop on the 8th or 9th January. The evidence of contemporaneous documentary writings is so very strong that I think the Magistrate was not justified in coming to the conclusion that this charge was proved. The second charge is as to a transaction with one Snyman, and the charge is that the accused had said to Snyman, "I never said anything about a telegram, and that Snyman would get £150 before sunset; nor did I use the words 'what does the baas think of us?'" In a way, this was material to the issue in the civil action, though not very directly connected therewith. In his evidence, Snyman himself says: "Allie was the man with whom I did the business. The accused was present, and he and Allie spoke. I sold the sheep to Allie." He never stated he spoke to the accused. Allie signed the promissory note, and as to the £150 it was sent by telegram. Accused later got the money from Allie. He says later in his evidence: "I thought they were both Allies." It does appear in the course of the case that there were other Indians engaged in sheep transactions beside the accused, and Snyman, instead of considering that Ismail had anything to do with the transaction, said "I got two promissory notes from Allie." He also claimed on the estate of Allie on the notes, and in his proof of debt said that no other person but Allie was liable to him for the price. He further says, "I arranged the price of the sheep with Allie." Upon the issue as to whether the accused or Allie bought the stock, this evidence is strongly in favour of the accused, as showing that Allie was the purchaser and not the accused.

The third charge is that the accused said: "On the 19th December I did not buy oxen from Niehaus." Niehaus says, "Allie said he and accused were partners. I did not speak to accused. I had a promissory note from Allie for the previous transactions. The receipts I gave in the name of Allie." In addition to this there is the evidence of the station-master at Porterville-road that the stock bought was consigned by Allie to Allie, and that the name of the accused did not come into the transaction at all. I think, on the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution, that on this third charge also the Magistrate was not justified in finding the accused had bought the oxen from Niehaus. Under these circumstances I do not think any Court should say that the accused's evidence was false when he said that he did not buy the oxen from Niehaus.

These are the three charges against the prisoner. Although the conviction has taken place, it does not entirely depend upon a question of credibility. Looking at the way the charge has been brought, and the additional evidence supplied at the criminal trial which was not led in the civil case, I think the proper verdict of the Magistrate should have been a verdict of acquittal. The appeal must be allowed and the conviction and sentence quashed.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

ESTATE WILKINSON V. } 1907.
WILKINSON. { June 24th.

Mr. Howes moved for a certain rule interdicting a certain sale of a farm, stock, and movables in Griqualand West to be set aside. Counsel said that the rule was granted on the application of the present respondent, who was now in court, and prepared to consent to the interdict being removed, on condition that certain personal property should not be sold. Wilkinson was the adopted son of the deceased Mr. Wilkinson, and he claimed against the estate under a will which he said was privileged.

Respondent appeared and said that he consented to the sale being proceeded with on condition that the personal property set out in the list produced should not be sold.

Rule set aside by consent, applicants undertaking that the goods in question be not sold, with leave to telegraph the order of the Court, costs to come out of the estate.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SUTHERLAND V. ROBERTS.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan produced an amended return of service in this matter, and moved for provisional sentence on a Magistrate's Court judgment. Counsel explained that the matter was before the Court on Friday last, and was ordered to stand over for a fuller return by the Sheriff. The summons stated that a writ had been issued, and a return of nulla bona made, whereas it should have said that a writ was issued, and, the defendant having left the jurisdiction of the Magistrate, it was impossible to serve it. The Sheriff now reported that he had served the summons, and also a copy of the judgment therein by fixing it to the front door of the defendant's last known place of residence.

[Hopley, J.: Ought you not to have served defendant with a copy of the writ? That has not been done.]

Mr. Buchanan: It could not be served because he had left the jurisdiction.

Hopley, J.: Why not serve it in the same way as you served the other processes, by fixing it at his last known place of residence? However, this is only a provisional matter, and he can come and contest it if he thinks fit. There are informalities in the matter, and, of course, no extra costs involved by these informalities will be allowed against the defendant. Provisional sentence will be granted, with costs of one appearance only.

ESTATE SIMPSON V. ESTATE GRESSE
AND ANOTHER.

This was an application upon notice to the executrix testamentary in the estate Gresse and Cornelius Ford to show cause why the applicants, the executors testamentary of the late Samuel Arthur Simpson, should not be granted leave to sub-let to one P. J. Truter the farm of Spitzkop, together with a portion of the farm Van Staaden's Kraal, as leased by respondents to the said Simpson, since deceased, under written agreement of lease dated the 8th September, 1904, and why the applicants should not be authorised to grant to the said Truter the right of occupation and use of the said farm until the 30th June, 1908.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for applicant; Mr. M. Bisset was for respondent.

Affidavits having been read,

Mr. Jones, in argument, cited De Vries v. Alexander (Foord, 43) and Van der Kessel (674), and referred to the ninth article of the Plaacaats of 1658.

Mr. Bisset cited Green v. Griffiths (4 Jut.), the "Cape Law Journal," vol. 3, on the ninth article of the Plaacaats, and Nathan, vol. 2, p. 284.

Mr. Jones, in his reply, quoted Grotius (3, 19, 9).

Hopley, J.: I think I may again express my regret that the parties have come into court in this matter, at all events at the present stage of matters between them, because it does seem to me that from the requests made in the notice of motion and upon the general aspect of the case as between the applicant and respondents, it would be very difficult for the Court to do more than simply express an opinion that might guide the parties in the future, but which cannot possibly settle the matter between them in the way in which the Court is asked to do. It would appear that the late Mr. Simpson, who seems to have died in the course of this year, had hired from the respondents for three years a farm Spitzkop, and another farm, the two together being known for the purpose of the lease as Spitzkop, and that he had paid the rent, as far as one can follow from the papers and affidavits, for the whole term of the lease, expiring on the 30th June, 1908. After his death in April, his executors advertised a sale of his assets, and among other things they advertised that they would sell the unexpired lease of the farm Spitzkop. Now, an objection was made a day or two before the sale, which was to take place on the 1st May, that they had no right to sell this farm, because it was a praedium rusticum, and there was no right to sub-let in the agreement of lease. That, of course, has been the recognised law of this colony for a considerable time, and if the decisions of this Court be correct, as we are bound to hold that they are correct, and in view of the decision in the case of De Vries v. Alexander, then it has been the law of this colony ever since the occupation of this country by a civilised race. That being the case, the present applicants, the executors of Simpson, when they received the protest, knowing that a sale of this leasehold would be contrary to the terms of the law—and they must be supposed to have known the law—ought to have abandoned the sale, and to have kept the matter back for further consideration, but they decided to disregard the protest, and they sold provisionally to Mr. Truter, for a sum of £80 odd, the right of the unexpired portion of the lease, and, in spite of the protest which had been made, Mr. Truter thereupon put some stock upon the farm. Subsequent correspondence took place, and the respondents seem to have asserted that they had rather larger rights over this land than I am inclined at the present stage to think they had. They appear to have taken action before the Circuit Court, and asked leave to sell this very farm. It appears that the widow Gresse had got into some money difficulties, and that she applied to the Court on Circuit for leave to sell this farm to meet pressing liabilities to the Divisional Council and other creditors, and that she had been accorded such leave, judging from the statement of counsel, on the ground that an existing fidei commissum should be transferred from this farm to the town property, which had not been burdened. That sale, as I understand, has not yet taken place, and it is now said that, notwithstanding that there was this existing lease over the farm, the respondents maintain that they have a right to sell this farm absolutely free of any claim that the estate of Simpson may have over it until the 30th June, 1908, by virtue of this lease. There, it seems to me, they are wrong. They cannot sell like that. If they sell, even under an order of Court, they will have to sell subject to the rights of the lessees, and it seems to me that under those circumstances the sale of the farm would in all probability be damaged, so that I think it would have been better for them to have agreed with the executors of Simpson to settle their claim on the farm and pay them out. I can only say, as a matter of advice, that it would probably be a wise thing at this stage and in the present position of affairs, to settle with the lessees before they put up the farm for sale by auction, because I do not see any reason why the applicants should recede from their rights. I cannot see what there is to prevent the applicants from saying, "At all events the ground is ours, and we have paid for it until the 30th June, 1908; you may now conduct your sale, but subject to our lease, and no purchaser of the place shall set foot upon that farm until the 30th June, 1908." I cannot see any reason why they should not take up that attitude, and that would necessarily damage the sale of the farm to a large extent. So it seems to me to be eminently a case for a compromise. I do not see why respondents did not accept the reasonable offer made in the correspondence by the applicants of a proportionate amount of money which had been paid by Simpson in advance during his lifetime. However, that was not accepted, and the respondents seem to me to have claimed larger rights over the property than they will be able eventually to establish. But what I have at this moment to consider is whether I can give any relief to the applicants in the present form in which they ask for it. I have said perhaps more than I need say upon what I think will be the position of the parties, but I am asked in this notice of motion to decide whether the applicants should be given leave to sub-let the farm to Truter. As to that, I do not see that the Court can do anything in the matter. That portion of the application cannot be granted. Then the respondents are called upon to show cause, otherwise, why the applicants should not be authorised to grant to Truter until the 30th June, 1908, the right to occupy and use the said farm. This is simply asking the same thing in another form. The Court clearly cannot grant that part of the application either. Then the applicants ask for general relief, but it seems to me that it is not so specifically set forth what sort of alternative relief they require as to put the respondents on their guard and to authorise or make it possible for the Court fairly to say there should be any order as to the return of the money, or anything of that kind, which has already been paid by way of lease. As the matter comes before the Court to-day, I do not think I can grant the applicants any relief whatever, and the application must be refused and no order made. I would only add that I hope that this case, in which the parties are spending money that they can ill afford, will not be heard of here again, but will be settled out of court. The application must be refused, however, with costs.

GREEVE V. KEAL.

Mr. Roux moved in this matter for directions as to the service of a certain citation in an action to be brought by petitioner against respondent, Herbert Sidney Keal, late of East Griqualand, to recover damages for alleged seduction. When the matter was last before the Court it was stated that respondent, who was a minor, had left for the Argentine, and that his address was not known to petitioner. It was ordered that certain moneys standing to his credit in the Guardians' Fund should be attached ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and that the question of service should be mentioned later. (17 C.T.R., 314). Counsel now presented an affidavit by petitioner's attorney, giving respondent's address in the Argentine Republic.

Ordered that service be effected on the curator ad litem (respondent's elder brother), and also by registered letter, addressed to respondent at the address given in the attorney's affidavit, citation returnable on the 24th October, with leave to serve notice of trial and intendit with citation.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

MCKINNON V. MCKINNON. { 1907.
 { June 25th.

This was an action brought by Elizabeth Gordon McKinnon, of Woodstock, against her husband, John Hutton McKinnon, for a decree of judicial separation by reason of the defendant's cruelty.

The plaintiff's declaration set out that she was married to the defendant out of community of property at Aberdeen, Scotland, on 18th January, 1896. There were issue of the marriage two boys and two girls, aged respectively ten, eight, seven, and six years. About 1896 the defendant came to reside permanently in this colony, and later the plaintiff joined him, and the parties had since resided in this colony. About six years ago the defendant began to give way to intemperate habits, and in consequence began to abuse plaintiff by threats of violence, use of opprobrious terms towards her, and by physical ill-treatment, and his conduct had become increasingly violent. In September, 1903, defendant violently beat plaintiff and struck her savagely in the face, as a result of which both plaintiff's eyes were blackened and her face contused and cut. In August, 1904, he again violently assaulted her and bruised her face and back, threw water on her, threatened to kill her with a razor, and turned her out of the house. In January, 1906, defendant again violently assaulted plaintiff and threatened to kill her, and plaintiff was forced to leave the house in fear of her life. On various dates in May, 1906, he assaulted plaintiff and threatened to kill her if she did not leave the house, and plaintiff left the house in fear of her life. Thereafter defendant came to plaintiff and threatened to make it hot for her if she attempted to return to the house. On several occasions the defendant had accused her of immorality, for which accusations plaintiff said there was no foundation in fact. By reason of his cruelty and threats she feared if she returned to live with him it would be with bodily risk and to the danger of her life. Plaintiff claimed a decree of judicial separation, custody of the minor children, and such order for maintenance as the Court might seem fit and suitable.

The defendant, in his plea, denied the allegations of cruelty, and stated he was willing and desirous that the plaintiff should return to him, he being prepared to meet her and let all that had passed be forgotten, notwithstanding the fact that she had forsaken him and their children and refused to cohabit with him. For a claim in reconvention he claimed that the defendant be ordered to restore to him his conjugal rights, with the alternative relief of a decree of divorce and costs of suit.

The replication was general.

Dr. Greer was for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeared in person.

Elizabeth Gordon McKinnon, plaintiff, stated that on the 18th January, 1896, she was married at Aberdeen, Scotland. After her marriage she went to London, and lived there for a while. Her husband came out to South Africa the same year, and witness followed him. After the marriage the defendant from time to time ill-treated her, and had given her many a blow. About 1902 she resided at Regent-street, Woodstock, with her husband, and there, after her return, she was about to visit a party who was sick when the defendant followed her, pulled her back to the house by the hair, and struck her in the face.

[Buchanan, J.: was he sober at the time?]

Witness: Not altogether. Defendant's action was a surprise to her. In August, 1904, he threatened witness if she returned to him he would break every bone in her body. Witness climbed the back yard wall, and was able to go through the window, when the defendant caught hold of her and struck her on the face. He dragged her by the hair into the house, and threatened to cut her throat with a razor. Subsequently he threw buckets of water over her in the yard, and pursued her to a neighbour's house, where he hammered her on the back until she expectorated blood. Finally, he said if she came back he would not repeat the ill-treatment. In January, 1906, he resumed his violence, and accused her of misconduct with other men, which accusation was entirely unfounded. He again threatened to cut her throat, and do "several things of that sort." Witness left the house for a few days, when the defendant made further promises, and witness returned, only to find a repetition of the violence, which on this occasion was accompanied by kicking. On the 19th May he said: "If you don't get out of the house before I come back for dinner, I will put you out." When he came back he said, "You are still here!" Witness said, "I intend to remain." Then defendant put her out of the house, and then she finally left him. Witness had been earning for eight months £5 3s. 4d. a month as a cook on Robben Island. Witness's friends would take care of the children until she had permission to take them to the Island. Witness was desirous of a separation being arranged without coming into court.

Cross-examined by defendant: We will start from the beginning. Just turn your face this way please. Did you not get a bad name until I married you?

[Buchanan, J.: You have no right to put that question. It is not relevant to the case at all.]

Defendant: You asked me to marry you?

[Buchanan, J.: Do not answer that question. (To the defendant) If you want to set up anything of that kind it is all cured by the marriage, and it is not raised in the pleadings in any way.]

Defendant: I only wish to show her character.

Defendant: When the row occurred did you not take a hat-pin and stick me?—No, you struck me a blow in the face, and when you ran at me the second time, I held a hat-pin out.

On the second row, did I not find you in Mr. Shand's bedroom?—No.

Did I not object to your going into his bedroom?—You were always in my company when I went there.

Finally, when you did leave me, we had an agreement if Shand was to get married I would not take proceedings against you?—I do not understand you.

You know perfectly well we had a verbal agreement to that effect, and that I would not take proceedings against you and damages against Shand?—What has Shand got to do with it?

Continuing, the plaintiff denied throwing a looking-glass at the defendant, and on one occasion lying down with the children when her clothes were full of mud.

[Buchanan, J.: I see by the affidavits you have an inheritance left to you in Scotland.]

Witness: Yes, it is not quite settled yet.

Have you got the money?—Not yet. What is the amount?—£50.

He wanted you to go to Scotland?—Yes.

What is your objection to go there?—People might say I was cleared out of the country.

You do not wish to leave the colony?—No.

If there is a separation, would it not be as well to let him have the two boys, and you have the two girls?—I should like to have the two boys.

Mrs. Hopkins and Mrs. Marshall also gave evidence of the defendant's ill-treatment.

James Shand, a shipwright, stated that on an occasion in September, 1902, the defendant came into witness's house, and asked if he had seen his wife. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff came in with some letters in her hand, and gave witness his letters. The defendant said a letter was for him, and then he ran after the plaintiff to her own house, when witness shortly afterwards heard shouting. When he went out plaintiff was at the kitchen door, and defendant was striking her. Witness said "No fighting here," and shoved the defendant outside the door. The plaintiff was bleeding about the mouth. He denied the allegations of the defendant that he had misconducted himself with the plaintiff.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

James Mills, who lived with the defendant in 1903, stated that on one occasion the defendant told him he had been stuck by a hat-pin by the plaintiff. The defendant then dragged her into the front room, and kept her there until her temper was down.

Defendant: Will you describe a typical Saturday in our house?—You got up in the morning. You made the breakfast, gave the children their breakfast, and the plaintiff her breakfast. When you came home you bathed the children, and made her supper when she came back.

Very often she was out when we came home to dinner?—Very often.

The dinner was simply left anyhow?—Yes.

Sometimes the dinner was just "slung" on the table?—Yes.

The majority of times you came to the house you found her in Shand's room?—Yes.

Other witnesses for the defence gave evidence as to the relationship between plaintiff and defendant, a coloured servant amongst them stating that the defendant did more than most husbands would do for a wife.

The defendant's sons, boys of nine years and eleven years respectively, also gave evidence unfavourable to their mother, and stated they would rather remain with their father.

The defendant went into the witness-box, and said that he had always worked hard for the plaintiff. When they came out here plaintiff made the acquaintance of a woman who had given her wrong impressions as to her duty towards her husband. Subsequently he removed from his place of residence, but the plaintiff continued to visit this woman much against his wishes. Shand subsequently came to live beside them, and witness, becoming suspicious, advised the plaintiff to stay away from Shand, but this she refused to do. Subsequently they had several rows about the matter.

[Buchanan, J.: Is there no chance of your wife and you coming together?]

If she tries to lead a genuine life and get clear of these people.

Dr. Greer submitted it was perfectly clear from the evidence that it was impossible for these two people to live happily together. The plaintiff seemed quite justified in assuming her life would be in danger. The plaintiff was entitled to the custody of the two children, at any rate, the two younger ones.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff in this case, the wife, sues for a judicial separation, on the ground of cruelty. The defendant, the husband, denies the cruelty, and claims in reconvention a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. The parties have been married some eleven or twelve years. They were married in Scotland, and came out to this colony. The husband is a man in good occupation, earning 12s. a day. After hearing the evidence, the charges in the declaration, I think, have been greatly exaggerated, still sufficient has been disclosed to show that there had been blows struck and threats made by the defendant against the plaintiff. There may be faults on both sides, there usually are in such a case. Under the whole of the circumstances of the case, I do not think that I can give the defendant a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights. I think sufficient has been disclosed to show that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree of judicial separation. This decree does not divorce the parties. They still remain husband and wife, and if at any time the parties make up their differences and live together again, this decree will not prevent them from doing so. As long as the judicial separation lasts, I think plaintiff should have the custody, at any rate, of the two younger girls, and the defendant have the custody of the two boys. As long as the two girls are in the custody of the plaintiff, or until a further order, the defendant will pay to the plaintiff £1 a month for each child until it attains the age of sixteen, the first payment to be made on July 1 next, and thereafter on the 1st of each succeeding month. The defendant at any time in the future will have leave to apply to the Court for the custody of the two girls, if they are not properly taken care of by the mother, or if not properly treated. I think this separation of the children is one which the parents should consider in the interests of their children, if not in their own interests. The plaintiff is to have access to the two elder children, and the defendant to have access to the two younger children at all reasonable times and places, the defendant to pay the costs of the action, including the costs of the exception.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr Justice HOPLEY.]

ADMISSIONS. { 1907.
 { June 25th.

Mr. Long moved for the admission of Dominick Eckley McCausland as an advocate.

Application granted, and oath administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LA COMPAGNIE COMMERCIALE DES COLONIES V. LEVY.

Mr. Wallach moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

JACOBSON BROS. V. JACOBSON.

Mr. Roux moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

ELIASON V. KATZ.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £35, with interest and taxed costs.

Defendant said that he was unable to satisfy the judgment or make any offer. He earned £8 or £9 a month, and had to maintain a wife and four children. Witness was already paying £2 a month to other creditors out of his wages.

By the Court: Witness would endeavour to pay £1 a month out of his wages. It would take another ten months to satisfy the other debt at the rate of £2 a month.

Decree of civil imprisonment granted, with costs, execution to be suspended upon payment of 15s. per month, first payment to be made at the office of the plaintiff's attorney on the 1st July, with leave to plaintiff to move for an increased order when so advised.

CYONA PRESS V. ANDERSON.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment for £35 19s. 6d., with interest from the 8th May, 1906, and £11 1s. 9d. taxed costs.

Defendant said that he was absolutely penniless. He had only had occasional jobs for the past nine or ten months, and he was at present without employment.

Cross-examined: Witness's father owned about 12 houses at Woodstock and elsewhere. He was living in one of the houses, and, in place of paying rent, he did repairs where required. Witness's partner had left him with about £100 of debts to meet.

Hopley, J.: It does seem a discreditable sort of thing that you should be just living on.

Witness: Yes, but I cannot find work. I cannot get work even at a low wage. No order was made.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

VAN RYN WINE AND SPIRIT CO., LIMITED, V. KLAASON.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £46 1s. 11d. for goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Order granted.

SUTHERLAND V. ROBERTS.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan applied for an extension of the return day of a certain writ of arrest. Defendant was, it was alleged, about to leave the jurisdiction and take his departure by the Marathon, but the ship had not yet arrived, and it was necessary that the return day should be extended.

At a later stage, Mr. Buchanan said that the boat had arrived, and an arrangement had been made between plaintiff and defendant whereby the latter would proceed by the Marathon. Counsel applied for costs of the writ.

Hopley, J., said that he could not grant an order for costs on an ex parte application.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte ESTATE WEBBER. { 1907.
June 25th.

Mr. Inchbold moved for an order authorising the transfer of certain estate property in the division of Bedford to a firm of which one of the partners is an executor on the estate. The land had been bought at public auction by the firm.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte JACKSON.

Mr. Palmer moved, on the petition of the tutor of the minor children of the late Captain Charles Henry Jackson, for an order authorising the Master to pay from the inheritance due to the minors certain sums for their maintenance and education.

Order granted authorising the Master to pay to the tutor the allowances specified, viz., £60 for Charles G. Jackson, £100 per annum for Munton F. Jackson, until his majority, and £70 per annum for Reneira C. Jackson until her majority, as required from time to time upon proof that the moneys have been properly expended for the said minors in each case, and that they are properly provided for.

Ex parte KAFFRARIAN STEAM MILL COMPANY, LIMITED.

Mr. Close moved, on the petition of the Kaffrarian Steam Mill Company, Limited, of King William's Town, for the registration of a certain deed of settlement. Petitioners stated that the company was registered under the Act 23, 1861, and was constituted under a deed of settlement which had from time to time been altered or amended, the powers of the company having been enlarged and the capital increased. It had been considered expedient, in the interest of the company, to consolidate the original and supplementary deeds of settlement, and to increase its powers to a certain extent, and to make provision for an increase of capital if the same should be required hereafter. At a meeting of shareholders on the 27th March last, it was resolved that the capital should be increased from £100,000 to £250,000 by the creation of 150,000 shares, and that the deed of agreement and the various additions be repealed, and a new and consolidated deed of settlement submitted to the meeting be substituted. The Registrar of Deeds, however, took various objections to the documents tendered to him, the principal being that under section 8 of the new deed it was stated that the capital of the company was increased. The Registrar objected that the provisions of section 6 of Act 23, 1861, had not been complied with with regard to the increase of capital. It had not been the intention of the company to actually increase its capital at the present time, nor had it been intended to advertise or hold out in any way that the capital had been increased unless and until it had been done in accordance with law. The various objections taken by the Registrar had been met, and in particular in respect of section 8 of the new deed. The wording thereof had been altered so as to provide for an increase of capital in future if necessary, so that it did not appear that the capital was represented to have been increased without compliance with the provisions of section 6. The Registrar of Deeds, in his report, said that the document was originally laid before him within the time prescribed in section 7, but, when re-lodged subsequently, the period fixed by the section had expired, nearly a month having elapsed since the document was first tendered. He declined to register the deed unless authorised by the Court.

[Hopley, J. (to Mr. Close): The Court, I suppose, has by practice the right to amend the laches of the company in not applying in absolute correct form?]

Mr. Close said he understood that there had been several precedents.

The Registrar of Deeds (in answer to the Court) said that there had been several cases previously where the Court had authorised registration under similar circumstances.

Order granted as prayed.

In re ORANGE RIVER IRRIGATION CO., LTD.

Mr. Sutton presented the second report of the official liquidator, and applied for the usual order as to lying for inspection and also as to publication. Counsel called the Court's attention to a letter which had been addressed to one of the judges in relation to the matter, in which he urged that some joint action should be taken, in conjunction with the English shareholders, for the reconstruction of the company. This letter had been referred to the liquidator, whose observations thereon were also read. The liquidator, in his third report, recommended confirmation of the acceptance of a bid of £5,500, which had been received at a sale of the company's properties and assets, and that he be given power to distribute the proceeds in the legal order of preference.

Order granted, report to lie for inspection at the office of the liquidator for six weeks, and to be published once in the "Cape Times" forthwith.

CALEDONIAN LANDING, SHIPPING, AND SALVAGE CO., LTD., AND ANOTHER, V. EAST LONDON HARBOUR BOARD.

This was an application for an amendment of the order granted by the Court in an action brought by applicants against respondents for damages arising out of a freshet in the Buffalo River. (16 C.T.R., 792.)

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for applicants; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., was for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin said that the actions came before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Hopley, and damages were given against defendants in the one case for £3,000, and in the other for £250. The order of the Court was, however, silent as to interest, and now the applicants asked that interest should be added to the judgment. He (counsel) was not aware whether under the circumstances it would be the desire of the Court that the matter should be heard when their lordships were both sitting.

Mr. Justice Hopley: You ought to have asked for interest at the time. You got your judgment. Why did you not execute? I do not think you will find that the Chief Justice will want to add interest at this date. I do not think we had in contemplation at the time that interest should be given.

Mr. Benjamin said that the affidavits set forth the reasons for the delay in executing.

After further argument,

Mr. Justice Hopley said that he would try and arrange so that the application could be heard before the Chief Justice and himself, though he might say that he had no particular sympathy for the application at the present moment, but, of course, when he had heard the affidavits, he might see some reason for changing his mind. The matter would, therefore, stand over for the present.

Ex parte GARLICK.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order restraining J. and A. Rae from removing certain goods from certain premises in Strand-street, Cape Town, leased by petitioner to respondents. Petitioner said that respondents owed him £135 for arrear rent, under a lease dated January, 1906, for a term of eight years, and that at the end of this month a further sum of £45 would become due. He had reason to believe that it was respondents' intention to abandon the lease. He did not wish to hamper unduly their business, and suggested that in order to enable them to execute orders, they should be allowed to remove goods from the premises, on condition that the proceeds should be placed under suitable control, so as to be available in lieu of the articles.

Ordered that the respondents be restrained from removing the goods in the said premises, pending payment of arrear rent, or result of an action for such rent, the said interdict not to prevent ordinary business transactions, provided that sums of money received in such transactions be placed to a special account in a bank to abide the order of this Court, or be paid to plaintiff on account of the said debt, or be paid to the Registrar of this Court, respondents to have leave to move to set aside this order.

LIPSCHITZ AND TOOCH V. SAPIERO.

Mr. Burton, K.C., moved, on behalf of defendant in the action (Sapiero) for an order for the removal of the case to the Water Court at Oudtshoorn or the next ensuing Circuit Court at Oudtshoorn.

Mr. Close (for the plaintiffs) opposed the application.

Mr. Burton said he felt that he could not press the matter so far as the Water Court was concerned, but he submitted that the case might properly be removed to the Circuit Court.

Mr. Close submitted that, in view of the great delay which might take place before the Circuit Court sat at Oudtshoorn it would be a convenience that the case should be heard in the Supreme Court, and there was also the question of plaintiff's right to select his forum.

Hopley, J.: While I am inclined to agree with Mr. Close as to the right of plaintiff to choose the forum in which the case should be tried, where two or more forums are open to him, I am also in accordance with his remark that when good cause is shown the Supreme Court will remove a case which has been brought in it to the Circuit Court if that be a more convenient course, and I think in this present case it is a more convenient course. It is a paltry matter, as far as the amounts of damages are concerned, and it is not to my mind a fair thing for the plaintiff to bring the defendant at great expense to Cape Town to a much more expensive court than the one which is the natural forum for such trifling disputes, and put him to the great expense of defending an action at the distance which the Supreme Court is from Oudtshoorn. I am not saying anything as to the time of this Court, which, of course, should be at the disposal of all litigants, and I do not think in the present term we are so pressed for time that we need consider that, but at the same time it seems to me very much more likely that at the place there the Circuit Judge would meet with the evidence and be able to appreciate it probably quite as well as, if not better than, we here in the Supreme Court would be able to do, and both on that ground and on the ground of expense and the comparative smallness of the dispute between the parties, it seems to me that the case ought to be removed. The fact that a period of about three months has still to run before the Circuit Court sits does not seem to me to be a very important element in the matter, and in fact it may be an advantage, because the parties may come to their senses in the meantime and put this matter before an arbitrator. The case will be removed to the next Circuit Court at Oudtshoorn, costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte GREEN AND CO., LTD.

This was an application for leave to reduce the company's capital.

The petition was as follows: E. K. Green and Co., Ltd., and reduced, hereinafter styled the company, was incorporated and registered as a company under the provisions of the Companies' Act, 1892, on the 30th day of May, 1901. The registered office of the company is at No. 21, Somerset-road, Cape Town. The original capital as incorporated was £160,000, divided in 16,000 shares of £10 sterling each, of which 14,400 were ordinary shares and 1,600 were preference shares. On the 17th April, 1903, the capital was increased from £160,000 to £200,000, divided into 20,000 shares of £10 sterling each, of which 14,400 are ordinary shares and 5,600 are preference shares, as will be seen from an extract of the company's minutes hereto annexed marked "C." The further 4,000 preference shares at £10 each were also fully issued and paid up. The said increase of capital was confirmed in general meeting on the 4th day of May, 1903. The further capital introduced in 1903 was necessary in order to provide for the development of the company's business. In consideration for securing the additional capital of £40,000 to the company, and waiving certain rights provided by the memorandum and articles of association, there was reserved to preference shareholders the right to apply for and to have their preference shares converted at par into debentures to be covered by a mortgage duly passed and registered against the assets of E. K. Green and Co., Ltd. The said option or right to claim to have their holdings converted into debentures secured by a mortgage was confirmed in general meeting of the company on the 17th

April, 1903. The preference shareholders have notified the company that they have decided to exercise their right to have their preference shareholdings converted into debentures. For a time negotiations were carried on to issue debenture bonds in order to satisfy the requests of preference shareholders in terms of their option previously referred to, but it was found to be inadvisable and inexpedient to issue debenture bonds inasmuch as the company can obtain better terms. A sum of £56,000 has been offered to the company on loan at a favourable rate of interest on condition that it cannot be called up for thirty years, but that the company may at any time redeem the said loan. The company is a family concern. Its shares were originally apportioned in terms of an agreement registered with the Registrar of Deeds, Cape Town, in terms of section 97 of the Companies' Act, 1892, copy of which is hereto appended marked "G" (clause 3). The company's shares are at present exclusively held by the members of the families of Edward Knolles Green, Abraham Frederick Green, and Hesperus Ritzema Kuys Green, no shares being held by the public outside of these holders, and, moreover, certain rights of pre-emption exist whereby any shares intended for sale must first be offered to existing shareholders at a fixed price. The books of the company are balanced and audited monthly, and allow the company's financial position to be accurately ascertained as on the 31st May 1907. The books of the company have been so audited as will appear from the sworn declaration and certificate of Mr. Maynard Nash, the company's auditor. The financial position of the company has not undergone any appreciable change since the 31st May, 1907. The only bond over the company's properties is one for £25,315 19s. 2d., passed in favour of the estate of the late Edward Knolles Green, the founder of the business and the ancestor of its present directors. The procedure adopted by the company in discharging its liabilities is as follows: (a) All purchases made by the company from wine farmers are paid for in prompt cash; (b) All purchases and imports from Europe and elsewhere are paid at sight of draft accompanying the documents of shipment, except where the imports partake of the nature of consignments. (c) Local purchases are made upon the usual 30 days' terms, and paid for promptly during the succeeding month. Although the company acquired the business in 1901, when prices of landed property were inflated, the prices paid for all landed property taken over under the agreement marked "G" was at actual cost to the late partnership notwithstanding the fact that several such properties were transferred to the late E. K. Green as far back as 1859 to 1869. The goodwills of the company's businesses are not valued or in any way shown in the company's books. Licenses, wherever held by the company are, however valuable, not taken into account in the company's books of balance-sheet. The maturation and increase in value of the company's stocks are not taken into consideration, and the value of its stock as shown on its financial statements is at actual cost. Over and above such provisions, there is a substantial reserve fund. The company has since 1901 experienced prosperous years. At the close of each of the company's financial years, when dividends are regularly declared, it has been the uninterrupted practice of shareholders to re-invest their dividends with the company upon deposit at a rate of interest, and in aggregate the ordinary shareholders have become the company's largest creditors. The only creditors of the company are: (a) Depositors of cash who have invested their moneys with the company. (b) Current creditors of local purchases, which will be paid during the month of June or July. (c) Creditors for current expenses such as salaries, rates, and other charges of a similar nature, none of which are due. There are ample funds to meet all liabilities, and if the company's assets, properly valued, were taken into account, there would be a substantially large surplus between its liabilities and assets over and above its actual capital. In consequence of all these facts, the directors of the company have for some time past realised that the company's capital of £200,000 is largely in excess of the wants of the company, and it was therefore decided by the directors to call a special general meeting of its shareholders together with a view of ascertaining their wishes in the matter. The articles of association of the company, annexed hereto marked "B," contain a power to reduce the capital of the company (article 56). Notices, a certified copy of which is hereto annexed marked "H2," were sent to the several shareholders of the company concerning an extraordinary general meeting. It was the unanimous feeling of such meeting that in view of the facts hereinbefore stated, it is desirable to reduce the capital as proposed, and the necessary resolutions were carried. A further special or extraordinary general meeting of members of the company was thereafter convened under the provisions of section 110 of the Companies' Act of 1892, in terms of the notice, which meeting "as held as notified on Thursday, the 26th June, 1907, when the resolutions passed at the meeting held on the 5th June, 1907, were duly confirmed. All members of the company, without exception, are either resident in the Cape Colony or represented by duly authorised representatives. The various notices herein-before referred to were in terms of section 66 of the articles of association of the company, duly delivered to all members or their representatives. A very large proportion of the company's creditors have notified their approval and sanction of the reduction in the company's capital. The creditors, according to the list, who have approved of the reduction in the company's capital, represent over 89-90ths of the company's total liabilities. The remaining creditors, representing about 1-90th of the company's liabilities, are creditors who are either not resident in the Cape Colony or whose indebtedness will be discharged during the current month, and in the usual course of business, or who are creditors from whom consignments of goods have been received on terms that the amount is payable on realisation. All preference shareholders, as well as the Colonial Orphan Chamber and Trust Company, as agents for the executors of the estate of the late E. K. Green, have approved of and sanctioned the reduction in the company's capital. The form of minute proposed to be registered is as follows: "The capital of the company is £144,000, divided into 14,400 ordinary shares of £10 each, instead of £200,000, divided into 5,600 preference shares of £10 and 14,400 ordinary shares of £10 each. At the time of the registration of this minute the sum of £10 has been, and is, to be deemed to be paid up on each of the said 14,400 ordinary £10 shares." Wherefore your petitioner, the company, respectfully prays that your lordships may be pleased to grant: (1) That an order may be made confirming the resolution for the reduction of the capital of the company, and approving the minute heretofore set out, and that for that purpose all proper directions may be given. (2) That the addition of the words "and reduced" to the name of the company and notices by advertisement may be dispensed with. (3) That failing such dispensation, all necessary and proper directions may be given, and that a day may be fixed on and after which the addition of the words "and reduced" to the company's name may be dispensed with. (4) Or that such other order may be made in the premises as to the Court shall seem meet.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., for the applicants.

Mr. Benjamin said that all the creditors had consented, except a few who had not been consulted, and who were either not resident in the Colony or whose liabilities were simply the current liabilities to be met during the course of the month. The claims of these creditors were very small amounts.

[Hopley, J.: You say these are current creditors?]

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, current creditors, or creditors who have consigned goods on realisation.

[Hopley, J.: What I don't understand is, what is the object of reducing the capital of this company, seeing that it is a flourishing concern?]

Mr. Benjamin said the fact was that they had got too much capital; they had more capital than they actually required.

[Hopley, J.: What harm is there in that?]

Mr. Benjamin: The proposal is to return this capital to the shareholders, as not being required any further in the business; it cannot be profitably utilised in the business.

[Hopley, J.: Instead of having £200,000 of capital which they do not require, they want to pay out the cash to the shareholders, who are willing to receive it?]

Mr. Benjamin: That is so. As a matter of fact, the company is entirely a business concern, and all the shareholders are in the family.

[Hopley, J.: It is not a case of cancelling capital which has been lost or represented by unavailable assets?]

Mr. Benjamin assented.

Rule nisi granted, returnable on the 16th July, calling upon all persons concerned to show cause why the resolution for the reduction of the capital should not be sanctioned in terms of prayers (1) and (2), one publication in the "Cape Times," "South African News," and "Government Gazette" forthwith.

Mr. McGregor, K.C., moved for judgment under Rule 329d as against the first defendant, who had not entered an appearance, judgment in terms of a consent paper as against the second defendant, and judgment against the third defendant under Rule 319.

Judgment entered in terms of the consent paper as against the second defendant, and in terms of the declaration as against the first and third defendants.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

UPTON V. CORDER. } 1907.
} June 26th.

This was an action in which William Henry Upton, of Cape Town, sought to recover from Wm. James Corder, of Kimberley, the sum of £1,000 as damages for slander.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he was a travelling representative of certain British hardware manufacturers, and resided in Cape Town. In or about February, 1905, the defendant falsely and maliciously published to one G. H. Upward, the manager of the hardware department of Messrs. Harvey, Greenacre and Co., of Durban, the following defamatory words of and concerning the plaintiff, contained in a letter, dated January 18, 1905, written by the defendant to the plaintiff, the said publication having been made by defendant showing the said Upward a copy of the letter at Durban: "I am surprised that you should address me again after our interview at East London, when I expressed so emphatically to you my contempt at your mean and dishonourable conduct. . . . In the interview we had at East London, in the presence of Mrs. Corder, who, fortunately, has a perfect recollection of what occurred, you and I mutually agreed that whatever was said by either party was to be preserved in strict confidence. You gave your sacred word of honour to so regard our conversation, before a word of business was spoken between us. Now, from the statement in your letter to me, you have, for your own purposes, broken your pledged word of honour, and repeated part, at least, no doubt, of what was said to your employer, Mr. Howe," meaning thereby that plaintiff was a person of dishonest and dishonourable character. In or about March, 1904, at Port Elizabeth, the defendant falsely and maliciously published to one Mr. Parker, of Messrs. Collins Bros., the following defamatory words concerning the plaintiff: "There is something queer about him, otherwise his wife and family would come out to him," meaning thereby that the plaintiff was a person of undesirable character, and unfit to associate with respectable people. By reason of the premises, the plaintiff had suffered in his fair name and reputation, and had been much injured in his business. Therefore he claimed a full and unconditional retraction and apology by the defendant in writing, in respect of the injurious statements, the sum of £1,000 damages, and costs of suit.

The defendant's plea admitted that he wrote the letter to plaintiff, and showed it to Upward. The letter was written in reply to a letter written by plaintiff to defendant, which was also shown to Upward. The matters set out, even if they constituted a claim in law, were well known to plaintiff for more than a year prior to action being brought, and that any action was barred by prescription. The defendant denied the rest of the allegations.

In his replication, the plaintiff admitted that he did not institute his action until a year had expired, but owing to the absence of defendant, was unable to do so, but on his return, plaintiff demanded a retraction of the libellous statements and compensation in damages, whereupon defendant tendered to plaintiff £50, but as it was not accompanied by any retraction, he did not accept it.

The defendant's rejoinder denied the tendering of £50 as compensation.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Mr. Inchbold), appeared for plaintiff, and Mr. B. Upington (with him Mr. M. Bisset) appeared for defendant.

William Francis Wood, a merchant residing in Cape Town, stated he was well acquainted with the parties in this suit. Mr. Upton came to South Africa in 1903. The defendant prior to that asked witness if he could recommend him a man for his business, and as a result of the conversation which ensued, witness at the instance of defendant wrote to Upton, offering him an agreement for five years at £360 a year. Witness had known Upton for some years before that. He bore an excellent reputation, and witness knew him about 20 years. Upton accepted the offer, and subsequently came out. Prior to Upton's arrival, witness saw Corder, who, owing to the depression which was then setting in, seemed sorry he had engaged Upton. When plaintiff arrived, witness took him to defendant, who did not seem inclined to keep to his agreement, and offered Upton other terms. This offer was £10 a month salary and commission. A heated discussion ensued, and Upton declined to accept the new offer. Witness received from Upton a letter dated February 15, 1906, which he showed at Upton's instructions to Corder. Nothing came of that letter. Witness during a conversation with Corder got the impression that he was willing to pay £50 damages, and he told Upton. No definite order, however, was made.

In cross-examination by Mr. Upington, witness said that as Upton was a very old friend of his, he wrote to him regarding the trouble he had had with Corder. Upton was willing to go into Corder's employment in October, 1905; that was after the libels complained of were uttered. Witness knew nothing about Upton's refusal of a partnership with Corder's son. Witness was at home in July and August of 1905. Witness did not show the letter of October 12 to Corder. Before the arrangement for Upton's coming to South Africa was made, witness received a letter from Upton stating he had made up his mind to come to South Africa.

William Henry Upton, the plaintiff, stated he came to South Africa in 1903, and prior to that lived in the Isle of Wight. He had been in the ironmongery trade about 34 years, and now represented many leading English firms. Witness on arrival went straight to Mr. Wood, and they went together to see Mr. Corder. Mr. Corder said to witness, "You know, an agreement between South Africa and England is not binding." Corder told witness that instead of paying him the salary he offered he wished to make him take an interest in the business, and would pay him a salary and commission. This witness refused to take, and went into partnership with a Mr. Scott as a commission agent. At Durban witness met a Mr. Upward. Witness subsequently approached Mr. Corder, because he did not feel at home travelling in "soits" when he was a "harde" man, and on November 20 received a communication from Corder in which he stated that witness, when he first landed in South Africa, weighed the offer made by Snow against his. That was not correct, because on board witness thought Snow was a missionary, and as a matter of fact he was not far wrong, because they held services at various towns visited.

Mr. Burton: It was not inconsistent with his being a soft goods man when you found he was a missionary.

Witness, continuing, said that in January, 1904, the negotiations with Corder fell to the ground, and witness took service with Mr. Howe. In November, 1904, at Corder's request, he had an interview with him at East London, when Corder invited him to leave Howe and join his son on equal shares—a partnership. Witness rejected the proposal, whereupon Corder called him a liar and a cad. A number of letters were put in, which Mr. Burton said brought one to the kernel of the case.

[Buchanan, J.: You have been a long time getting at it.]

Witness went on to say that when he left Howe after six months' notice he went to England in January, 1906, and returned in June, when active steps were taken to prosecute the present action. When served with notice of the intended action for slander, the defendant wrote denying it, and added that Mr. Upton had injured him. The statements made by defendant had affected him both in business and in social life. Being musical, he had entry to the houses of some of the wealthiest merchants in the country, but since those libels had been circulated, the invitations had dropped off. In business circles he had been informed that the chiefs of many businesses avoided him, and his connection consequently fell off. He gathered from conversations he had had with Wood that the defendant would be willing to pay him £50.

Mr. Upington at this stage applied for permission to amend the plea so as to allow of prescription.

Mr. Burton contended that that plea should have been made when the case came on.

Mr. Upington quoted in support of his case that of Harris v. Jordan, reported in 13 Cape Times Law Reports, pages 216-219.

Buchanan, J., said that application was now made to amend the plea by inserting a plea of prescription. This was an action for slander, and it was alleged that the slander took place in March, 1904, and the plea was a denial of the utterance of the slander. He thought the defendant might have pleaded it in the first instance, and, looking at the words used, he thought Mr. Upington was too late in making his application.

In cross-examination, the plaintiff stated that he was bound to secrecy when interviewed by Corder at East London, but he was released from that. Witness was prepared to enter into partnership with Corder. He did not favour it very much, but his whole future rested on that. At the interview that took place, Mr. Corder told witness he thought of retiring, and asked witness to enter into partnership with his son. Witness saw through Corder's idea, which was that they would have some of Howe's agencies. Witness admitted having told Corder that Howe was very genial.

Witness went straight to see Howe, because he feared Corder would go and see Howe, as he threatened to do so. On December, 1904, witness tried to "collar" Corder's agencies, and felt himself justified in doing so, because of the libels.

Mr. Parker, of Port Elizabeth, stated that plaintiff used to visit him, but that in view of what he had heard from Corder he dropped his society.

In reply to Mr. Upington, witness said he had heard something else about Upton. He had had a little unpleasantness with Corder, and had not any business dealings with him since. Witness told Upton what Corder had said. Witness had not refused to purchase goods from Upton on account of what he had heard.

In re-examination, witness said the trouble with Corder had reference to the hire of a sample room.

George Henry Upward, until recently manager of Messrs. Harvey, Greenacre, and Co., Durban, stated he knew both parties to this suit. He first met plaintiff in 1903. Before that he was informed by Corder that he was getting somebody out from England. Corder called on witness, and asked him if he had seen Upton of late, and asked witness to endeavour to get Upton to write privately to him with regard to opening up of negotiations.

[Buchanan, J.: When was that?]

Witness: About 1905.

Mr. Burton: I think you are wrong, because the correspondence is dated 1903.

Witness: It is 1903, my lord.

Counsel, continuing, read a series of letters, which passed between witness, Corder and Upton regarding the position.

[Buchanan, J.: I really do not see that those letters are at all relevant to the case.]

Mr. Burton: It has been said that the witness favoured Upton, but I want to show that he acted on behalf of Corder.

Witness, continuing, said that Corder forwarded him a copy of the letter he had sent to Upton, and witness remarked that he thought it libellous. Witness and Corder often discussed Upton. The letter created a suspicion in witness's mind with regard to Upton for a time, until witness had heard from people residing in Upton's native place.

In cross-examination, witness said he had resigned his position with Harvey, Greenacre and Co. If a man broke his word of honour to witness he would lose faith in him.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

William James Corder, the defendant, stated his firm represented several Home firms. He admitted the evidence with regard to the arrangements for engaging plaintiff. He next saw Upton in Durban. It was Upward who suggested to witness that he should engage Upton. At East London, witness again met him, and before witness discussed anything with him, he bound him by his honour not to repeat a word of the discussion, and after some shuffling, he agreed to do so. Witness then suggested to him that he should go half shares in the business with his son. Other things cropped up, and plaintiff said that he could bring other agencies into his business, amongst which was that of Howe's. As a conclusion to the interview, he asked to be allowed to sleep over the offer, and next day came back and said he was not satisfied with half shares. After some further discussion, witness told him they could not agree, and reminded him of his promise to keep everything private. They had a third interview, and he told witness that he was going to take his agencies. Witness told him he was glad he knew the kind of man he was, and that he had not left the destinies of his son with him. Upward had acted as intermediary between plaintiff and defendant, and when witness was in Durban in June, he showed Upward the letter he had received from Upton, and also his reply. Witness denied that he had ever imputed anything against Upton's character.

The defendant, cross-examined by Mr. Burton, denied that the plaintiff came out to South Africa under engagement to him. Witness withdrew the offer definitely by letter before the plaintiff came out. At the interview at which Mr. Wood was present, and upon plaintiff's arrival, witness did not back out of the engagement. Mr. Wood was very deaf, and could not state with certainty what took place at the interview. Witness withdrew the offer before the plaintiff left England, and gave him to understand that the details could be arranged upon his arrival in South Africa. Mr. Upward suggested that the plaintiff should apply to witness, and correspondence took place, of which nothing came. The man was not necessarily a good man of business, although he was a pushing traveller. Up to March, 1904, there was no reason why he should not have a perfectly friendly feeling towards the plaintiff, although in the previous January he wrote to Upward, and in the course of the letter he said he did not know why a man so brilliantly endowed as the plaintiff should ever have come out here at all, leaving his wife to earn her own living in England. He thought there was nothing unfriendly in that remark. He denied that he said to Mr. Parker there must be something queer about the plaintiff, otherwise his wife and daughters would come out to South Africa. Witness and Mr. Parker had a little quarrel, and had not met for some time.

What position do you take up with regard to the words in the letter of the 18th January: "I am surprised you should address me again after my interview at East London, when I expressed so emphatically my contempt at your mean and dishonourable conduct?" Do you say you were entitled to use these words?—I used them.

I want to know your position because there is no plea to that effect. Do you say you were entitled to use these words?—I did use them.

We know you used them. Do you say he acted in a mean and dishonourable manner?—Certainly, he threatened he would do so.

What do you refer to?—That he would break his word of honour to me, and use the information, and apply for my agencies.

That he had broken his word in divulging what he heard?—Yes.

And threatened to apply for your agencies?—Yes.

You put him under a pledge of secrecy that he would not say a word to anyone?—Certainly, I did.

You yourself were not under such a pledge about this conversation?—Yes, the interview was understood to be in strict confidence on both sides.

When you parted with him from East

London, did he accept your offer?—No, I broke off all negotiations.

You kept cool at the interview?—I did, but the plaintiff got excited.

You buttoned up your coat?—Yes, I was prepared to receive cavalry.

He was going to apply for your agencies whether you liked it or not?—Yes.

He threatened he would get them with or without your leave?—Yes.

He wrote to you on the 10th January that he intended making application to the several firms you represent for their agencies, seeing that you told him you were about to retire. He said he had made up his mind to do so, and he asked you whether you would recommend him for those things?—I did not say I was going to retire. I made it quite clear I was not going to retire unless I arranged a suitable way of carrying on business with my son in partnership.

You wrote to him that there were other facts concerning him which threw a fresh light altogether on his character, concerning his private and domestic life past, present, and contemplated future, and if he was aware of what you knew he would dance with vexation. Why did you put that in the letter?—I wrote back to him what I knew. I put the history of our relations in a truthful way. I was angry at the time. My prime object in writing was to show that there was no truth in the rumour the plaintiff was trying to circulate that I was going to retire.

If you had had time to reflect you might not have put that into the letter?—I might not.

What made you after you had time for reflection show this statement to Mr. Upward?—Mr. Upward is a friend of both parties, and he was anxious in my interests that this man should work for me as a traveller. When I went to Durban in January, 1905, I called in to see him, and he told me that the plaintiff had been to him, and told him all about the interview at East London, and gave the usual wrong impressions about it. I said it was absolutely incorrect. I said I had recently received a letter from Upton in which he threatened to apply for my agencies. I then read a copy of my letter to Upward quietly in order to right myself in his estimation.

You read the whole of the letter?—I cannot remember if I read every word of it.

You said you would not leave a lady in the room with him?—I would not leave my wife with him. He had just said he would give me a — good hiding, and I certainly would not leave my wife with him.

Mrs. Corder, wife of the defendant, corroborated her husband as to what took place at the interviews. Her husband reminded the plaintiff of his promise to secrecy. Upon the third interview the plaintiff said he had decided to take over her husband's agencies. When the plaintiff said so he was white and trembling. Her husband told him that his behaviour was mean and contemptible, and called the plaintiff a "cad." When the plaintiff said he would like to have a talk to her on the matter, her husband said, "I would not leave a lady in the room with you." The plaintiff then said, "You had better be careful what you say. I shall give you a — good hiding."

Frank Corder, son of the defendant, denied that his father made the remark to Mr. Parker, as to something being queer about the defendant, otherwise his wife and family would come out to him.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts:

Buchanan, J.: This is an action brought by plaintiff for the vindication of his character. He alleges that about January, 1905, the defendant wrote the following false and defamatory words in a certain letter to the plaintiff, viz.: "I am surprised that you should address me again after our interview at East London, when I expressed so emphatically to you my contempt at your mean and dishonourable conduct." The declaration makes a further quotation from this letter to show what this dishonest and dishonourable conduct was alleged to consist of. In effect it is that there had been a private conversation between the parties, and at this private conversation the plaintiff gave his "sacred word of honour" to consider the conversation which was about to take place between them as strictly private, that he broke his word, in that he afterwards informed his principal, Howe, of what had taken place, or, at any rate, of part of the conversation. Had the matter remained there, there probably would not have been this action, but shortly after the letter was written the defendant was in Natal and saw one Upward, who is a friend of both parties, and a conversation about plaintiff took place between them. Some remark was made about plaintiff's conduct, whereupon the defendant took out a letter dated 10th January which he had received from the plaintiff, to which the letter complained of was a reply, and he read these two letters to Upward. This constituted a publication of the defamation which the plaintiff now complains of. The letter of the 10th January is, in the plea, averred to be the justification for the defendant writing the letter of the 18th January. It is admitted on both sides that the conversation between the parties took place under the pledge of secrecy, and that notwithstanding this pledge it had been revealed by plaintiff to Howe. The defendant said he was justifying his conduct to Upward by giving both letter and justification to him to read. Upward had, therefore, the poison and the antidote, if there were poison at all, supplied at the same time. There is, however, no plea of justification or truth put upon record. But in an action of this nature where the plaintiff comes into Court complaining of injury done to his character one has to look at the actual facts as disclosed in evidence, to see in how far he has been damaged. Both parties are agreed that this conversation took place at East London, and the plaintiff was pledged to secrecy. There is no doubt that the plaintiff broke this pledge, and there is also no doubt that his so doing called forth the indignant remonstrances which the defendant has written. It is remarkable after the plaintiff's admission that all negotiations between the parties were broken off without any agreement being come to, that immediately afterwards we find plaintiff cabling to his principal, Howe, in England, "Agency has been already promised me by Corder." If this is the kind of interpretation which the plaintiff put on what took place, I am not surprised at his misunderstanding other conversations which took place afterwards. Apart from any question of justification I should not have felt myself justified in giving any damages, or, if any, only the most moderate amount possible under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence. But the plea has set up the defence of prescription. In my opinion this plea is a perfectly good defence. The letter upon which this part of the action is founded was shown to Upward in January, 1905, and in February this fact was brought to the plaintiff's notice. The defendant had been carrying on business in Cape Town for fourteen years, and had a place of business here, and could have been served with legal process there at any time. In March he temporarily left the Colony, returning again in November, but no action was instituted until the 16th of October of the following year. Absence from the country might interrupt prescription where it is an obstacle to the prosecution of the action, but in this case the temporary absence of the defendant was not any such obstacle. An analogy we can draw from our Cape Act of prescription, although it does not refer to the matter of defamation, as to the principles which govern prescription in regard to absence from the Colony is against the plaintiff. The 11th section of Act 6 of 1861 enacts, where persons are absent from the Colony, as follows: "If at the time when any such cause of action as is in this Act mentioned first accrued the person against whom such cause of action had arisen shall be absent from the Colony, then the person to whom such cause of action so accrued shall have the same time after the return of such other person to this colony within which to bring his action as he would have had had the person been in the Colony when the cause of action first accrued."

Where a person is only temporarily absent from the Colony and has a place of business here where he can be served, and when he returns within the year, there is nothing in this section nor in any law as far as I am aware that makes the temporary absence for a portion of the year a ground for interrupting prescription from running. I think, therefore, that both upon the facts and upon the law of the case the plaintiff has no right to recover upon the first claim in the declaration.

The ground of plaintiff's second claim is, that in or about March, 1904, and at Port Elizabeth, the defendant said to a Mr. Parker, referring to the plaintiff: "There is something queer about him, otherwise his wife and family would come out to him," and the innuendo is that plaintiff was a person of undesirable character and unfit to associate with respectable people. It has been argued that these words do not in themselves form any slander and that the innuendo which has been drawn from them is not justified. The words are not necessarily actionable, and no special damage arising from their use has been proved. At any rate, Parker, to whom these words were alleged to have been used, when under cross-examination, said they were used in a casual manner during his conversation with defendant. No special damages have arisen from the uttering of these words, as they did not prevent Parker from giving plaintiff an order for goods. Parker goes on to say that he had only referred to this remark alleged to have been made by defendant in a conversation he had with plaintiff in November, 1904: Parker and plaintiff were then discussing the defendant. The remark, if uttered at all, was, as Parker says, made in a very casual way, apropos of nothing at all, and it did not stop business transactions between Parker and plaintiff. This casual observation was not repeated by Parker until nine months afterwards. It is quite possible under these circumstances, if anything was said in March, there may have been some misunderstanding or want of recollection of the words uttered so long before. The defendant denies having used the words, and if I was forced to say as a juror whether or not these words had been uttered I would give a verdict of non-proven. Then there is the fact that although these words were brought to the plaintiff's notice in November, 1904, in the letter which was written by the plaintiff in February, 1905, there is not the slightest reference made to them. All he complains of in that letter is the showing to Upward of the letters which passed between the parties. In that letter he says:

"If I learn of one more instance on your part prompt legal proceedings will be taken, no matter in what country or manner, verbally or otherwise, the offence is committed."

Now, although the plaintiff writes in this way, in the very next month of March he alleges he heard of something further said by plaintiff, and yet he took no prompt legal action. Although the claim for damages founded on what was alleged to have been said in March has been withdrawn, it has transpired during the hearing that the remark was alleged to have been made to one Chappell at Johannesburg, and that it contained a reflection on the plaintiff's moral character, which would be prima facie actionable. Yet it is a very curious thing that in all the correspondence that took place after consultations with attorneys and in several letters of demand, nowhere is this alleged defamation set forth by the plaintiff. The letters were all in general terms, and all through the answer to all these letters was a repudiation of the uttering of any slander. It was only after the matter had got into the hands of the present attorneys for the plaintiff, in August, 1906, that the details of the alleged slanders were given. Thereupon the defendant at once wrote to Chappell, and got a reply from him which the defendant at once communicated to the attorneys for the plaintiff. He wrote to them: "I immediately wrote to Chappell, and requested him to inform me whether it was true," and he adds, "Chappell expresses his surprise at Mr. Upton's statement, and absolutely repudiates that I made any such statement in reference to Mr. Upton to him, and he advises me to treat the matter with contempt." Mr. Chappell goes on to say that "Upton had been in to see me many times about the time you refer to, and had all sorts of accusations against you, was constantly interviewing lawyers, and constantly showing me the letters which he was writing. He always seemed to be agitating for some legal proceedings against you." Now, where a disavowal like this is made, and the attorneys are told before action that there is no evidence for the statement, that the person to whom it is alleged to have been made had been communicated with and had expressed his surprise and absolutely repudiated any such statement, it is really strange that the matter got into the declaration at all. It was this third charge which made the case look black against the defendant, but at the outset it was withdrawn, and is not any longer before the Court.

I have now examined all the charges contained in the declaration. As the case now stands the only thing for which I am asked to give £1,000 damages is the statement that the defendant had said to Parker that "there is something queer about Upton, otherwise his wife and family would have come out to him." If there had been a plea to that effect, this cause of action would also have been prescribed, but only a denial has been pleaded. Now, an action for defamation is usually instituted by a person who feels aggrieved by an attack on his character and who is desirous of having his reputation cleared, and a delay of years before suing is a matter to be taken into consideration. Here we have a plaintiff fully cognisant of all these alleged slanders, who months after the charges had come to his notice writes to his friend, Mr. Wood, to whom he originally wrote before coming out to the Colony, asking him to meet the defendant on his return from England, and to try to get him to take the plaintiff as a partner, or otherwise to get plaintiff to hand over his business to him. This is the man who, when he has failed to accomplish a partnership, now comes into Court to vindicate his character. He tried to use these alleged slanders as a lever to secure a business advantage. He seems to have thought that the defendant was in mortal terror of an action, and would be anxious to appease the plaintiff. He therefore took steps, not to vindicate his character, but to get defendant to enter into a partnership. Mr. Wood, in a reply which he sent to the plaintiff, must have given him some good advice, for he then sent a formal letter to Wood, which he wanted submitted to the defendant on his arrival—the letter written from East London on the 15th November. The private letter written to Mr. Wood is altogether inconsistent with the formal letter which Wood was asked to submit to the defendant. In the private letter he urged Wood to use his best efforts to get the defendant to communicate with him. In the formal letter he indicates that he is quite open, if the defendant prefers to deal with him direct, "to negotiate calmly and dispassionately and with a real desire to bring about an understanding mutually agreeable." Taking everything into consideration, I can only say that I must give judgment for the defendant, with costs.

{ June 26th

This was an application brought by Richard W. F. Steyn, of Cape Town, against Myer Stephany, trading as Stephany and Co., of Upington, Division of Gordonia, for judgment under Rule 319, in default of plea, for an order of ejectment and damages.

From the declaration, it appeared that plaintiff is the owner of certain landed property, and that he claimed an order of ejectment and £500 damages against defendant for illegally occupying the property.

Dr. Greer was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear. A man, who gave the name of Greenberg, appeared, and said that he owned the business, and that Stephany was his manager. Greenberg said that he only appeared to ask the Court to be lenient in the matter of the damages claimed.

Hopley, J., said that defendant had been barred, and, strictly speaking, he was not entitled to be heard in the matter.

Abm. C. Kruger, articled clerk in the office of Dempers and Van Ryneveld, gave evidence as to having served notice of bar and set down on defendant's attorneys.

Richard W. F. Steyn, the plaintiff, said that prior to March, 1905, he was the owner of certain erf No. 139, at Upington, and in or about that month he bought from his sister, Mrs. Jay, erf No. 138. At that time the latter property was let to Varim Abraham and Co., under lease. Witness recognised Abraham and Co. as his tenants. The rent was £2 2s. a month. In June, 1905, a new arrangement was entered into, whereby the tenants gave up one half, and he reduced their rent to £1 1s. a month. About August, 1905, he was led to believe that negotiations were taking place between Abraham and Co. and Stephany for the transfer of Abraham's business. He pointed out to the parties that they had no right to sublet the property without his consent, and he said that he would not be prepared to consent unless the rent were raised to £5 a month. The war in German South-West Africa was then going on, and rents in Upington were very high. Hardly a room was to be got. The parties offered him £4 a month, but this he declined to accept. They then said that the business would be carried on under Abrahams and Co. Shortly afterwards, he found that goods had been consigned to Stephany, and the latter individual explained that they had been so consigned because they thought the transfer would go through. Witness found that a licence was taken out in the joint names of Stephany and Abraham. The rents were paid as they became due by Stephany, and receipts were given to Abraham and Co. In February last, witness was informed by Abraham that the defendant had received £190 from him in payment of any difference in the rent after he had given up his tenancy. Witness claimed delivery of the erf and buildings thereon, and £150 damages. The buildings consisted of an iron structure on a brick and stone foundation.

Varim Abraham, a Moslem, said he had carried on business as Varim Abraham and Co. He had had a shop at Upington. He had had an assistant to look after the shop. Subsequently he sold the shop and effects to D. Greenberg. He went with Mr. Stephany to Upington, and they took stock. He had not known before then that he was prohibited from sub-letting under the lease. Witness agreed with Greenberg to let him have the goodwill, shop, effects, and stock for £2,570, and he also entered into a further agreement whereby he undertook to make an allowance to Greenberg equal to any difference in the rent, the rent not to exceed £5 a month. Witness deducted from the money owing by Greenberg the sum of £190, representing the amount of the difference for four years' rent. Witness had not given the defendant any authority to use his name after the conclusion of the sale.

Defendant said he desired to ask the witness whether he paid £200 for the goodwill, and £203 for the building.

Witness said that that was so.

Defendant said that the sum of £190 did not represent merely the rent, but also included bad debts. It was in the nature of a compromise.

Witness said that the figure represented the difference in the rent simply.

Plaintiff (recalled) said that there had been somewhat of a reaction in property values in Upington since the close of the war. Witness was not anxious to have the iron building which had been put on the erf; in fact, he would not mind if it were removed from the ground, because it was an eyesore to the place. He did not desire to continue the defendant as tenant even at an increased rental.

Dr. Greer submitted that plaintiff was entitled to damages up to the time when the ground was vacated.

Hopley, J.: In this case the defendant is in default, and has been barred, and is not entitled any longer to appear, and he has not requested that the default should be purged, and that he may be allowed to plead, and the result is that this is practically an undefended action. The evidence shows that the firm of Varim Abraham and Co. had hired certain premises, the property of the plaintiff, originally from his sister, and afterwards by arrangement with himself, when by purchase from his sister he became the owner. The terms of that lease seem to be that up to 1910 Varim Abraham had the right to remain upon the premises subdivided, as the plaintiff afterwards subdivided them, at £1 ls. per month, but there was a clause prohibiting any sub-letting without the written consent of the landlord, the plaintiff in this case. Afterwards Stephany and, also, apparently Greenberg, who has appeared here to-day, negotiated with Varim Abraham and Co., and Stephany went up there to take stock, and take over the business. Plaintiff heard of this, and he called the attention of the contracting parties to the fact that there was no right to sub-let, and they thereupon left him under the impression that they were still going to carry on the business as Varim Abraham and Co. Thereupon apparently he got legal advice that as long as they did so the conditions of the lease would be fulfilled, and he could not insist upon any higher rental or claim that there was any breach of the agreement of the lease. It appears that about that period, owing to the existence of the war in Damara-land, Upington, which, I suppose, was a sort of distributing centre for stores, etc., was in a state of inflated prosperity just for the time being, so that rents were considerably higher than plaintiff was getting for this property. He, therefore, when it was proposed to transfer the business from Abraham and Co. to Stephany, refused his consent to an assignment of the lease, unless the new firm would agree to pay £5 a month instead of £1 ls. per month. He was put off and apparently left with the idea that Abraham and Co. were not actually going out of the business. That now appears to be not correct. When one looks at the agreement between Varim Abraham and Co. and defendant, it shows that there was an actual transfer of the whole of the business, building, etc., for £2,000 odd, and that there was an assignment of this lease, and, more than that, there was a supplementary agreement by which Abraham and Co. agreed to pay defendant the difference between £1 ls. a month and whatever rental Stephany and Co. might have to pay to the landlord, provided that such rental did not exceed £5 a month. There was actually a compromise come to, and Abraham allowed £190 to go off the purchase price on that account. This goes very near being a fraud on the landlord. Defendant sought by underhand means to rob the landlord of his right of getting the increased rental in the circumstances for his premises, which the circumstances of the time seemed to warrant him in demanding. Apparently also Abraham's name was made use of in taking out the licence, in conjunction with Stephany, to lend colour to the idea that Abraham was still in the business, and to afford a defence in case the landlord moved for ejectment against the new firm or a higher rental. By these means it was sought to blind him, and they did for a long time apparently blind his eyes, for he went on receiving £1 ls. a month, which was paid as if by Abraham and Co. Clearly, the landlord was being defrauded to a certain extent, and he is now right in coming to show that there has been a breach of the agreement of lease, and he can claim an ejectment of these parties who played this trick upon him, and also he is clearly entitled, to my mind, to some damages, because, undoubtedly, the property was worth more than £1 ls. at the time. He did actually ask £5 a month, and the defendants, by their conduct, deprived him of the extra money which he thus would have got. I cannot say I can take into consideration any further amounts he might have had by the more favourable terms of a lease that he might have entered into with others. What I do feel, is that the measure of damages must be gauged by the fact that the defendants had for a certain time lived unwarrantably upon his property in a manner in which they were not entitled to do, on the proper interpretation of the contracts existing between the various parties interested in this piece of land. They seem to have been there some 20, or by the time they leave, some 22 months, and there is a difference of something like £4 a month between what they were paying and what they ought to have paid. It is not too much to put it at that, and for the time that the defendants had been there, they must pay damages. The order of the Court is that they do vacate the premises forthwith, and give up possession thereof to the plaintiff: they must remove the buildings that they put thereon, as the landlord says he does not want them, provided that they leave the land in the same state as it would have been if there had been no buildings erected there at all, and they must pay £88 as damages and costs of suit.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. Toms applied, under the 117th section of the Ordinance, for the rehabilitation of Minnie Annenberg. Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte RUBENSTEIN { 1907.
June 26th.

Mr. Palmer moved for an order authorising transfer to petitioner of certain lots of property in the Oakdale Estate, Durban-road, which had been bought by one Alfred Alex. Crichton from Messrs. Bradford Pooke and Co. Crichton had borrowed £25 from petitioner and had failed to repay the money, and petitioner claimed the lots under an acknowledgment of debt and agreement to cede. Crichton had never obtained transfer of the land.

[Hopley, J.: I may give you leave to sue Crichton by edictal citation. There will be two transfers to pay for.]

Mr. Palmer said that Crichton had disappeared, and his address was unknown. He cited in re Cradock Building Society (13 S.C., 99).

The matter was ordered to stand over until to-morrow, applicant to file an affidavit as to Crichton's whereabouts.

Postea (June 27th).

Counsel put in an affidavit, from which it appeared that Crichton's whereabouts were unknown.

Leave to sue by edict granted, citation to be returnable on the 14th August, one publication in the "Government Gazette" and "Cape Times," citation, interdict, and notice of trial to be published together.

HOFFMAN V. TOWN COUNCIL OF CAPE TOWN.

Mr. Lewis moved to make absolute a certain rule nisi admitting petitioner to sue the Cape Town Council in forma pauperis for £200 damages alleged to have been sustained owing to the acts of the respondents' servants.

Mr. McGregor, K.C., appeared for the respondents to show cause against the rule being made absolute.

The matter, it appeared, arose out of a fire in Harrington-street on premises of which petitioner occupied one room. He said that owing to the acts of the Council's servants a wall was knocked down and goods that he had stored in a room were buried in the debris so as to be rendered worthless. The applicant first sent in a claim to the Council for £400. This had been investigated by one of the committees, who had come to the conclusion that petitioner had no good ground of action against the Council.

Affidavits were now put in from which it appeared that the Council took up the position that the Fire Brigade had acted within the scope of their authority under Act 26, 1893, that the wall in question was knocked down because it was a danger to life and property, and that it was by no means clear that petitioner was a pauper.

Mr. McGregor examined applicant as to his means and addressed the Court briefly in argument.

Hopley, J.: I think in this case the rule should be made absolute and that leave should be given to sue in forma pauperis. It is impossible upon the state of the affidavits at the present moment to say that there is not a good case by the plaintiff against the defendants, and it is not shown clearly and cannot be shown without investigating the facts, that the law protects the servants of the Council in the acts which they have done. As far as one can see, considerable damage was caused to the plaintiff, as far as one can gauge he is at present a pauper, and if there is any damage to him for which the Council is responsible, he should have an opportunity of prosecuting his claim. After what has fallen from him in court, it is quite possible that the Council, on going more deeply into the matter, may find it advantageous to avoid a prolonged suit, especially as, if they were not unsuccessful, they would not get much out of a man in the position of the plaintiff. They will see whether they can settle the matter without going further. The rule must be made absolute, Mr. Lewis to be counsel and Mr. Frank to be attorney to the petitioner, such costs as there are to be costs in the cause.

CALEDONIA LANDING, SHIP-PING, AND SALVAGE CO. } 1907.
LTD., AND ANOTHER V. } June 27th.
EAST LONDON HARBOUR BOARD.

Amendment of judgment—Interest.

Some months after a judgment in favour of the plaintiff, which was silent as to interest, had been pronounced, the plaintiff applied for an amendment of the judgment by allowing interest to run thereon.

Held, that the Court had no power to amend its own decree.

This was an application for an amendment of the order granted by the Court on the 6th September last, in an action brought by applicants against respondents for damages arising out of a freshet in the Buffalo River.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for applicants; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., was for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin said that the actions came before their lordships, and damages were given against defendants in the one case for £3,000, and in the other for £250. The order of the Court was, however, silent as to interest, and now the applicants asked that interest should be added to the judgment. Counsel read an affidavit by Mr. G. B. van Zyl, plaintiffs' attorney, who said that on the 27th November defendants applied for leave to appeal from the judgment of the Court to the Privy Council, and at that time the present applicants applied for an amendment of the order granting interest a tempore morae on the amount of the respective judgments. The respondents, by their counsel, opposed the granting of interest a tempore morae, but did not oppose interest being granted from the date of the judgments. Deponent annexed correspondence which had passed between the attorneys on the respective sides, in which the respondents took up the position that they were not prepared to consent to interest beyond the 27th November, 1906.

Mr. Buchanan read a replying affidavit by Mr. Walker, respondents' attorney, in which he said the Board did not admit that such an understanding as was alleged by applicants existed or exists.

Mr. Benjamin said that the first-named applicants had not proceeded to execution, and that the whole amount of £3,000 was still outstanding. The Court granted leave to appeal in the larger case, but refused leave in the case in which the Colonial Fisheries Co. were plaintiffs. Counsel went on to say that no substantive application was made for interest on the 27th November last. Interest was, however, claimed in the action, both on the summons and the declaration. He submitted that if application had been made when judgment was given, the Court would have allowed interest. The respondents had lulled the applicants into a sense of security, and they now took up this position in consequence of the decision of the Court that interest did not run from the time of judgment in the case of Buffalo Supply and Cold Storage Co. v. Federal Supply and Cold Storage (17 C.T.R., 345). Counsel submitted that applicants were entitled to interest on both the £3,000 and £250.

Without calling upon Mr. Buchanan, De Villiers, C.J.: The rule is that when once the Court has pronounced formal judgment it has no power to alter its own decree. It is unnecessary to consider whether, and to what extent the Court may amend, or even set aside a judgment obtained by fraudulent means, for no question of fraud arises in the present case. It often happens that before the Registrar draws the formal order the Court has to be consulted as to its precise terms, so as to ensure that the intention of the Court shall be carried out. But when once that order has been drawn and delivered to the parties the only mode of amendment is by way of appeal to a higher Court. It is said that Mr. Schreiner had admitted that interest would run from the date of judgment, but there is nothing to show that that admission was incorporated in the judgment or was accepted by the Court as a sufficient ground for amending the judgment. On the contrary, it appears from the Registrar's note that the Court refused to amend the order, and my own note says nothing about any amendment at all. Well, there was a practical refusal on the part of the Court to make any amendment at all, and it is impossible, therefore, now, for the Court to make an amendment so as to give interest from the date of the judgment. It is no doubt a case of considerable hardship as regards one of the applicants, because the Privy Council, in giving the leave to appeal, has stayed execution, so, as to that, plaintiff is now debarred from obtaining execution, and he may have to wait a couple of years before obtaining his money if he should succeed on the appeal. As to the other claim, I do not see that there is very great hardship, because it is still open to issue execution and see that the money is paid before the appeal is heard. However much the Court sympathises with the applicants, it is impossible to grant the application. The application will be refused, with costs.

Hopley, J.: I concur. My note, which I sent for, is silent on the point of interest.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte PETRUSVILLE { 1907.
PROSPECTING SYNDI- { June 27th.
CATE LTD.

Mr. Wallach moved for a winding-up order in the case of this syndicate, and the appointment of an official liquidator. The petitioners stated that the company was registered under the Companies Act, 1892, on the 20th September, 1906, with a share capital of £14,560, divided into 728 £20 shares. The company was formed to carry on exploration and prospecting business, and acquire prospecting rights over several farms in the Colony. Since the registration of the company prospecting works had been going on, but the shareholders had decided to abandon all their rights over the farms and cease prospecting. At a general meeting of the shareholders held on the 14th June, 1907, the shareholders resolved that the company be liquidated, and authorised the directors to apply to the Court for a winding-up order. Petitioners prayed that the company be placed under liquidation and that Jacobus Higgs be appointed liquidator, with powers under section 149 of the Companies Act, 1892, and power to appoint a solicitor and agent.

Rule nisi granted placing the company under provisional liquidation and appointing Jacobus Higgs as provisional liquidator, with powers under section 149 of the Companies Act, and power to engage the services of an attorney-at-law if necessary, rule returnable on the 1st August, publication in the "Cape Times," "S.A. News," and "Oms Land."

VAN HEERDEN V. JOOSTE.

This was an application brought by Hannah Elizabeth van Heerden (born Jooste), of Krugersdorp, Transvaal, upon notice to Frans D. Jooste (defendant in the action), for leave to take the evidence of certain witnesses on commission, viz., Willem S. van Heerden and Petrus Johannes van Heerden.

It appeared that applicant claimed a certain inheritance in an estate of which respondent is executor. The respondent had filed a claim in reconvention, and it was principally in reference to this that the action would be fought. The applicant desired a commission to sit at Krugersdorp to take the evidence of the two witnesses, both on the ground of expense and convenience. Respondent urged that it was of the utmost importance that the witnesses should give their evidence in the Court, as the question of their credibility was raised, and that if a commission were granted he would be greatly prejudiced in his defence.

Mr. McGregor, K.C., was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: Looking at the present application, I cannot see that there is any pressing necessity for the granting of this application. It is not alleged by the applicant that she will lose, or that she cannot get the evidence of these witnesses, or that it is highly improbable that they will be able to come here to give their evidence. All that she says is that the expense of getting them to Cape Town is enormous. One is her husband, and one would suppose that it would be a good thing that he should travel down here to protect her and assist her, as far as need be, in the prosecution of this case. Whether they are married in community or not, they are both closely interested in the result of this action, and as he is assisting her, it is right a priori that he should come here with her and see her through the various stages of this action, which she says she is compelled to bring to establish her rights. The other witness, as I understand, is a near relation of her husband, who is at present at the same place, Krugersdorp, where they are, and they are ready and willing to give their evidence there. The expense is one of the items put in the forefront of the reasons for granting this commission, but as far as I can see, the expenses of travelling and the keep of these witnesses would not exceed £32. When one looks upon it from that point of view, the expense of bringing these witnesses down to Cape Town cannot possibly be very much more, if indeed it is not less than the expense of a commission at Krugersdorp, where a commissioner would have to be paid, and special instructions have to be prepared for the local agents and attorneys, who would examine and cross-examine these people, so that I do not think there will be anything left of the £30 odd or thereabouts by the time the expenses have been met. There are other grounds alleged. These are said to be poor men who cannot very well leave their places, and so on, but, after all, arrangements can always be made when they know they have to come down here, and the chances are that for a week or two nothing serious will happen if any irrigation which takes place is left to the servants or overseers. I do not think any of the reasons are substantial, and I do not think there is any good reason for granting this commission. The application will, therefore, be refused, but I do not feel inclined at this stage to make applicant pay the costs of this unsuccessful application. I think that if the defendant is liable, he has opposed the hearing of evidence which is necessary, he has made costs larger by this application, and it seems to me that the party who is in the wrong eventually should pay the costs, and the costs will be ordered to abide the result.

BETTINGTON V. SCOTT AND OTHERS.	{	1907.
	{	June 27th.
	{	" 28th.
	{	July 1st.
	{	" 15th.

This was an action brought by Alfred George Bennington, of Kraaifontein, district of the Paarl, against Wm. Louis Scott and John Henry Widdicombe Scott, both of Cape Town, for an order against defendants to provide a road to certain property or, failing compliance, £1,000 damages.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that he was a farmer residing at Kraaifontein, and that the first defendant was a broker and commission agent, and the second defendant a tailor and estate agent, both carrying on business in Cape Town. Defendants, at the time of the sale, set out in the declaration, were joint registered proprietors of certain land near Kraaifontein, and known as the Bonny Brae Estate. On the 21st December, 1903, plaintiff bought from defendants 20 acres of ground for £300. No conditions of sale were signed. Plaintiff had taken transfer by deed of transfer dated June 18, 1904. Prior to and at the time of the said sale the defendants guaranteed that a certain road, 80 feet in width, from the said land to the Kraaifontein Railway Station was a public road, and would be available for use by the plaintiff as proprietor of the land sold to him, and he was induced thereby to purchase and take transfer of the said land. The said road, which crossed the property of one Jacob Berman, was not at any time material to the suit a public road, and the said representation was fraudulently and falsely made, and defendants were unable and refused to render the same available for the use of the plaintiff as the said proprietor. By reason of the premises plaintiff said that he had sustained damages in the sum of £1,000. He prayed for an order compelling defendants forthwith to render available to him as registered proprietor of the land in question for use the said road guaranteed to be a public road, or failing compliance payment of £1,000 damages.

Defendants, in their plea, said that the plaintiff acted as agent for the Prudential Properties, Ltd. They said that the Bonny Brae Estate formed part of the farm Joostenberg Vlakto, situate near Kraaifontein Station. They said further that the sale was concluded under the conditions set forth in a letter sent by them to defendant under date the 18th December, 1903. They denied the allegations in paragraph 4, and specially denied that they in any way guaranteed that a certain road 80 feet in width, alleged to lead from the said land to Kraaifontein Railway Station, was a public road, and would be available for use by the plaintiff. Defendants said that they sold, and plaintiff bought, the aforesaid lots under the conditions set forth in the letter of the 18th December, and per the deed of transfer, with diagram annexed, bearing date the 4th December, 1903, whereby the farm Joostenberg Vlakto was transferred by one Theunissen to the defendants with the rights of access as shown in the said transfer and diagram, to which defendants craved leave to refer at the trial. As to paragraph 5, they denied that they represented the said road to be a public road. They denied that the plaintiff had suffered damages for which they were liable, and said that he had access to the station as per the aforesaid deed of transfer and diagram annexed, in accordance with the conditions on which the sale took place. In the letter annexed John Scott said that W. L. Scott and himself had decided to accept plaintiff's offer of the previous evening for two lots of ground, approximately 20 acres, with the option to purchase another 20 acres at same price and terms. "This sale and option," they added, "are subject to existing deeds of transfer and diagrams, and your selection is to be made from the plan of sale prepared by Mr. Home, Government land surveyor. He is willing to reduce his survey fees to 20 guineas should you purchase four lots adjoining in one block."

Plaintiff, in his replication, denied the allegations of defendants in several respects, and specially denied that he received the letter of the 18th December, 1903.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for plaintiff; Dr. Greer was for respondent.

Kenneth N. Teubes, Government land surveyor, produced certain diagrams and gave evidence to show that plaintiff had no right of access to the station by the alleged 80 feet road, unless he obtained leave of Mr. Berman.

Alfred G. Bennington (the plaintiff) spoke to the negotiations that he had with John Scott in consequence of an advertisement that he saw in the paper. On December 19, 1903, he said he went out to see the land. He was accompanied by the defendants and three other persons, two of whom were now in England, and the other had since died. When they got to Kraaifontein, defendants asked him which way he would go to the land. He said he would go by the road. Witness was taken down the 80 feet road. He mentioned to the defendants about the roads to the land, and they assured him that the roads would be all right. He said, "Will you guarantee that these roads are all correct?" The defendant said they would.

[Hopley, J.: Which roads?]

Witness: The roads subdivided on the estate of Scotts. They told me that they were going to get a survey of the ground. I said, "Will these roads have a connection with the station?" They replied that they would. They told me that the whole of the other place belonging to Mr. Berman had been laid out as a township and that we had that road and all the roads there. He selected certain lots because they were the nearest to the station. No sale was concluded that day. He went to see the defendants again on the following Monday, and paid an instalment of the purchase price. He spoke to John Scott in W. L. Scott's office. He was referred then to Mr. Home, whom they went to see about the land. Mr. Home said, "You need not trouble your head at all about these roads." Witness made inquiries about the roads being connected with the station. He obtained transfer of the land in June, 1904, but a week later he discovered that the roads were not correct, and he had not, therefore, taken possession of the deed of transfer.

Dr. Greer cross-examined the witness at some length, largely with a view of showing that there was access from the land to the station.

Vincent Alex. van der Byl, John Win. Ward, Harris Horwitz, Louis Sanden, and J. P. van Breda, also gave evidence. It was stated that the defendants had mentioned the 80 feet road to others who had purchased land from them.

Fredk. D. Bailey, who purchased some of the ground near that of the plaintiff; in January, 1905, from Mr. Scott, stated that he wrote to the defendant when he knew the ground was for sale, and the defendant sent him a blue tracing. The plan show a road, which defendant gave witness to understand was the right of way from the station to the ground.

Cross-examined by Dr. Greer: Witness never went out to the ground with either of the defendants. The station-master, who showed him over the ground, told him that he had nothing to do with it as there was a dispute about the roads. Mr. Scott's explanation was so satisfactory that witness decided to purchase. Witness had never made any complaint to Scott that he could not get access to this property.

John Irvine, broker, of Cape Town, stated that in the evidence he was acting as agent for Mr. Berman, who really resided in Johannesburg. Both the Scotts waited on witness, and asked him to arrange an interview with Mr. Berman, with a view to opening up the 80 foot road and give Scott access to the ground. Nothing came of the interview, because Scotts would not accept the conditions laid down by Berman.

Cross-examined by Dr. Greer: Berman was the owner of the Kraaifontein Estate. It was not Berman who asked for this interview. It was not Theunissen's road that was in discussion.

The witness Berman stated he had always taken up the position that Theunissen's road was not a public road. He wrote to the C.G.R. claiming a road from his ground to the station at Kraaifontein. Whatever position he took up, in regard to the railway, he was claiming Theunissen's rights. He had an amended title to see if anyone would challenge him in regard to roads or any other question. He obtained the consent of Scott and the Railway Department for this title.

Mr. Jones closed his case.

John Henry Widdicombe Scott, merchant tailor, stated that he, in conjunction with Mr. W. L. Scott, acquired a portion of the farm in December, 1903. There was a portion of the estate laid out as the Bonnybrae Estate. Witness first saw the plaintiff the week before Christmas in 1903. Witness showed the plaintiff the estate on the 17th and 19th December. On the first occasion the plaintiff and witness went to Kraaifontein. The plaintiff's view was not only to buy the lots as his intention was to make an exchange of some small property which he had at Rosebank with some of plaintiff's property at Woodstock. The plaintiff was anxious to go out to have his selection before any other purchases were made, as a number of people were going out on Saturday. The plaintiff decided to take twenty acres, and wanted an option on a further twenty acres. Upon their return on the 19th December, there was little time to catch the train, and it was necessary to take a short cut. Witness never guaranteed to the plaintiff or anyone else the use of the 80-foot road. Soon after the sale the rough plan was signed by the plaintiff, and not some three months afterwards. Had anything been signed three or four months afterwards, it would have been the new plan. In the transfers which witness gave plaintiff, the same conditions were inserted in regard to the means of access as in his own transfers. Witness had never taken up the position that he had any right to the 80-foot road. He had plans prepared showing the Theunissen-road open, and the 80-foot road closed. What he did guarantee was access to the station. He never guaranteed the right to use the road to Horwitz and Sanden. There was nothing in the conditions of sale about the roads. None of the other purchasers ever claimed the 80-foot road.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: When he sold he told the purchasers that there was a road from the station, he never guaranteed a road, he simply sold the property as he bought it, without any guarantee as to roads. He had sent a plan to Bailey, but it was not the plan produced by Horwitz. Carnitz had a plan dated October 9, 1905, with no road marked.

[Hopley, J.: Is that a note made at the time which you are consulting on your cuff?]

No, I made it this morning.

Andries Galloway, managing clerk to Mr. D. Tennant, solicitor, stated he had not heard of an 80 ft. road until he came to court. The plans which he had seen did not show any 80 ft. road. He advised the defendants to sell the property according to the existing plans and diagrams. Plaintiff did not take transfer because he wanted the defendants to pay half of the survey expenses.

J. J. Bisset, Government land surveyor, of Cape Town, said he had prepared a sub-divisional plan of Scottville. He knew nothing of an 80 ft. road.

Karl A. Carnitz, who had bought land from the defendants on two occasions, said Scott told him that there was a road from the property to the station. The road referred to by Scott was the Theunissen-road. He went to Kraaifontein with Hamilton, Scott's agent. He produced a plan showing the position of the property.

[Hopley, J.: I suppose you are quite satisfied with your roads?]-No, I am not. The road was twice blocked up by Berman, but Bettington was good enough to cut the wire.

Proceeding, witness said he crossed the veld to the station. Before he could be quite sure of his road, he might have to fight two lawsuits against the Prudential properties and Berman. He had seen the 80 ft. road, but he had never received any guarantee from Scott that he could use it. His plan was dated October, 1905, and that was after the dispute had arisen. The road was not shown on his plan.

Jacobus M. Theunissen stated he had known the estate at Kraaifontein since 1875. He knew the Theunissen-road. It had always been an open road, and the public used it without interference.

Hendrik N. H. Theunissen, former owner of the estate, said that the road never went direct to Kraaifontein Station; it went some hundred yards higher up. People had always used this road coming from Durbanville. Witness knew the plaintiff, who had not complained to him about the means of access to his property. According to an agreement with the syndicate, witness put up a fence in 1904.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: The fence was not erected until 1904. In a letter from Mr. John Scott, witness was asked to support him in a civil action which he brought against Berman, and witness replied: "If you want to fight Mr. Berman, you do it. If I want to fight him, I will be man enough to do it."

Alfred Charles George Oakes, an official of the Surveyor-General's Office, produced the original grant to one H. A. Theunissen and Mr. King, dated 1883.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

Mr. Jones was heard in argument on the facts.

Dr. Greer, in the course of his argument for the defendants, said that the plaintiff, having chosen to bring his action in the form in which he did, when the ordinary action was open to him, found himself faced with an onus of a very distinct kind. He must prove his case clearly to the satisfaction of the Court. Here were written documents by which he was bound, legal documents of the most solemn character. Unless he could clearly prove his right it would be impossible for him to obtain the assistance of the Court. Another reason was because there was an allegation of fraud against the defendant. There was a clear allegation of fraud made in the declaration. Both on account of the form in which the action was brought, because it was really brought on a breach of contract, and also because there was an allegation of fraud it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove his case in the most clear manner. Counsel cited the cases of Hoffmeyr v. De Waal (1 Juta, 424), Richards v. Nash (1 Juta, 312), Ohtlasons v. Whitehead (9 Juta, 84), Ahlhom v. Tickers (9 Juta, 484), Jansen v. Fincham (9 Juta, 239).

Mr. Jones, in reply, attributed the failure to call W. L. Scott as a witness to the fact that his evidence would not coincide with that of John Scott.

[Hopley, J.: Haven't you founded your case on fraud?]

Mr. Jones: After all, the Court is very adverse if there is another way of finding for the plaintiff, to find fraud unless the evidence is absolutely such as shows a man to be a scoundrel.

[Hopley, J.: Supposing in good faith at the time, these lots had been surveyed into the township, and they would be available.]

Then we still have a cause of action. It would be misrepresentation.

[Hopley, J.: Do the pleadings include bona-fide misrepresentation?]

It would be the lesser, and it would be a ground for action.

[Hopley, J.: Can you read your declaration at the time of the sale that the defendant bona-fide misrepresented?]

Mr. Jones: I submit it is quite competent for the Court to find that there was not necessarily fraud on the part of Scott, but there was misrepresentation, by which misrepresentation plaintiff was deceived, and if that misrepresentation had not been made he would not have bought the property. Proceeding, counsel referred to the case of Lindenberg v. Stellenbosch Municipality (3 Searle, 345). In that case the purchaser was sued to carry out the purchase. He raised the defence of misrepresentation made to him as to the proximity of the ground to the railway station, and the Court, although finding as a matter of fact he was not deceived by the advertisement, said had he been deceived he would have had a good ground of action.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (July 15th).

Hopley, J.: In 1903 the defendants bought from Theunissen a portion of the farm Joostenberg Vlake, near Kraaifontein railway station, and received transfer thereof early in December of that year. Part of the land so purchased they proceeded to subdivide into lots of about ten acres, and this part they named "The Bonny Brac Estate," which they advertised for sale. In answer to their advertisement the plaintiff made inquiries, whereupon he was taken to the property in question by the defendants, with the result that during the month of December he concluded a purchase of two of the ten-acre lots for the sum of £300. The plaintiff deposes that he was taken to the land for the first time on December 19, and that he concluded the sale on December 21, paying on that date the first instalment of the purchase price. He asserts in his declaration that prior to and at the time of the said sale the defendants represented and guaranteed to the plaintiff that a certain road 80 feet in width leading from the said land to the Kraaifontein railway station was a public road, and would be available for use by the plaintiff as registered proprietor of the land in question, and that the plaintiff was induced thereby to purchase the land. He further sets forth in the declaration that he has taken transfer of the said land and that the said road, which is upon the property of one Berman, is not a public road or available to him as a means of access to the station, and that he has thereby sustained damages in the sum of £1,000. He says that the defendants well knew that the said road was not a public one and that their representation to that effect was fraudulently and falsely made, and that they are unable, and refuse, to render the said road available to him as owner of the lots purchased by him. The defendants plead that the sale was concluded in terms set forth in a letter dated December 18, 1903, which they attach to the plea, and they deny that they made any guarantee or representation about the road as alleged. The points to be determined are whether, when the contract of sale was entered into, there was a collateral agreement, or pactum adjectum, whereby the defendants guaranteed that the said road would be available for the plaintiff as a means of access from the land purchased by him to Kraaifontein station, whether, in case the Court should find that they did so guarantee and contract as alleged, the defendants have failed to carry out the terms of the said contract, and in such case, what damages have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of their breach of contract. It appears that in July, 1901, Mr. Van der Byl, acting for himself, Van der Horst, and Berman, purchased from Theunissen a certain portion of the farm adjoining or adjacent to the Kraaifontein railway station, and obtained an option for one year to purchase a further portion to the north of the main line of railway, which option they subsequently exercised. This ground they, by agreement between themselves, divided, the parts to the south of the main line of railway and between the main line and the Malmesbury branch line falling respectively to Van der Byl and Van der Horst, and the part to the north of the main line going to Berman. Upon their ground these three proceeded to lay out the Kraaifontein township, with public squares, parks, show-grounds, and recreation grounds, and with streets regularly laid out throughout its whole area. One of the streets running from south to north was an eighty-foot road, leading to the main line of railway at the station, both from the southern and northern portions of the town. This road was well defined, and on the northern side of the town, which was the property of Berman; it was laid out as a road, with trees on either side. As between the three gentlemen mentioned and Theunissen it was a part of the agreement that if the part north of the railway were purchased by them, it should be fenced off from the rest of the farm, and this was done after the exercise by them of their option, the exact date of such fencing being, however, somewhat obscure, and in dispute in the present case. In 1903 the defendants purchased from Theunissen the portion of the farm to the north of Berman's property, and took transfer thereof in December of that year. They seem to have advertised it for sale in lots, and on 14th December plaintiff wrote to them for particulars. They replied by letter of 15th December, 1903, making various representations, amongst which was one that the property advertised was well within a mile from the station. A few days thereafter the plaintiff was taken out to view the ground, and at this stage the first serious conflict of evidence is met with. The plaintiff swears that he first went upon the ground on Saturday, 19th December, and that he was accompanied by both defendants and by three other people, intending purchasers, of whom one is now deceased, and the other two are in England. He swears that the defendants took him to their property by the eighty-foot road, and that in answer to his inquiries they told him that that was the road by which he would have access to the station from any lots that he might purchase. He says that they further stated that all the streets running through Berman's portion of the town towards the north would be available, as they were providing a road which would serve all their lots along their southern boundary, but that they particularly mentioned the eighty-foot road as leading directly to the station. The plaintiff states that across that road there was then a fence, which had been cut, and that the defendants told him that this fence was of no consequence, and that he would have access by that road. The defendant, John Scott, admits that on 19th December the party, as above stated, went out, and that on that occasion they went to the Bonny Brae lots by the eighty-foot road, but he denies that there was then any fence across the road, or that he made any representations that the road would be available to purchasers of the lots. It is noteworthy that, though the defendant W. L. Scott was available as a witness, he was not called for the defence to corroborate John Scott as to what took place on that occasion, or to contradict the plaintiff's evidence that such representations were in fact made. A justification for this abstention is claimed on the ground that the sale to the plaintiff had been actually concluded on 18th December, when the letter attached to the plea is said to have been written closing the bargain, or at all events on the morning of 19th December, before the party set forth, at which time John Scott swears that he personally handed the letter to the plaintiff, and it becomes material to examine minutely the terms of the letter, and the circumstances in which it came to be written and delivered, since the plaintiff swears that he received no such letter, and that he learnt for the first time that such a letter was alleged to have been written when he saw it as portion of the plea in this case. The letter is in the following terms:

11, Church-street, Cape Town,
December 18, 1903.

Dear Sir.—Mr. W. L. Scott and myself have decided to accept your offer made to me last night, viz., one hundred pounds cash, and balance—£200—on bond, 6 per cent., for two lots of ground (approximately) twenty acres, and grant you option one year to purchase another 20 acres at same price and terms. This sale and option is subject to existing deeds of transfer and diagram, and your selection is to be from plan of sale framed by Mr. Home, G.L.S. He is willing to reduce his survey fees to twenty guineas should you purchase four lots adjoining in one block.—Yours faithfully,

JOHN SCOTT, JUN.

A. G. Bettington, Bettington-square, Woodstock.

To make such a letter possible as a genuine document it is necessary to believe that the plaintiff had been upon the ground between 15th December and 19th December, and John Scott swears that he and the plaintiff made an expedition to the place on Thursday, 17th December, going out by an early train starting shortly after 8 a.m., and returning by a train leaving Kraaifontein after 4 p.m., those being the only trains which could be utilised for such a purpose on an ordinary week day during the year 1903. If this be true, plaintiff and John Scott spent nearly seven hours upon the ground, and Scott swears that on that occasion, he pointed out a road (called in this case "the Theunissen-road"), and the main road to Stellenbosch; and he states that he guaranteed access to the plots for sale by the "Thoumiesen-road"—though the record of the evidence does not make it clear whether he means that he made the guarantee on the 17th or 19th of December. The expedition of the 17th December is entirely denied by plaintiff, and it is necessary to find whether it ever took place. Now it is clear from the evidence in the case that in December, 1903, the defendant, John Scott, was a very busy man, and it appears at the outset extremely improbable that he would devote the whole of a working week day to an expedition of this sort, when the natural course would have been to fix the Saturday, only two days later, for the trip—a day upon which there was a train leaving Cape Town between 1 and 2 p.m., which would enable the parties to spend an hour on the place and get back at about 5.30 to town. I should think, too, that, if such a long time was spent away from his business on that Thursday, and if so many hours were passed at or near Kraaifontein, some kind of corroborative evidence would have been available to establish the fact. He and Bettington must surely have had luncheon together somewhere, and somebody might have been called who had caught sight of them in their long investigation of the merits of the Bonny Brae plots. But the expedition rests on the bare word of John Scott, emphatically contradicted by the plaintiff. If, however, no living witness could be found is there any corroboration or contradiction of such a visit to be gathered from any document? If John Scott's evidence be true, and if the letter attached to his plea be a genuine one written on 18th December, he must have consulted both his partner, W. L. Scott, and Mr. Home, the land surveyor, during the course of Friday, 18th December, since the letter begins by a statement that he and W. L. Scott had decided to accept the offer made by plaintiff on the Thursday evening; and it ends by saying that Mr. Home was willing to reduce his survey fees to twenty guineas in case plaintiff should purchase four lots in one block. Neither Mr. W. L. Scott nor Mr. Home was, however, called to speak upon this point, and one is forced to conclude that neither of them could give any corroboration to John Scott's evidence thereon. It is true that there is a press copy of the alleged letter in John Scott's letter-book; but it does not occupy a folio to itself. It is pressed upon a page containing a part of another letter of 18th December, and, though it is possible that an office boy of frugal mind might at some inconvenience and with a nice adjustment have utilised the space left available, it is obvious that such a document might have been written to fit the space, to serve a purpose in pending or threatened litigation, at any time before its production, as an annexure to the plea in this case. Besides the place in which the letter appears, there is the circumstance that while all the letters of that date pressed in the book are distinct, and had been written in dark ink, the ink in this case is so pale that it is only barely legible. This is explained by the writer by the assertion that being anxious to close the matter with Bettington, he wrote that particular letter at his home in the suburbs, a course he sometimes took when pressed for time. It is not, however, a course one would expect to be taken in the circumstances. John Scott knew that he would see plaintiff next day. He knew that they were to go to Kraaifontein together, and rather than inconvenience himself by writing a somewhat unnecessary letter at home, he would have waited until he met plaintiff to close the bargain verbally. Furthermore, this alleged letter is, in point of time and position, the first in the book to Bettington, yet in indexing the book the clerk has taken no notice of such a letter, but has placed the first letter to Bettington 401 pages further on. An attempt was made at a later date by John Scott himself to remedy or rectify this, and, on a line at the top of the page usually left blank by the clerk, he in his own writing wrote the plaintiff's name and the number of the folio on which this letter appears, followed by something which has been erased, and by other numbers which had been indexed opposite the word "Bettington" lower down in the same page of the index. While it would be going too far to say that the state of the index is conclusive on the point under consideration, it is certainly in a most unsatisfactory condition, and goes far to shake belief in the genuineness of the disputed letter. But there are other circumstances by which we may test this letter, which is now so strongly relied upon as showing that plaintiff bought according to existing diagrams and transfers, and therefore without any guarantee, as claimed by him. Plaintiff having picked his two lots adjoining each other upon a plan, went with Mr. Home, the land surveyor, in March, 1904, to the ground, and in May of that year he went to reside there, and shortly thereafter Berman informed him that he had no right to use the 80 foot or any other road over his property to the station. On July 10 plaintiff wrote complaining that defendant had not carried out certain guarantees. "First," he wrote, "you guaranteed to give us roads to the ground from the station. I am since informed by the owner of the ground that you have no right-of-way through these whatever" and he concludes: "Trusting you will make good all defects before there is any more trouble, as at present the ground is quite valueless without any road to it."

... " The letter also dealt with a guarantee as to surveyor's charges and the swampy nature of the ground. This letter remained unanswered until 24th August, when a letter was written by John Scott acknowledging receipt of plaintiff's letter, and dealing with the matter of the surveyor's charges, but not referring in any way to the matter of the roads. "As regards the survey fees," the letter states, "same is most reasonable. What was mentioned was that, by purchasing two allotments adjoining together, you would save the expense of two transfers—whereas in your case you would take one transfer." This is inconsistent with the terms of the disputed document, and if the letter of December 18, 1903, had been in existence in August, 1904, surely the answer about the survey fees would have been different, viz., that the surveyor had agreed to a reduction of fees only in case plaintiff should purchase four adjoining blocks. But, moreover, surely the defendant, on the matter of the roads, would have referred the plaintiff to the letter of December 18, as recording the conditions attached to the sale of the land to him. The plaintiff, however, did not rest satisfied with the reply he had received, but on August 31 again wrote reiterating that John Scott had guaranteed that the expenses would not come to more than £20, and the letter goes on: "You will remember being asked about that, also the guarantee you gave as about the roads, in your letter you never mentioned what you intended to do about the road to the station—that is the most particular item I want put straight. I am in occupation of this ground at present, but it is useless to remain here without a road here from the station. . . ." Now, if the disputed letter had been in existence at that date, it seems well-nigh incredible that John Scott would not have referred plaintiff to its terms; but he never did so, and the plaintiff swears that he first became aware of the allegation that such a letter existed when he saw it attached to the plea which was filed in April of this year. There is one other test which can be applied. If the letter of December 18 means anything, it means that a contract of sale was thereby concluded. It is the acceptance of an offer, and closes a bargain; and, in fact, John Scott says that he wrote the letter at home on the night of December 18, for the purpose of closing the matter. According to John Scott, then, the sale took place on December 18, or possibly at latest, on the morning of the 19th, when, as he says, he delivered this letter to the plaintiff. It was so marked a transaction that he cannot have forgotten it, nor could he have forgotten that he had a copy of the letter in his book giving the exact date. As the plaintiff, though strongly pressed in cross-examination, persisted in stating that he had never been on the ground until the 19th December, and that the sale was concluded on December 21, it occurred to me that possibly the declarations of purchase and sale might throw some light upon the matter. By consent of parties certified copies of these have been admitted as evidence since the closing of the arguments of counsel, and I find from them that plaintiff made his declaration as purchaser on February 11, 1903?—1904, and that he therein stated the date as December 21, 1903. The defendants made their declaration on May 6, 1904, and they likewise declared as sellers that the sale took place on December 21, 1903. If December 21, 1903, was really the date of the sale, then the force and effect of the annexure to the plea dated December 18, 1903, falls to the ground; and though the date in the declarations may have been a mistake in the earlier, followed in the later without strict inquiry, still they do contradict the defendants and do corroborate the plaintiff. At the close of the evidence, and of the arguments of counsel, my feeling was that no reliance could be placed upon the alleged letter of December 18, 1903, and a close and anxious examination of the record and documents only strengthens and confirms this conclusion. I am of opinion that no such letter was written in December, 1903, and that it was manufactured at a much later date, when, negotiations with Berman having failed, and intervention of the Paarl Divisional Council to have the Theunissen-road vindicated as a public road, having been sought in vain, it became plain that there would be litigation with the plaintiff. The letter attempted to deal with two points of grievance asserted by the plaintiff, viz., the road and the survey fees. As to the former it was designed to nullify any oral evidence which the plaintiff might bring as to guarantees and collateral agreements made on December 19, by proving that the sale had been concluded before such representations and agreements were made; while as to the latter it would also put the plaintiff out of Court since the only concession as to the fees was upon a condition which he had never fulfilled. I do not believe that the plaintiff was upon the ground on December 17, with John Scott, and I believe that, when he and others went with the two defendants on December 19, it was the first occasion on which he had been there. I believe that on that occasion the two Messrs. Scott did say that the eighty-foot road was the means of access to the station: and I think that they, if they said so, were possibly under the impression that it was so: but in such case the assertion was made by them so negligently and rashly and without proper inquiry, that their conduct in so making such representations for the purpose of enticing purchasers was of a nature so closely approximating to intentional fraud that it must be looked upon as fraud. It is possible, I say, that both L. W. Scott and John Scott at that date thought that as Berman had advertised his town lots for sale, and as his diagrams issued to the public in the form of advertisements showed his roads apparently up to his boundary, and showed the large 80 foot road, which he had laid out, and bordered with trees, the consequence was that he had dedicated the road to the public, and that it would be open as an approach to his erven from the north. There is indeed some evidence that for some time John Scott held this view. It is distinctly sworn that both he and Mr. L. W. Scott did tell plaintiff and others both on December 19, and on later occasions, that the 80-foot road was available as their means of access to the Bonny Brae lots—a diagram made by one Hamilton, an engineer, who acted for them, and seems to have been a hanger-on of John Scott's—clearly showing the 80-foot road as leading to the lots, was produced, and it was sworn that it was exhibited to people who purchased some of the lots. I believe that it was, and the probability is, therefore, strengthened that similar verbal representations were made. Mr. L. W. Scott was not called to deny that such representations were made, and I am convinced that they were, in fact, made, and that they were made with the intention and with the effect of inducing purchasers to invest their money in these plots. Before I leave this portion of the case, I may say that some discredit of plaintiff's evidence was attempted by bringing about a contradiction between him and Mr. Theunissen on the point whether or no the 80-foot road had a wire fence across it on December 19, 1903. I can only say that I am not satisfied that Mr. Theunissen is right in his recollection. He is in all probability conscientious in what he says; but the fact that he had to consult a coloured servant before he was certain, shows, to my mind, that he had no clear recollection in himself of the exact date. The matter is a small one, and whether plaintiff or Mr. Theunissen is correct, I do not think it decisive of the main question in any way. At a later date, when John Scott, who seems to have then acquired his partner's interest in the Bonny Brae lots, discovered that Berman was able to close the road, he turned his attention to the Theunissen-road, which is more or less parallel to the 80-foot road, and a few hundred yards to the west of it, only to find that Berman also disputes the right of way over it. It is obviously impossible for me to decide in this action the rights of the public, and of the owners of the Bonny Brae lots to the use of the Theunissen-road. John Scott says that he guaranteed only this road to his purchasers, and that Berman has no right to stop their user of it. Berman asserts that they have no rights over it; and there the matter must for the present rest. No road has been provided by the defendants for the plaintiff as promised between his lots and the station, and it is obvious that the plaintiff has by such breach of contract suffered considerable damage both in inconvenience and in deterioration of the value of his ground. In assessing the amount of damages, however, it is clear that according as matters may be adjusted hereafter, they may be increased or considerably reduced. The best and most direct route to the station for the plaintiff is undoubtedly the eighty-foot road, which is also the only road which can truthfully be described as being well under a mile long, and should the defendants either by a successful suit or by arrangement with Berman succeed in making that road available, as promised by them to the plaintiff, then I am of opinion that the damages would not reach a very large figure, and, in fact, no damages are claimed in the declaration if that road be opened. If, however, that road cannot in any case be obtained, then there remains the Theunissen-road, which John Scott admits that he guaranteed to the plaintiff. If that should be made available by the defendants, then a route to the station, not so short or direct as the road promised, but still reasonably convenient, would be provided, and the damages might be assessed at a moderate sum. But if no road be provided over Berman's property, then the owners of the Bonny Brae lots may be forced to use a most inconvenient and circuitous route to reach the railway, and their land will be very largely reduced in value. I think that as matters now stand they have no assured right of way of a convenient nature such as they were promised, and as far as the matter affects the present case, I am of opinion that if matters remain in their present condition the plaintiff's damages should be assessed at £250. I think, however, that an opportunity should be provided to the defendants to reduce this amount by providing the plaintiff with access to the station. The order of the Court, therefore, will be that the defendants do pay to the plaintiff as and for damages the sum of £250, but that if the defendants do within six months provide a right-of-way for him by the Theunissen-road the amount of damages be reduced to £100, or if they within the same period provide a right-of-way for him by the eighty-foot road, as guaranteed, there be no order as to damages. The defendants must pay the costs of the action. It is further ordered that the amount of £250 be paid in forthwith to the Registrar of the Court, to be dealt with hereafter in accordance with the terms of the judgment.

Prior to giving judgment, Mr. Justice Hopley observed that, as he had stated the other day, a lady called upon him and represented that further evidence had been discovered. He, however, declined to hear any further evidence. He told her that he would not listen to her. He did not know on what side she was acting, but apparently counsel had not been instructed to make any representations to the Court.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

1907.
June 28th.
" 29th.
July 1st.
" 2nd.

This was an action in which Henry George Lawlor, an hotel-keeper, of N'Cova, St. Mark's, Tembuland, sued his wife, Irena Maude Lawlor, for a decree of divorce, and John Archibald George Hearn, a scab inspector, of Cofimvaba, for £5,000 damages, by reason of the defendant's adultery.

The declaration set out that the parties were married in September, 1901, and there were two minor daughters of the marriage, aged four and two years respectively. The defendants, it was alleged, committed adultery in plaintiff's hotel during December, 1906, and January, 1907, and more particularly on the 24th and 26th January. Plaintiff sustained £3,000 damages by reason of the second defendant's wrongful action, and he claimed against the first defendant a decree of divorce, forfeiture of the benefits under the community, custody of the minor children, and costs jointly and severally against the defendants.

The pleas of the defendants were practically alike, in regard to the claim in convention. Both denied the adultery, and the second defendant denied the damages. For a claim in reconvention the first defendant stated that since January, 1906, serious differences had occurred between plaintiff and defendant at various times in December, 1906, and January, 1907, the plaintiff assaulted and cruelly ill-treated her and endangered her life. In December, 1906, the plaintiff threatened to sjambok her, locked her up, and severely assaulted her. She claimed a decree of judicial separation, division of the property, and custody of the children, and maintenance for each child at the rate of £1 a month, with costs.

The plea to the claim in reconvention denied any serious difference until January this year, which were caused through the conduct of the defendants. He admitted that on the 25th January he struck his wife on the face with his open hand as she ran away. He fired his gun under extreme provocation, upon discovering the defendants in a room, the door of which was locked and the blinds drawn down.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. Roux) was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Burton, K.C., (with him Mr. Sutton), was for the defendants.

Harry George Lawlor, plaintiff, stated he was married in September, 1901, and he had lived at N'Cova with his wife since then. Prior to December, 1906, witness and his wife got on very well. About August, 1906, Mr. Hearn came to his hotel as a boarder. Up to December, 1906, there were no questions about supporting and maintaining the defendant, who had as much to say in the working of the store as witness had. There was no truth in the allegation that there had been disturbances between the parties owing to witness's relationship with a Miss Rae, who was a great friend of his wife. On the 1st January there was a dance at the hotel. The dance commenced at 8 o'clock, and an hour later witness went into the ball-room, and he noticed Hearn and his wife were dancing together. They had several dances. Sometime later he was standing at the ball-room door, when a gentleman said he heard a remark passed, and he spoke to his wife about it. The remark which Mr. Palin passed was: "Is she engaged to Hearn?" and witness put this to his wife.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Didn't Palin know your wife?]

No. After that Mr. Palin asked me to give him an introduction to my wife. When he spoke to her she said: "The best thing you can do is to get a separation." She got into a rage, and was very white. The next morning he gave Hearn a month's notice to leave the hotel. At that time he had no idea there was anything wrong between the defendants. On the 18th January there was another dance at Tsomo, and Hearn and his wife were present. Before the dance witness spoke to his wife, and asked her on the year dance, and his wife asked Hearn. She made no reply, but did dance with Hearn several times. It was a leap year dance, and his wife asked Hearn for a dance. After the dance there was more unpleasantness, and again there was talk of a separation. Witness's brother and his wife asked the first defendant to remain at their house until Hearn went away, but this she refused to do. On the morning of the 25th January he got up early, and two of the boys at the hotel told him about something which took place the previous couple of days. In consequence of what took place he asked the boys to take a note of what was going on. At breakfast he stated that he was going to Luyt's, but returned unexpectedly three-quarters of an hour later, and came through the garden. One of the boys made a statement to him, and he jumped off his horse and walked down by the other side of the house. He went in by the hall door, and one of the boys stood at the entrance. When he got to the dining-room he tried to open it, on account of what one of the boys told him, but the door was locked. He struggled with it, and finally forced the lock open. When he entered Mrs. Lawlor passed him. He said, "What is the meaning of this?" but she made no reply. She was very white.

Did you strike her?—No, she passed me without speaking, and went out by the hall door. I entered the sitting-room, where I found Hearn sitting down on a chair. The green blind was drawn.

What took place then?—I went up to him, and asked him what was the meaning of this. He said, "Please, Mr. Lawlor, I will go at once. Allow me to go at once." I had a stick in my hand, and I struck him over the head. I was in a passion, and chased him round the room; but Hearn got out of the room. The last I saw of him was when he entered the dining-room door. After that I searched for my gun.

What were you going to do?—I was going to shoot them.

Were you in a rage?—Yes.

Did you find your gun?—I could not find it in its usual place in the bedroom, but I found it under the couch in the dining-room.

Did you take cartridges?—Yes. I went round the place to see if I could see Hearn, but I could not find him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What shot did you have?—Number 6, my lord.

Mr. Close: Was there considerable excitement at the time?—Yes, all the servants rushed about.

When you got to the gate, did you fire?—Yes, I fired in the direction in which Mrs. Lawlor had gone.

How far off was she?—Between 200 and 300 yards.

You had not gone out of the gate?—No, I fired over the hedge.

Did you smack her that morning also?—Yes.

When was that?—After her return.

What became of the gun?—The boys took it away.

Did the boys go after Mrs. Lawlor?—Yes.

What took place?—I met her half-way, as the boys were bringing her to the house. I accused her of what she had done, and she asked me to forgive her.

What did you accuse her of?—Committing adultery with Hearn.

Was she crying?—Yes.

Was there any mention again of forgiveness?—Yes, she asked me to allow her to live in the hotel as a servant and to forgive her.

You decided then to take her back to her mother?—Yes, I said I will take you back to your mother and explain the whole thing to your mother.

What did the furniture in the sitting-room consist of?—A couch, chairs, and a table.

You smashed the stick, I think, on Hearn?—Yes, it was only a small walking-stick.

You took her to her mother and told her what you had heard and seen?—Yes.

A couple of days afterwards Hearn wrote to you?—Yes, on the same day.

He asked for his things?—Yes.

You wrote a letter—a very enraged letter, Mr. Lawlor, in which you threatened to shoot him if you came across him?—Yes.

Proceeding, the plaintiff said he subsequently took up an attitude that he would forgive her if she made a confession. She said she would not confess to her brother, but she would confess to her sister, and she did confess to witness and her sister Emily. At a meeting at Mrs. Snodgrass's (defendant's mother) place, his wife made a confession of her guilt. Her mother would not allow her to return unless witness put a public apology in the paper.

At one stage were you willing to do something of that kind?—Yes.

What was the attitude you took up at first?—I promised my brother and my wife's sister that I would take my wife back provided she made this confession. I agreed to put an apology in the paper, in order to whitewash my wife in the eyes of the people, so that she could live with me again.

You wrote a letter to your wife on the 30th January?—Yes.

And another on the 30th May?—Yes.

Proceeding, the plaintiff said his property was worth between £7,000 and £8,000.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: You were married to your wife by special licence?—Yes.

I think you and she eloped?—Yes.

She was a young girl then, about 19?—I do not quite remember her age.

As a matter of fact there was considerable unpleasantness about this Miss Rae between you and your wife?—Not that I know of.

She did not complain about your attentions to Miss Rae?—No.

You never heard of a single objection on her part?—No.

I do not say there was anything wrong, but you paid undue attentions to this girl?—No, I did not.

She never complained to you?—Not previous to the 1st January.

She sent a note to Miss Rae?—Yes.

And she subsequently sent a note of apology to Miss Rae?—Yes.

When did you find out about these notes?—Just a day or two before Miss Rae left.

Counsel then read a letter of apology, in which the defendant asked Miss Rae for forgiveness for the tone of a previous note, and suggesting that Harry (plaintiff) should drive her to her destination, Ocala.

She says on one occasion she found you sitting with this lady, with your arm round her waist?—No.

There was considerable unpleasantness between you, and you threatened to sjambok her if she did not write this apology to Miss Rae?—That is absolutely false.

I am not making any reflections upon Miss Rae at all. Your wife says there was considerable unhappiness on account of your attentions to this lady?—I deny that.

Will you swear Mr. Palin made this remark to you?—He did not make it to me. I overheard him making it.

Continuing, the witness stated the unpleasantness started after the dance on the 18th January, because his wife would not go home with him. She refused to walk home with him from the ball-room to the hotel.

You put a watch on her?—Yes.

Were they to signal to you?—Yes.

Where?—Below the garden.

Hearns was seedy about this time?—He said he was.

Had she a hat on when you saw her?—Yes, when she came out of the sitting-room.

Has she ever admitted this offence to anyone else?—She has admitted it to my brother Eddie. It was only when her mother said, "I have plenty of money. I will see this thing through in court," that Mrs. Lawlor denied the offence.

Hearns brought a charge of assault against you, and did you not ask your wife to admit her guilt to several people in order to show that you had great provocation in assaulting Hearns. What was the idea of admitting this guilt and your apology?—That was in order that she should be whitewashed in the eyes of the world.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What became of Hearns's case?]

Mr. Burton: That has been postponed at the plaintiff's request, pending the decision of this case.

Sam, one of the boys who kept watch at the request of the plaintiff, stated he saw the scab inspector on one occasion kiss Mrs. Lawlor. He could not understand why Mrs. Lawlor and Mr. Hearns shut themselves in the room. On the occasion in question he saw Mrs. Lawlor draw the blinds down. He told a Mr. Warner what had taken place, and then he went back to watch. When Mr. Lawlor had gone away, he saw the scab inspector go into the dining-room, and he saw him, before the blind was drawn, just by the window, with Mrs. Lawlor. The other boy went to see if Mr. Lawlor was coming back. When the plaintiff arrived he saw the scab inspector run very fast into the garden. Then he saw Mr. Lawlor on the other side of the fence. Mr. Lawlor came out with his gun, and asked witness the whereabouts of the scab inspector. Witness said he had run into the garden. When Mr. Lawlor fired the gun after Mrs. Lawlor, witness and the other boy took away the gun.

Another native stated that sometime after Christmas last year he saw the defendants go into a room after Mr. Lawlor and Mr. Manley went away to fish. The door was shut, and the blind drawn down, and witness drew Sam's attention to this.

Shortly afterwards Mr. Lawlor's horse came back, and Mr. Manley tried to catch it. Mrs. Lawlor came out of the room, and subsequently returned. The second time she came out of the room she was followed by the scab inspector.

Another boy gave evidence of a similar nature.

Harry P. Manley, member of the firm of Sutton and Manley, stated that at the beginning of the year he was doing some boring for the plaintiff on his farm. On and off he was at plaintiff's place from June, 1906, to January this year. Mr. and Mrs. Lawlor appeared to be getting on all right. On the 24th January he went out on horseback with the plaintiff on a fishing expedition. Mr. Lawlor's horse broke loose, and witness went in pursuit of it. The animal was caught at the hotel. He saw Mrs. Lawlor when he came back. Mrs. Lawlor was partially flushed, and she asked where the rider was. Witness said that the horse ran away.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Had you been staying as a boarder in the house?—Yes.

At the same time as Mr. Hearns?

Yes.

Have you noticed any familiarity between him and Mrs. Lawlor?—Not out of the way.

Out of the way. I do not know what you consider out of the way or in the way?—I do not know what would be termed familiarity. Nothing disgraceful.

You have never seen familiarity such as kissing?—No.

Nothing to attract you attention in the relations between the two?—Nothing.

Walter J. Warner, who looked after the store business for the plaintiff, stated that on the 24th January Sam asked him to come and see something.

Did you act on what he said?—No.

Why not?—In the first place I did not consider it my business to interfere with Mr. Lawlor's domestic affairs.

He remembered on the 25th January hearing the gunshot. Mrs. Lawlor was about 300 yards off. When the plaintiff fired the gun he looked very excited. Upon her return to the verandah Mrs. Lawlor was crying, and he heard her say: "Forgive me, Harry; I will never do it again." The plaintiff said: "You can take your things; the cart is spanned; and I will take you home." When Mr. Lawlor was present the defendant and the co-defendant seemed to avoid each other; but when he was absent they were often together. On two occasions he saw Mrs. Lawlor writing notes in the shop, and when Mr. Lawlor came in she hurriedly concealed them. He noticed that Mrs. Lawlor took an interest in Mr. Hearn's correspondence. Witness's office was a sub-post-office, and he had to do the sorting. When the first defendant came she looked over Mr. Hearn's correspondence before she even picked out her own.

Wm. George Bennett, who was at present working for the plaintiff, stated that while he was working in the smoke-room on the 24th January he noticed Mrs. Lawlor come from Hearn's room. Shortly afterwards Hearn emerged from the same room. Witness remembered the morning of the 25th January, when the disturbance took place. He saw some girls rush from the kitchen round the house. Witness asked Mr. Lawlor what was the matter, when he used an oath and said he had found the defendants together in the room. The plaintiff was in a passion. He heard Mrs. Lawlor, who was crying when she was brought back, say, "Forgive me, Harry; it shall never happen again."

George Pitt gave corroborative evidence as to the defendants entering the same bedroom.

Edward Lawlor, trader, Cofimvaba, spoke to a family gathering in February last, at which efforts were made to effect a reconciliation. Witness asked Mrs. Lawlor if she were guilty. He had not the slightest doubt that she said she was. Mrs. Snodgrass, on hearing of the admission, subsequently said that defendant was a little fool for making such an admission.

By the Court: Mrs. Snodgrass used her influence with the plaintiff's wife, and prevailed on her not to return to her husband.

What was it she admitted, being found in the room with a man?—I took it she admitted the general accusation against her.

That is of adultery?—Yes.

Agnes Lawlor, wife of Percy Lawlor, brother of the plaintiff, stated Mrs. Lawlor had often written notes to Hearn, and her explanation for doing so was that her husband objected to her being with Hearn. She saw a note from Hearn which began, "My dear, darling girl." Mrs. Lawlor told witness after the dance she was getting to dislike her husband more and more every day.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Mrs. Lawlor made no secret of the notes, although it struck witness it was a very improper state of affairs. She must have been subpoenaed on suspicion, as she never breathed a word to a soul about what she had seen.

Did Mrs. Lawlor confide in you about Miss Rae?—Yes, she thought her husband was carrying on with Miss Rae.

Did she say there was unpleasantness between them about it?—Yes.

Mr. Close closed his case.

The defendant, a young woman of prepossessing appearance, stated that she and her husband eloped to get married. Owing to various circumstances, they were only happy for a few months. There was a governess named Miss Rae, and her husband used to ask her out. Her husband became very friendly with this lady. Witness objected to Miss Rae coming to the place, and the plaintiff said it was his house, and he would invite whom he liked. On one occasion she saw her husband sitting with his arm round Miss Rae's waist and his hand on her knee. The plaintiff followed witness into the kitchen, and begged of her not to be angry. Witness said: "I do not wish to speak to you." Witness was very angry about the plaintiff taking Miss Rae to Cala, and she wrote to that lady stating if she made arrangements to go with her husband, to select a meeting-place other than the hotel. The letter of apology which witness subsequently wrote was drafted by her husband, who threatened to sjambok her if she did not copy it. She had more dances with Mr. Manley than with the second defendant on New Year's Night, and when she challenged Mr. Palin about the remark he passed, he absolutely denied having made it. Upon the second occasion she danced with Hearn at her husband's suggestion. She denied having kissed Hearn. On the 24th January Mr. Manley and her husband went out. Witness remained in her room.

On January 24 her husband and Manley left on a fishing expedition. She asked to be allowed to accompany them. Her husband, however, withheld his consent. She then went to her bedroom, and was lying down reading when the horses returned to the yard. The evidence given by the natives as to her having been in the stoep-room was quite untrue. On the 25th January, when she was passing the sitting-room, Hearn said: "Just a minute, Mrs. Lawlor." Witness went into the room, and sat on a chair close to the door, with her hand on the handle. Mr. Hearn spoke about his shirts and clothing. The door was ajar. She was not in the room above five minutes. It was not true that she pulled down the blind. While she was in the sitting-room her husband passed the door, and could not have helped seeing witness.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What was the object in holding the handle?]

Witness: I had no particular object.

[De Villiers, C.J.: A curious thing for you to do.]

Witness (continuing) said that soon afterwards she went out into the hall, and her husband asked her what she was doing. She replied, "Nothing." She went to the child, who was crying, and while she was standing at the sideboard in the dining-room, her husband came in with his gun in his hand. She did not remember whether she spoke to him, but he gave her a slap, and she fell against the sideboard and he kicked her. She was dazed, and when she came to her senses she went out, because she was frightened. She went along past the tennis-court fence. She heard someone call out, "Not that way; the front way." As she turned round, her husband fired at her. He then sent two native servants after her. They tried to catch hold of her, but she would not let them touch her. She went back to the house, and her husband then accused her of having been locked up in the room with Hearn. She emphatically denied the allegation, but he repeated it, and said that he would take her back to her mother's, where he had got her from. He again slapped her and pushed her, refused to let her have the children, and finally drove her to her brother's. She denied that she said "Forgive me, forgive me." She next saw plaintiff at the family council at Cofimvaba on the 5th February, when he said that he would make a public apology to her if she admitted her guilt. She refused to accept such terms, and at no time had she made an admission of guilt. She denied that she had made a confidante of Mrs. Percy Lawlor, or had told her that she wrote notes to Hearn. She had never written notes to Hearn.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cloos: Witness did not invite Miss Ray to visit them. Miss Ray came at the invitation of her husband. The trouble originated about the incident of the room when she found her husband with his arm round Miss Ray's waist. She wrote the letter of apology to Miss Ray under compulsion by her husband, but she had not since written to Miss Ray repudiating that letter. She had been friendly with Hearn, but nothing more. On the 25th January she saw no commotion between her husband and Hearn, and she heard no noise. She started to run away from the house when her husband fired at her.

By the Court: She copied part of the letter of apology sent to Miss Ray from a draft by her husband, and the rest she wrote at his dictation. Words were underscored at his request. It was through fear that he would sjambok her that she wrote the letter.

John Archibald George Hearn (the second defendant) was then called. He said he was a sheep inspector in the district of St. Mark's, Tembuland. He was insolvent, his estate having been sequestrated about 18 months ago. He had never been on intimate terms with Mrs. Lawlor. He had not carried on a clandestine correspondence with her. After the dance at Tsomo plaintiff gave him notice to leave the hotel at the end of January. On the 23rd and the following days he suffered from dysentery. On the 25th he was in the sitting room when Mrs. Lawlor passed, and he called her in, and asked her about his washing. Mrs. Lawlor went out, and a moment later Lawlor came in and said, "What the d— are you doing here with my wife?" Before he could reply Lawlor struck him over the head with a stick. Witness dropped on his knees, but pulled himself together, and was about to rush at plaintiff, when the latter turned round and ran to his bedroom, saying that he would get his gun. Witness was covered with blood. As he was going through the garden he heard a shot fired. He concluded that this was meant for him, and he therefore ran away. He subsequently sent for his horse, but received a threatening letter from plaintiff. Witness lodged a complaint with the Chief Constable at Cofimvaba in reference to the assault. That case was standing over pending decision of the present action. Witness was engaged to be married, and had received a letter from his fiancée since he had arrived in Cape Town.

Cross-examined: Witness had been dismissed from his appointment as scab inspector on account of being absent from his district without leave. He had informed the department that he could not give a full and complete explanation until the action was heard. On the 25th January, witness spoke to Mrs. Lawlor about his washing, as he was leaving at the end of the month. When Lawlor came into the sitting-room he did not chase witness round the sitting-room table. Witness did not run out of the room. Plaintiff went out of the room, saying that he was going for his gun.

Arnold K. Paling said that he was present at the New Year's dance at N'ccra. He denied having asked whether Mrs. Lawlor was engaged to Hearn.

Horace D. Lloyd, Assistant Magistrate of Cofimvaba, said that on the 27th January he saw plaintiff chasing Hearn with a stick. Witness spoke to plaintiff, who then began crying, and said that Hearn had ruined his wife. The incident took place in the street at Cofimvaba. Lawlor was drunk.

Mary Snodgrass (mother of the first defendant) gave evidence as to the return of her daughter with plaintiff on the 25th January, and the family council on the 5th February. At the family council, plaintiff wanted his wife to own up. Witness told her daughter that she was not to own to anything unless it were the truth. Plaintiff said that he wanted her to own up because he was frightened of Hearn. Witness did not hear her daughter make any admission.

William John Snodgrass (brother of Mrs. Lawlor) corroborated the previous witness. He said that his sister emphatically and persistently denied having committed herself with Hearn.

John Watterus, a trader (Mrs. Snodgrass's brother) said that he had never heard or understood from anyone that Mrs. Lawlor had admitted her guilt. He was present at the family gathering at Cofimvaba, and was with Eddie Lawlor most of the time, but he never heard an admission made by Mrs. Lawlor.

Thomas Wm. Watterus (who also attended the family gathering) said that Mrs. Lawlor always denied her guilt.

Martha, a native servant, and Hester, a native nursemaid, said that while in plaintiff's service, they had not seen any familiarity between Mrs. Lawlor and Hearn.

This concluded defendants' case.

Agnes J. Ray (called by Mr. Close) said that in December last, she was asked by Mrs. Lawlor to extend her visit to the hotel. She denied that she had been on intimate terms with plaintiff. Witness was engaged to be married, and was engaged about Christmas last.

This was all the evidence.

Postea (July 1st).

Mr. Close said that he did not at the present stage intend to touch upon the first defendant's claim for a judicial separation, but to deal solely with the question of adultery. The evidence was not direct, but the Court, all the same, had very considerable evidence in support of the charges laid by plaintiff, and of as near and direct a nature as one could possibly expect in such cases, and corroborated in material points when it came to a question of conflict of testimony between the witnesses for plaintiff and defendants. All the independent corroboration, he submitted, was on the side of plaintiff. There was, he contended, every reason to believe the story told by plaintiff as to the defendants being locked in the sitting-room of the hotel together on the 25th January. The admission stated by Mr. Edward Lawlor to have been made by the first defendant at the family council on the 5th February was entitled to credence. The plaintiff had absolutely proved his case, and he was entitled to a divorce and custody of the children. As regarded the matter of damages, Hearn had admitted that he was an insolvent, and he (Mr. Close) did not propose to go into the question of his means, but he asked the Court to award such a sum as to mark its sense of the co-defendant's conduct.

Mr. Burton laid stress on the fact that Mrs. Lawlor seemed to have been very jealous of her husband, on account of his relationships with Miss Rae. The incident of her husband proposing to drive Miss Rae to Cala, a distance of 30 miles, caused her a good deal of trouble.

Mr. Close (interposing) said that it was plaintiff's brother who was asked to drive Miss Rae to Cala.

Mr. Burton (continuing) said that, whether justifiably or perhaps unjustifiably, on the actual facts, there was no doubt the defendant was troubled about it, and the matter was one of real unhappiness. Counsel went on to call attention to the abject letter of apology alleged to have been written by Mrs. Lawlor under compulsion by her husband, and the similarity in style between that letter and one sent by plaintiff to his wife. Plaintiff denied that he had anything to do with this letter. Was his evidence credible on that point? Mrs. Lawlor had spoken the truth with regard to this matter, and one could not help concluding that plaintiff had misled the Court. Counsel said that he found it difficult to believe the story told by Mrs. Percy Lawlor as to Mrs. Harry Lawlor having told her that she was carrying on a clandestine correspondence with Hearn. The story was one which, he submitted, the Court could not place reliance upon. Coming to the incidents alleged to have taken place in the latter part of January, he commented on the need of accepting the testimony of native witnesses with great caution, unless it were properly corroborated. Their evidence as to what took place on January 24 was uncorroborated. The allegations as to January 25 depended mainly on the evidence of plaintiff himself. The whole story given by the native witnesses was most improbable. Mr. Burton claimed that plaintiff's account of what he found on January 25 was not to be believed. In regard to the family council, he urged that plaintiff had recognised that he had not a good case, and so he wanted an admission from his wife to bolster up his case. The story told by Edward Lawlor was contradicted by several witnesses, who said that they never heard the first defendant admit her guilt, and that throughout she maintained her innocence. Counsel also briefly addressed the Court in support of the counter-claim for a separation.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an exceedingly painful case, painful certainly for the parties concerned, and for their friends, and painful even for the judge who has to decide in the midst of the conflicting evidence which has been given. A great deal in the present case must depend upon the credibility of the parties immediately concerned—of the plaintiff and of the two defendants—and if it is found that either party has upon very important points given evidence which to my mind is wholly incredible, then their evidence cannot be accepted upon other points which are even more material to the decision of this case. I must express my regret that Miss Rae's name has been dragged into the case. I consider that the first defendant had no justification whatever for any of the charges which she has made against Miss Rae. One of the statements which she has made is that on one occasion she had seen the plaintiff sitting in the room with Miss Rae, with one arm round her waist and his hand on her knee. Miss Rae has been called to give this statement an emphatic denial, and I am bound to say that I accept Miss Rae's statement as the perfect truth in the case. Then it appears that the first defendant had taken offence at the fact that her husband had offered to take Miss Rae to Cala station, and that she must have written some very insulting letter to Miss Rae on the subject. After the letter had been written she appears to have regretted its very insulting terms, and she sent a letter again to Miss Rae humbly apologising for the terms in which she had written. Now, the fact that she had written this letter would, of course, have weighed against her, and accordingly she, in giving her evidence before this Court, stated that it was written because her husband threatened to sjambok her if it were not written, and that her husband had dictated the terms of the letter, and that she was simply an instrument in his hands in writing that letter. I am bound to say that I wholly disbelieve this statement; it is wholly incredible. It is not a letter which he could have or would have written, it is not a letter which a man could write or would write, it is a woman's letter from beginning to end in its underlinings as well as in every form of expression. It has been said that another letter has been written by plaintiff which is in very much the same terms, but they differ in toto from each other in the forms of expression, and certainly I do not see any of the underlinings in the plaintiff's letter written by him; it is shorter in terms and very much to the point. She said that the latter part of the letter was dictated by her husband. I do not quite understand why, if the latter part were dictated, she should end with the latter part instead of beginning with the dictated part. Now, the part which she said was dictated was the latter part, which reads: "The devil, Miss Rae, got the better of me on Tuesday, and I could not tell you to save my life what it was about. Do please forgive me. I am really sincerely sorry for the step I took, and I do sincerely wish you to let Harry drive you to Cala. Oh, please, don't say no. You don't know how ashamed I am of myself. Do write and relieve me of my misery. It has, I can assure you, been painful misery. I have hardly closed my eyes for the last two nights. My face will show you the misery I have been in. Good-bye, Miss Rae; I hope you will do as I wish.—Yours in misery, M. Lawlor." Now, to my mind, it is wholly incredible that her husband had forced her to write this, especially the phrase about her face would show, by having a sjambok there ready to give her a thrashing. He had never had the sjambok down before. I consider that she would have had quite sufficient spirit to tell her husband when he asked her to write this letter that she refused to write it, and that he could sjambok her as much as he liked, but she would not write it. I believe that this letter was written from her heart, because she was thoroughly ashamed of herself for having written the previous letter to Miss Rae. Coming to the points more immediately in the case, what led to this suit was that the plaintiff found his wife in her room with the second defendant. Now, that in itself, I do not think, would prove adultery. If the door were locked it would not necessarily prove adultery. It was not in a bedroom. The lady had her hat on and her husband does not allege that her condition showed that anything improper had occurred. I do not think myself that that in itself would be clear proof of adultery. But if the defendant denies the statement that she was closeted with the second defendant, that, if untrue, would go far to throw discredit upon her denials as to the other case in which circumstances were more conclusive as to adultery than the circumstances of being found in the sitting-room with the second defendant. Now, what led the plaintiff to go back and find her there? Something must have been told him. Undoubtedly something was told him that morning. He says that Sam and Fungama had told that something had taken place previously, and it was in consequence of what they told him that he determined to pretend to go to Light's, and to come back, thinking he might find defendants in a compromising position. It has been urged by counsel for the defence that a trap was laid for defendants. I do not see that any trap was laid. Neither was enticed into a position in which the plaintiff wanted to assure himself that what the natives had told him was the truth, and that there was some intriguing going on between his wife and Hearn. He came back almost immediately after he had been out of sight, his wife saw that he was out of sight, and then, on a signal from Fungama, he goes into the house, and, according to his own evidence, he finds the sitting-room door locked, and with considerable effort he opened the door and found his wife and the second defendant in the room together. The statement that he attempted to go in and had to use considerable force is supported by Fungama, who says that he saw the master try three times at the door before he could get in. Undoubtedly the plaintiff was in a state of frenzy. Nobody can excuse his conduct. He was out of his mind with fury. He admits that he struck his wife, and that he afterwards fired at her. It is not suggested that he was drunk. If ever he would have been sober it would have been that morning when he was going to find out the truth about his wife. It is incredible that the man would have been in that state of frenzy if the wife's statement is true that she was sitting at the door, with the door open and her hand on the handle, with her hat on, and the man sitting near the window. It is utterly incredible that the man would have been in that condition if her statement be true and the statement of the second defendant be true. I should have thought, on the contrary, the plaintiff would have been relieved rather at finding that his suspicions were unfounded, but so far from his suspicions being relieved, they were fully confirmed when he found, as I find the fact to be, that the door was locked at the time, closed so that he could not enter, and the two defendants were in together. As I said before, that is not conclusive. The circumstances are such that it is quite consistent with her innocence. The mere fact that the door was locked is not necessarily proof of misconduct, but then, as I said before, something had taken place the day before, which led to suspicion. That is undoubted. Now, what is it? There we have the evidence of two natives. I quite agree that the evidence of these people should be looked upon with care, and that it should not be accepted, unless there be corroboration in some important point. Well, already there is corroboration in the fact that when they had told their master what had taken place, and the master had tested the matter, he had found the two together. But there is further corroboration in what followed on the day on which the plaintiff had gone fishing with Manley, and he has stated what he saw, and, in my opinion, such evidence does to a great extent corroborate the evidence of the man Sam. At first it would appear that Sam had wished to convey the idea that he was all the time at the store. If that were so, then it would have been impossible for him to see the first defendant speaking to Manley, but it would appear from the evidence that he was not all the time at the store, that he at one time had gone to the back, and would have been able to see the first defendant speaking to Manley there. Manley says that he saw Mrs. Lawlor coming from the corner room towards the hall door. She denies that altogether, but I say that that is a corroboration of the evidence given by the two natives. The defendant knew that Manley had been there, and that the horse of the plaintiff had run away. She said, "Where's the rider?" He said the horse had run away. She went back to the room, knowing there was time to be there without being interrupted. Now, if these parties had admitted that they were in the room for an innocent purpose, then the Court might still have considered whether it cannot be possible that they were there for an innocent purpose, but they say they never were together; she says that she was in her own room that afternoon, and he says he was in his own room. So that the very fact, if the Court find it true that they were together, that they totally deny their presence there, would go far to show that, if they were there actually, they were there not for innocent purposes. In these cases of adultery the Court must be guided by circumstantial evidence. It is not a thing that is done in public, but as secretly as people can do it, and therefore the Court must judge by what it knows of human nature, and by the evidence in cases of this kind must judge from the circumstances as to whether there was guilty conduct, and I am bound to say that the only conclusion I can arrive at is that there was misconduct on that afternoon. There had been undoubtedly strained relations between the husband and his wife previously. I believe what Mrs. Percy Lawlor says generally, that she (the defendant) was losing her affection for her husband, and I do not see any reason to disbelieve the statement made by her that she had seen a letter addressed to the first defendant in somewhat endearing terms, and considering the manner in which these natives gave their evidence on other points, I do not see any ground for disbelieving their statement that on the occasion on which the plaintiff and defendant returned from Cofimvaba there was familiarity between the two defendants, and that they kissed each other when the plaintiff had gone to the bar. That in itself, as I say, would not be conclusive proof, but I say that these circumstances, taken together, seem to me to prove that the two defendants were on affectionate terms with each other, and that the terms were such that it is extremely unlikely that their being together in the bedroom on the afternoon of the 24th January would have been for any other than illicit purposes. Then in regard to the admission alleged to have been made by the first defendant as to her guilt, the first admission was heard by Warner and, I think, Bennett, when she had been called back after the firing. She and her husband were walking together under the verandah on the stoep, and they both heard her speak under great excitement, and they heard her ask her husband to forgive her. Now, here again the forgiveness she asked for might have been only for being found in the room with the second defendant, but then here again she denies having asked for forgiveness at all, and I can only conclude that the forgiveness she asked for was for misconduct which she had been guilty of with the second defendant. Then again we have the evidence of Mr. Eddie Lawlor as to what took place at the meeting of friends on the 5th February. I am not prepared to say that the other witnesses came here to perjure themselves as to what they heard. They may possibly not have heard everything, but I am quite satisfied that Eddie Lawlor understood the confession was made, that the confession was at once repressed by the interference of her mother, and when the mother had interfered the daughter did not repeat the confession; but up to a certain point I am satisfied that the daughter was prepared to make a confession. In regard to Eddie Lawlor's conduct in the matter, I am bound to say that throughout he has shown a sincere desire to bring these parties together and to get them to settle this matter amicably. I do not see any trace in his letters of animus against Mrs. Harry Lawlor, or of partiality for his brother. Notwithstanding his belief that the woman was guilty, he tried for family reasons and more especially for the sake of the unfortunate children to bring them together and get them to settle matters, but there was a hitch, and I believe that the hitch was mainly caused by the interference of the mother of the first defendant. But for that interference probably these parties would have come together, and they might have settled the matter and perhaps lived together again happily afterwards. But unfortunately the case has now reached a stage at which this seems to be impossible. Plaintiff has decided to go on with the action, and the Court must now with the evidence before it, and according to its best lights, decide between the two, and I am bound now to say that, as a juror, I come to the conclusion that plaintiff has proved his case and that there has been adultery on the part of the first defendant with the second defendant. In saying this I do not in any way excuse the conduct of the plaintiff towards his wife after he discovered what their relations were, but I do not think there is any evidence to show that before he discovered these relations he was in any way an unkind husband or treated her at all improperly. After he had discovered it, undoubtedly he lost his temper completely, and in a state of frenzy he did things which I am sure he must have afterwards regretted. I do not think I am justified in punishing him for what he did afterwards by withholding costs in this case, but I do not think this is a case in which any good purpose could be served by giving damages against the co-defendant. I think it would be sufficient for the purpose of this case if in giving judgment for the plaintiff as prayed I ordered that costs of this action be paid by the second defendant. Judgment will be given as prayed, the first defendant to have access to the children of the marriage at all reasonable times and places, the second defendant to pay the costs. Plaintiff will be declared a necessary witness.

Postea (July 2nd).

De Villiers, C.J., said that judgment was entered for plaintiff as prayed. Of course, that did not include the £5,000 damages claimed against the second defendant, but it included forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage by the first defendant. The only point was that there might still be a question hereafter of whether the forfeiture should not take effect from the date of judgment.

Mr. Roux said that his client was prepared to consent to that. He added that he understood an inheritance was coming to defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It affects the question of the costs of the first defendant in defending the action, whether those costs should not come out of her share of the estate, seeing that the forfeiture takes effect from the date of judgment.

Mr. Roux pointed out that in evidence it transpired that Mrs. Lawlor did not bring any property into the marriage.

[De Villiers, C.J.: They were married in community and until the forfeiture was actually decreed half the estate belonged to her.]

Mr. Roux said the Court ordered the costs to be paid by the second defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but supposing the second defendant is insolvent? The Court only ordered the plaintiff's costs to be paid by the second defendant, not the first defendant's costs.]

Mr. Roux: We did pay over a sum of £50 to enable her to defend the action.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he wanted to make it perfectly clear as to what was to happen hereafter. Until the forfeiture actually took place, she was the owner of half the estate. Supposing her costs were in excess of £50 should they not first be paid out of her estate?

Mr. Sutton (in the course of further argument) said that the sum of £50 was as nothing compared to the amount of costs incurred by Mrs. Lawlor. She had been quite justified in defending the action. As to the inheritance, it would be a matter of law whether it came into the community at all.

De Villiers, C.J.: The judgment had better stand. The Court will grant a decree of divorce, plaintiff will be declared entitled to custody of the children of the marriage, with leave to the first defendant to have access to such children at all reasonable times and places, ordered that plaintiff's costs be paid by the second defendant, including plaintiff's costs as a witness, declared that the first defendant has forfeited any benefits accruing to her by virtue of the marriage in community. That, of course, is the result of giving judgment in terms of the prayer of the declaration. As to the ultimate result of this, I do not think it is necessary for me to express any opinion now, but I should think that the effect of the forfeiture would be to debar the first defendant from claiming payment except for such expenses as she has incurred by authority of her husband. Still, the point is not raised in the pleadings, it does not arise for decision, and all I can do now is to give a decree of forfeiture as prayed.

REVIEW

REX V. TITIES. { 1907.
 { June 28th.

Acts 23 of 1879, Sec. 4 and 23 of 1906, Sec. 1—Evidence as to character.

Buchanan, J.: A case has come in review which raises rather a nice point. One Tities was prosecuted under the Vagrancy Act, for trespass upon an enclosed camp. Now, the 4th section of the Vagrancy Act, under which he is charged, makes a person a vagrant, who is found wandering and loitering on a farm. The 1st section of Act 23, 1906, which amends the 4th section, makes trespass liable to the same penalties, when any person is trespassing upon or found within enclosed premises. In this case the accused was not found upon the farm. Certain spoons were found, and a charge was brought against the accused for killing an ostrich, which had been found dead in the camp, and he was convicted, and sentenced for that offence. Then this second charge was brought up against him. He was not found within the camp at all, and every witness when he began his evidence spoke of the previous conviction of the accused. Even if a strict reading of the Act might allow, the prisoner to be made a vagrant though he was not found on the place, still the proceedings are so irregular that I think they ought not to be confirmed. There is a distinct prejudice to the prisoner in the statements made by every witness. It is a well-known principle that evidence as to the character of the accused should not be brought before the Court prior to conviction unless evidence as to good character is led on the other side. The papers had been submitted to the Attorney-General, and he is not prepared to support the conviction. The conviction will be quashed.

Defendant appeared and asked for a stay of execution, as he was expecting funds to arrive in a few weeks.

Judgment as prayed, execution stayed for three weeks.

IRWINE V. GOLDSMITH.

LEVINE V. GOLDSMITH.

Mr. Toms was for applicants, Reuben Levine and Alto Irwine; Mr. Van Zyl was for respondent, Abraham Goldsmith.

These matters arose out of certain spoliation proceedings. Applicants had been adjudged to pay the costs, and subsequently they were again brought into Court on an application for a decree of civil imprisonment. The Court granted a decree, but suspended execution on payment by Levine of 15s. a month, and by Irwine of 5s. a month.

Applicants had fallen into arrear with their payments, and had been lodged in gaol.

Having heard affidavits and counsel on the facts:

Buchanan, J.: These are two applications against the same respondent. The first one is by Reuben Levine. Reuben Levine has had a previous judgment of the Court against him, and on failure to satisfy that judgment a decree of civil imprisonment was granted against him, but execution was suspended on condition of his paying 15s. a month to the respondent Levine, as I understand, has paid one 15s., but omitted to pay a second 15s., though after his arrest his attorneys, to whom Levine had paid 15s., intended, I presume, for the respondent, tendered the amount to the respondent. In Levine's case, on payment of this 15s., he will be released from gaol, but the previous order will still remain against him. As regards Irwine, there seems absolutely no reason whatever given why a man in his position, earning the money he does, should not pay the 15s. a month which was the condition upon which in his case execution was stayed. On Irwine's application there will be no order. In Levine's case, an order will be made that he be released from imprisonment on paying the 15s. which was tendered, but the decree will remain otherwise as before. The costs will be added to the debt.

MARAIS V. LANGERMAN.

Mr. Upington moved, on behalf of plaintiff, in the action for a commission de bene esse to take the evidence of Mr. Anders Ohlsson, who was shortly leaving Cape Town. Respondents consented to the application.

Order granted, appointing Mr. Giddy, K.C., as commissioner to take the evidence of Mr. Ohlsson.

PIENAAR V. GODDESS.

Mr. Lewis moved, on behalf of the applicant, for a postponement of this case, brought by respondent against applicant, which had been set down for trial on the 3rd July.

Mr. Roux appeared for respondent.

The ground of the application was that defendant had been called away to Upington on the business of a company of which he is managing director, and that his evidence was essential to the defence. Respondent was prepared to consent to a postponement, so long as the case was heard this term and defendant paid wasted costs.

Buchanan, J.: This case arises out of a contract which was entered into last year for the building of certain buck wagons. Certain of these wagons seem to have been completed early this year.

Upon the completion of the work the purchase price was payable. Two of the wagons were not approved of, and, therefore, no payment was made. On the 10th May summons were issued and declaration filed. The defendant entered appearance, but did not plead, and he was barred. When he applied to the Court in June for leave to purge default, he had been in hospital, and assuming there was good reason for his delay, it was intimated that the bar would be removed on condition that the parties went to trial this term. That was really the impression left by the Court. The case must go to trial this term. The defendant was in town when the bar was removed, and he ought to have prepared for the trial taking place as intimated. He is now at Kenhardt, and the case has been set down for the 3rd July. A postponement will be granted, but I do not think it can go beyond the date originally contemplated. The case will be set down for the 12th July. Costs may be mentioned at the trial.

Ex parte O'CONNOR.

Mr. Toms moved on behalf of petitioner, as proprietor of the "South African Trade Journal and Shipping Gazette," for an order for the attachment of certain goods belonging to C. J. R. Dolling, lately trading in Cape Town as the "Horne Water Paint Co.," and for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation. Petitioner stated that respondent was indebted to him in a sum of £45 12s., for advertising and copies of the paper supplied, that Dolling had left for England some time ago, and that there was reason to believe that he had no intention of returning to the Cape, as instructions had been given to close down the business here. Petitioner asked leave to attach about four tons of material belonging to respondent, in order to found jurisdiction.

Leave granted to attach the goods adfundandam jurisdictionem, and to sue by edictal citation, citation returnable on the 31st August, personal service, failing which, service at respondent's last known place of business in London

APPENDIX.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the Appeal of The Vilander Concessions Syndicate v. the Government of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, from the Supreme Court of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope; delivered the 7th February, 1907.

Present at the Hearing:

LORD MACNAGHTEN.

LORD DAVEY.

LORD ROBERTSON.

LORD ATKINSON.

[Delivered by Lord Robertson.]

The question in this Appeal is of the present effect, in relation to the Government of the Cape Colony, of a certain concession of minerals obtained by one Adolph Heinrich Carstensen from a native chief in Bechuanaland in 1889 and 1890. The Appellants are admittedly vested in all the rights of Carstensen.

At the time of those concessions there was only a Protectorate of the territory in question. Her late Majesty's sovereignty not having been proclaimed until 1891. Accordingly it is assumed that, in those days, David Vilander, the chief who granted the concession, was competent to deal with those minerals. The immediate question is rather of the effect of the decision on the concession of a Court styled "The British Bechuanaland Concession Court," which was constituted in 1893, and authorised to inquire into and decide upon the validity and scope of all such concessions from native chiefs made prior to 1891. Postponing, in the meantime, any examination of the terms of the Proclamation of 1st February, 1893, establishing this Court, it is convenient now to say that the Appellants submitted their claim under Carstensen's concession to this Court, and the Court inquired into and decided upon it, their Judgment being entered under the head "'A' claims allowed," "A. H. Carstensen, mineral rights over the whole of Vilander's country."

"The entire claim as proved granted, subject to all laws and regulations of British Bechuanaland relating to mines and minerals, and otherwise in force in the said territory."

The whole controversy in the present Appeal turns on the qualification or condition introduced into this decision by the word "subject," and neither party has pointed to any other law or regulation as bearing on the question than a Proclamation dated 25th April, 1889. The contention of the respondent is that, in so far as the precious minerals are concerned, the rights of Carstensen by Vilander with the rights al-erals are concerned, the privileges conferred by Vilander on Carstensen have, by this decision, been restricted to the rights allowed to subjects by the Proclamation of 1889. It is not necessary, in detail, to compare or contrast the rights purported to be conferred on Carlow by the Proclamation. It is still less necessary to contrast the latter with the claim of exclusive right which is, for the first time, advanced in express terms in the appellants' case. Suffice it to say that the difference, in either view, is so great that, if the Proclamation be the true measure of the appellants' rights in the precious minerals, they rightly failed in the Courts of the Colony.

In the Colony the litigation between the parties was commenced by summons dated 1st June, 1904, by which the appellants claimed a declaration; but it was agreed that the question should be tried on a Special Case, and the contention of the parties, the appellants (as plaintiffs) and the respondent (as defendant), were stated in the following (very general) terms:

"The plaintiffs contend that the concession and further concession are and have been of full force and effect and binding upon the Government, and that they are entitled to have their rights in, arising out of, and under the said concession and further concession, declared accordingly by this Honourable Court, and to obtain an order declaring that as to all grants already issued with such reservations the Colonial Government is bound to recognise the said reservations as made for and on behalf of the plaintiffs, and directing the Government as to any further grants of land in the said territory to include a condition subjecting such grants to the rights of the plaintiffs and their successors or assignees under the aforesaid concessions."

The defendant contended:

"That the plaintiffs are not entitled in the premises to the relief claimed."

The Chief Justice, on 7th March, 1905, granted judgment in favour of the defendant's contention, "this Judgment to have effect only of absolution from the instance." On appeal, this Judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court, sitting as a Court of Appeal, on 19th June, 1905. The present appeal was then brought.

Reverting now to the concession of Vilander, it is to be observed (1) that it does not purport to make the right conferred an "exclusive right to search for and win minerals in the territory in question"; and (2) that it is not confined to the precious minerals, but applies to all minerals. It gives to the grantee a mining concession to search for and win precious stones, gold, silver, platinum, and other minerals over and in one or more area or areas not to exceed in the aggregate 20 miles square or 400 square miles, to be chosen by the grantee. Then, as soon as the grantee has selected the area, he is, in consideration of a stipulated rent and royalty, to "be entitled to convert to his own use all precious stones and all minerals whatsoever found within the limits of this concession or demise." The concession was to last so long as the stipulated rent and royalty were punctually paid.

Now it should seem the just result of these provisions that assuming the grantee, once he has selected and marked off his area, to have an exclusive right to the minerals found in that area, his antecedent right to prospect within the territory of Vilander was not exclusive and could effectively be exercised although not exclusive.

Considering, however, apart altogether from this question of exclusiveness, the effect of the qualification or condition imposed by the Concession Court in 1889 on the appellants' claim on Carstensen's concession, it is to be observed that that qualification operated solely on the right to precious minerals, and did not touch the right to other minerals, which, as has been seen, was conferred on Carstensen. Accordingly it is not the case, as was maintained by the appellants, that the judgment of the Concession Court, on the theory of the respondent, extinguishes, while it purports only to qualify, the rights conferred by the concession. If the concessionaire had an exclusive right to prospect for the baser minerals, that right is untouched by the qualification in the judgment and he has it still. If, on the other hand, the right to prospect for the baser minerals be not exclusive, again, it exists tantum et tale as in the concession. What the qualification does modify is the right to the precious minerals. And their Lordships have not heard any argument which gives any effect at all to the words of the qualifying part of the Judgment and at the same time supports the appellants' claim. Such argument as has been advanced does not offer a competing construction of the qualification (and indeed none is possible), but goes to establish a repugnancy between that part of the Judgment which sustains the claim and that part which subjects it to the rules and regulations. The appellants have indeed assumed that, if there be a repugnancy, they are entitled to solve the difficulty by ignoring the condition imposed by the Court to which they submitted their claim. But it was unquestionably competent for that Court to hold the concession to have been honestly obtained, and at the same time to "modify the terms, conditions, and scope" of the concession, or to "impose equitable limitations, restrictions, or conditions upon" its exercise. (Section 23 of the Proclamation of 1st February, 1893.) And it is wholly intelligible that, in the present instance, the Court should allow the concession full scope as regards the baser metals, in which region the rights conferred were not in excess of existing rules, while, as to the precious metals, the concessionaires were made subject to the ordinary rules.

This is the view which their Lordships take, and they will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the Appeal ought to be dismissed. The appellants will pay the costs of the appeal.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the appeal of The Standard Bank of South Africa, Limited, v. Heydenrych, from the Supreme Court of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope; delivered the 20th June, 1907.

Present at the Hearing:

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.
LORD ROBERTSON.
LORD COLLINS.
SIR FORD NORTH.
SIR ARTHUR WILSON.

[Delivered by Lord Collins.]

The question on this appeal is one of preference between creditors in the insolvency of Messrs. Mackie, Young and Co., a firm carrying on business in Cape Town. On 23rd April, 1901, a general notarial bond was passed by the above firm in favour of Cresswell, Sons and Co., who were about to act as their agents in London. By the said instrument the obligors acknowledged themselves bound to Cresswell, Sons and Co., thereafter styled the mortgagee, in the sum of £5,000, and, after reciting that they, desiring to extend their business operations, had applied to the mortgagee to be granted an open credit and certain other facilities which the mortgagee had agreed to grant on certain terms, they declared the condition of the bond to be that, if they should pay at due dates to the mortgagee all sum and sums of money which then or at any time thereafter should be or become due by them to him, whether arising from promissory notes, drafts, acceptances, goods sold and delivered, interest, charges, moneys paid or from what cause soever, and should perform all the conditions agreed upon between them and the mortgagee, then those presents should be null and void, but otherwise of full force and effect.

This bond was registered at the Deeds Office in Cape Town, on the 25th of April, 1901.

On the 12th December, 1902, it was ceded by the mortgagee to the Standard Bank (the now appellants), and the cession was registered on the 5th of December, 1903. In determining the rights to preference in the liquidation on the insolvency of Mackie, Young and Co., the Master held that the Standard Bank were entitled to preference as against the now respondent, and that decision was upheld by Buchanan, Acting C.J., on appeal. But the point now raised before their Lordships did not come up for discussion. Nor when the case came on appeal before the Supreme Court was the point raised by the parties. It was, however, taken by the Court itself, who accordingly directed a re-argument, and, though agreeing with the opinion of the Court below on the argument as there presented, reversed their decision and gave Judgment awarding a preference to the now respondent, and it is against that Judgment that the present appeal is brought. The Court, on looking closely into the facts, ascertained that, at the date of the incurring by the insolvents of the debts in respect of which the now respondent claimed preference, no sum had yet been lent by Messrs. Cresswell or the Standard Bank to the insolvents under their security; that thus, though the bond under which the Bank claimed was prior to that set up by the respondent, still preference was to be determined by the date of the debts and not of the securities, and that a security earlier in point of date but under which no advance had been made must therefore give place to one that was later, but given for an actual advance. The learned counsel for the appellants could not dispute that the law as laid down by Sir H. de Villiers, (C.J.), based as it was on a passage from Gaius, confirmed by modern authorities, was correct; but he sought to raise a distinction upon the special terms of the bond relied on by the appellants. His contention was that the bond itself evidenced a present debt, and that therefore the security was effective from its date. But it is quite clear that no present debt was in fact created by the bond. In certain events which might or might not happen a debt might arise which might be described as solvendum in futuro, but until those conditions were fulfilled nothing became debitum at all either in the present or the future. This disposes of the main argument for the appellants. A faint suggestion was, however, made that the appellants, notwithstanding the fact that the respondent's security was on the register and an advance was made under it before the appellants had found any money for the mortgagor, must be assumed to have had no notice of the registration of a security subsequent in date to their own, and therefore were entitled to preference for their advance notwithstanding the intervening security and advance under it of the respondent. But even if, consistently with the Cape law as above ascertained, the absence of notice of the existence of a security subsequent to their own could be material, where on the facts later security had been followed by an advance before anything had been advanced by the appellants, the onus was clearly upon the appellants to establish the absence of notice, actual or constructive, having regard to what is laid down both by Buchanan, J., and by the Supreme Court as to the effect of the law and practice with regard to the registration of such deeds in the Colony. But no authority was cited, or principle invoked, which in any way threw doubt on the position thus taken by the learned Judges in both Courts below, and it seems therefore unnecessary to pursue the point further.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be dismissed.

The appellant will pay the costs of the appeal.

EATON, ROBINS AND CO. V. EXECUTOR ESTATE ANDERSON.

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence on eight promissory notes for £20 each, with interest from the due dates.

Order granted, subject to the defendant's letters of appointment being filed.

HOSKING V. HOSKING.

This was an action brought by Lily Eliza J. T. Hosking against her husband, Harry Daniel Hosking, for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce and forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage, on the ground of defendant's alleged malicious desertion.

Mr. Rowson was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

W. T. Birch, clerk in charge of the marriage register, Colonial Secretary's Office, gave evidence as to registration of the marriage.

Plaintiff said that she lived very unhappily with the defendant after marriage on account of his giving way to drink. He was at that time market master in Cape Town. They lived together for seven years, at the end of which time he lost his appointment. They had to give up their occupation of the house which went with the post. Her husband left the house and had to go to a farm for the benefit of his health. She understood that defendant was now in Cape Town, but she had not seen him.

By the Court: They were married in community. Witness, however, had no property. It was five years and seven months since she had seen or heard anything of defendant. She had heard that he was at the Docks.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before the 15th July, failing which to show cause on the 1st August why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs, and defendant declared to have forfeited any benefits accruing from the marriage in community.

Articled clerk — Completion of service of Articles within a foreign jurisdiction.

The Court refused to allow cession of a clerk's articles to an attorney of the High Court of the O.R.C. practising in that Colony; although the attorney was also an attorney of the Supreme Court.

Law Society v. McLeod (14, C.T.R., 886) distinguished.

Mr. Roux moved on the petition of Richard Craig Kriel for leave to complete his articles of clerkship in the Orange River Colony.

Mr. Close appeared for the Incorporated Law Society to oppose.

Applicant, it appeared, entered into articles with an attorney at Dordrecht on the 10th December, 1904, to serve for three years, and was still in the service of this attorney. He desired, however, owing to his monetary circumstances, to have his articles ceded to an attorney at Koffyfontein, Orange River Colony, who was an attorney not only of the High Court at Bloemfontein, but also of the Supreme Court at Cape Town. The latter had offered him a small salary, which would enable petitioner to support himself during the rest of his service. The Law Society opposed on the ground that such service would be outside the control of this Court and the society.

Mr. Roux said that the matter was entirely in the discretion of the Court, and, under the special circumstances, he urged that the indulgence asked for should be granted. He cited ex parte McLeod (21, S.C., 545), and Law Society v. McLeod (14, C.T.R., 836).

Mr. Close was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: There is no doubt that the 149th Rule contemplates that a clerk will serve within this colony for the full period. In the case of McLeod, a Divisional Court admitted the applicant, who had served part of his articles in Rhodesia, and stress was laid upon the fact that the Supreme Court is the Court of Appeal for Rhodesia, and that circumstance undoubtedly had an effect upon the decision of the Court in the first instance, as well as the Supreme Court sitting as a Court of Appeal. The sole reason why the Supreme Court in appeal refused to interfere was because of this one circumstance I have mentioned, and also because the learned Judge, sitting as the Supreme Court had granted a certain indulgence, and the Court was not prepared to say that it was illegal under the special circumstances of that case to grant the indulgence, but that certainly seems to be no reason for further extending the indulgence to a case like the present. Here, at all events, we have not the case of an attorney practising in an area over which the Supreme Court has jurisdiction as a Court of Appeal. It is now the case of an attorney in the Orange River Colony, and however desirable it may be to extend the comity in the manner proposed. I am not prepared to grant the application. Application refused; no order as to costs.

MASTER, SUPREME COURT V. TRUSTEE INSOLVENT ESTATE OF DICKER AND MEIRING.

This was an application under the 115th section of the Insolvent Ordinance, upon notice to John Orlando Walter, as trustee of the insolvent estate of Dicker and Meiring, of Laingsburg, for an order directing him to show to the Master of the Supreme Court, by vouchers or other sufficient proof, that the dividends payable under the first and final liquidation and distribution account filed by him in the estate had been fully paid, the said account having been duly confirmed by the Court on the 30th August, 1906, and to pay the costs of this application de bonis propriis.

Mr. Howel Jones, K.C., was for applicant; respondent did not appear.

Mr. Jones read an affidavit in support of the application.

Order granted as prayed, compliance to be made within one month.

In re THE CAPE CANNING CO., LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION).

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., moved for confirmation of the final report of the liquidator. Counsel said that the liquidator asked for special orders dissolving the company, in terms of the 169th section of the Companies' Act, and authorising him to destroy the books, vouchers, and documents of the company now in his custody.

Order in terms of the report.

Divorce — Domicile — Practice — Edictal citation — Suit in forma pauperis — Prima facie evidence of domicile.

The petitioner alleged that she and her husband had been married in community of property, and thereafter lived together in this Colony for over two years, after which the husband went away, leaving her here. The petition did not state whether the husband was born in this Colony; but there was, in the opinion of the Court, prima facie evidence that the parties intended to make this Colony their permanent home and that the husband had not changed his domicile:

Held, that the petitioner was entitled to obtain leave to sue her husband by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights and, failing obedience, for divorce on the ground of malicious desertion; leaving it to him to rebut the presumption that the parties were still domiciled here.

The petitioner had obtained a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why she shall not be allowed to sue in forma pauperis.

Held, that the existence of such rule was no bar to her obtaining leave to sue her husband by edictal citation, provided that the fees of office in connection with such citation were paid if issued before leave to sue in forma pauperis was granted.

The headnote in Walker v. Walker (6, C.T.R., 388) disapproved of Case of Le Mensurier v. Le Mensurier in Privy Council (L. Rep., Ch. 1895, p. 517) commented on.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan mentioned this matter, which had been before Mr. Justice Buchanan recently, on an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis and by edictal citation. Mr. Justice Buchanan had granted a rule on the former part of the application, but declined to grant the latter part of the application at the present stage. Counsel said that the decisions of the Court seemed to be conflicting in this matter of granting leave to sue in forma pauperis and by edictal citation at the same time. He cited the note at 6 Juta, 61, and the cases of Standen (15 C.T.R., 34), Brink (16 C.T.R., 439), Hamp (16 C.T.R., 1,150), and Brownell (17 C.T.R., 446).

De Villiers, C.J., observed that it did not appear that there had been any decision to the effect that the two processes could not be taken together. All that appeared was that there had been one case in which the Court thought it was not advisable that the processes should be served simultaneously.

Mr. Buchanan said that as far as he could see, the point was not decided in that particular case.

De Villiers, C.J.: It depends very much on the nature of the case whether the Court would adopt the one course or the other. As far as I can see, there is no decision that it would not be competent for the Court to authorise the issue of the edictal citation until after the leave has been granted to sue. Of course, there is a certain amount of difficulty in doing it all in one, especially in pauper cases. Professedly, the pauper has no means, and if there is to be double service, the expense would be very great, and it is to save that expense, I suppose, that the practice has crept in. At the same time, there is an inconsistency, no doubt, that the edict should be issued before there is leave to sue. The practice has existed, and I do not see that there is any decision to the contrary that it cannot be done. However, I think it would be well for the judges to meet and consider the matter. There should be uniformity of practice, if possible.

Mr. Buchanan said that he believed it was the practice at the High Court of Griqualand to allow the processes to take place together.

De Villiers, C.J.: And the probability is that the practice would be continued, more especially as there is no decision that it cannot be done. However, I would like to consult the other judges before finally deciding this matter.

Mr. Buchanan applied for an extension of the return day of the rule until the 1st November.

Return day extended accordingly.

Postea (July 3).

De Villiers, C.J.: The matter was mentioned to me yesterday of the petition of Mrs. Knox, who has obtained a rule nisi calling upon the respondent, her husband, to show cause on the 14th August, why the applicant shall not be admitted to sue in forma pauperis. I understand that application is now made for leave to issue edictal citation and intendit before the return day of the rule. That has been allowed frequently, and I am not aware of any decision of the Court in which it has been held that it cannot be done. But, of course, until leave is given to sue in forma pauperis, it cannot be treated as a pauper case, and the fees must be paid. The stamps for the edictal citation and the intendit must, of course, be affixed, and that would be a loss to the applicant even if the rule should ultimately be made absolute. So there is no difficulty in the matter, the Court will grant leave, as it has done in many other cases, to issue citation and intendit, and serve the same together with the rule, but it is clearly understood that any costs incurred until the rule is actually made absolute must be paid by the plaintiff, and if once the stamps are affixed, then the money cannot be recovered back. I see that counsel in the case of Knox is not at present in Court, and the matter may be mentioned again as to the mode of service of the citation.

Postea (July 8).

De Villiers, C.J.: This case has stood over to enable me to consult my brethren as to the practice which should in future be observed in cases where leave is sought by one spouse to sue the other in forma pauperis by edictal citation for divorce or for restitution of conjugal rights. It is said that there has recently been a departure from the practice referred to in 6 Juta, 61, under which the rule nisi and leave to sue by edictal citation were obtained at the same time, but there has been no decision to the effect that the practice is erroneous. Under special circumstances, the Court may have refused to grant leave to sue by edictal citation before the rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why the plaintiff shall not sue in forma pauperis has been made returnable, but the judges are agreed that, unless such special circumstances exist, the practice referred to shall be continued. Of course, until the rule is made absolute the plaintiff cannot obtain his citation or file his intedit without payment of the fees of office, but if he or she is willing and able to bear the expense there is no valid reason why the Court should not allow the citation and intedit to issue before leave to sue as a pauper is granted.

Another important question raised in this case is whether the Court should continue its practice of requiring no more than prima facie proof that the spouses are domiciled in this colony before allowing either of them to sue the other for divorce by edictal citation. In the case of Harckes v. Harckes (2, Juta, 109) it appeared that the husband had taken lodgings and afterwards a furnished house with the intention of settling here, and that he afterwards suddenly left for England, leaving his wife and children behind, there being nothing to show that he did not intend to return, and it was held that his wife was entitled to a decree of divorce on the ground of his adultery. In the course of the judgment it was said that the Court was not bound to inquire minutely whether he was domiciled here or not, but it is obvious that what the Court intended to convey was that, where the defendant does not appear to object to the jurisdiction, prima facie proof of domicile is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief. There is no doubt that the plaintiff, under such circumstances, always incurs the risk that the decree might thereafter be called in question in the Courts of other countries on proof that the domicile was not in this country, but such a risk he or she would incur, although in a lesser degree, even on full proof to the satisfaction of the Court granting the decree, that the domicile was within the jurisdiction of such Court. The practice of requiring no more than prima facie proof of domicile in cases of divorce has been uniformly followed in this court in numerous cases, and for many years, and I am not aware of any trouble or inconvenience having ever resulted therefrom. Certainly no case has ever been brought to the notice of this Court in which the Court of any other country has directly or indirectly questioned the validity of any of the decrees of divorce so granted by this Court. Of course, where there is no prima facie evidence of domicile in this colony, the Court would not grant leave to sue the defendant by edictal citation for divorce. Thus in the case of Walker v. Walker (13 S.C.C., p. 363), the parties had been married in this colony, but the husband, at the time of marriage, was an itinerant lecturer. In the same year they left for Australia, where they lived together for 12 years, after which the wife returned to the Colony, the husband promising to follow her. He failed to keep his promise, and the wife asked for leave to sue the husband by edictal citation, but leave was refused on the ground of insufficiency of proof of domicile. The head-note, however, of the report would lead to the inference that the Court would have granted leave if jurisdiction had first been founded by virtue of an arrest of the defendant or an attachment of his property. The concluding paragraph of my judgment was certainly somewhat unfortunately worded, and I cannot conceive that I was accurately reported. The suggestion that the arrest of the defendant might have supplied the defect of want of domicile would have been so contrary to the daily and established practice of the Court, that I cannot help thinking that my words were misunderstood. But even as the passage stands, it would not quite justify the terms of the head-note. I had previously referred to Protector Company v. Erwin (4 Juta, 91), which was not a matrimonial cause at all, and I added, "Where it appears on the face of a petition to sue by edict that the defendant is not only absent from this colony, but is not domiciled here, leave is not granted unless jurisdiction has first been founded by virtue of an arrest of the defendant or an attachment of his property." That remark, however, had no application to the particular case, which was then under consideration. What was intended to be conveyed by the concluding passage was that besides the defect of jurisdiction, which undoubtedly existed in that case by reason of want of domicile, there had not even been such arrest or attachment as would, in ordinary suits, have been necessary to confirm the jurisdiction of the Court. This remark was unnecessary for the decision of that case, and if the passage is capable of the construction placed on it in the head-note, I must take this opportunity of withdrawing it.

It still remains to be considered whether, in view of the practice said to prevail in other South African courts, and in view of the decision of the Privy Council in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (L.R.A.C., 1895, p. 517), this Court should reconsider the doctrine as to domicile upon which it has hitherto acted. In the case of Weatherby v. Weatherby (Transvaal H.C. Cases, for 1878, p. 66), it was held that the High Court of the Transvaal Province had jurisdiction, on the ground of adultery committed in the Transvaal, to dissolve a marriage contracted in England between parties whose domicile was English, but who were bona fide resident in the Transvaal, but the case does not appear to have been followed by the judges of the present Supreme Court of the Transvaal. In the case, for instance, of Ex parte Kaiser (T.H.C., for 1902, p. 165), Innes, C.J., held that permanent domicile is necessary within the territory to give its Courts jurisdiction.

to divorce, and in Murphy v. Murphy (T.S.C., for 1802, 179), Solomon, J. with the concurrence of his two colleagues, practically overruled the decision in Weatherby v. Weatherby. In the case of Burnett v. Burnett (12 C.L.J., 14), the High Court of the Orange Free State held that as the wife, who was the plaintiff, was domiciled within the jurisdiction, the Court had the right to decide upon her status, and a decree of restitution of conjugal rights was granted. If this decree was granted with a view of granting a decree of divorce on failure of the husband to return to or receive the plaintiff, it would be impossible to reconcile the decision with that of the Privy Council in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier. There it was held that, although residence without domicile may be sufficient to sustain a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, for separation, or for alimony, it is not sufficient to give jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. Nowhere in the judgment is a precise definition given of the nature and length of residence which would be sufficient to establish domicile as distinct from residence. The nearest approach to such a definition is the following: "Bona fide residence is an intelligible expression if, as their lordships conceive, it means residence which has not been resorted to for the mere purpose of getting a divorce which was not obtainable in the country of domicile." In that case the parties had been married in England, the plaintiff was an Englishman by birth, and at the time when the action was instituted, although officially resident in Ceylon, he admittedly retained and continued to retain his English domicile of origin. The Privy Council held that the Courts of Ceylon, where the Roman-Dutch law prevails, had no jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage, although the wife's adultery had been proved. I am not aware of any case in this Court in which a different principle has been allowed to prevail. Bona fide residence in this colony, with the object of making it the permanent home of the spouses, has always been considered necessary, and where it appeared that the residence has been resorted to for the mere purpose of getting a divorce, the Court has refused to grant relief. The only question in each case has been whether there is sufficient proof of bona fide residence. If prima facie evidence is given of such residence, the burthen of proving that a domicile has not been acquired within the territory is thrown on the defendant, and if he does not appear to object to the jurisdiction, the Court exercises the power to dissolve the marriage on sufficient grounds shown. This practice, as I have remarked, has never led to injustice or inconvenience, and will be continued in future.

The only remaining question is whether the petitioner has made out a prima facie case of domicile. As I understand the petition, both spouses were bona fide resident in this colony at the time when the marriage took place. They were married at Simon's Town in 1900 with community of property. After their marriage they lived together at Simon's Town for two years and three months, after which the husband left for England, where he now resides. There is nothing to show that he left the Colony with a view of changing his domicile, and the presumption is that he retains his Cape domicile, more especially seeing that he left his wife here. It is quite possible that at the trial the husband may be able to prove that he never had a Cape domicile, or that, having acquired it, he subsequently relinquished it, but with the proof now before the Court, there is sufficient reason for believing that such domicile has existed and still exists. The Court will therefore grant leave to the petitioner to sue the defendant by edictal citation, and to serve the intendit with the citation. The citation will be returnable on the 1st of November next, to which day the rule nisi already granted calling on the defendant to show cause why the petitioner should not be allowed to sue in forma pauperis will be extended, it being understood that all fees of office for citation and intendit will be payable until the rule is made absolute. Personal service to be effected.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SOMERSET STRAND MUNICI- } 1907.
PALITY V. DEYDIER. } July 3rd.

Mr. Toms moved for a writ of civil imprisonment against defendant, upon an unsatisfied judgment of the Periodical Court at Somerset West for two sums of £11 17s. 6d. and £11 respectively, being Municipal rates for 1905 and 1906, and interest à tempore morae, and costs, amounting to £3 18s. 11d.

Mr. Roux read an affidavit by defendant, who said that he was sued for rates and charges on immovable property at Somerset West Strand, which he had owned there at one time. He had tried to sell the property during last year, and had eventually disposed of it for the amount of the bond (£600) to the bondholder. The property had cost him £1,200. Deponent went on to state that he was absolutely without means or income, and that his wife carried on a small mineral-water factory and a small dairy, from which they derived barely sufficient to maintain the family. He annexed certified copies of certain judgments given against him. Counsel also read an affidavit by C. J. Krige, M.L.A., attorney, Caledon, who said that he knew the defendant had no means.

Mr. Toms read an answering affidavit by F. A. Guthrie, of Guthrie and Theron, attorneys, who said that defendant was a Councillor and Mayor of the Municipality of Caledon, and that he carried on business as a mineral-water manufacturer in his own name.

Mr. Roux said that Mr. Krige was in court, and was prepared to give evidence as to the defendant's want of means. Defendant had been advised to surrender his estate, but he was without assets. It appeared that he had lost all his money through land speculation at the Strand.

Mr. Toms submitted that the defendant, occupying the position he did, and carrying on a business in his own name, must be presumed to have some means.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is quite clear to me that the man is hopelessly insolvent, and that the only reason why he does not surrender his estate is that he has nothing to surrender. At the same time, it is possible at some future time the plaintiff may satisfy the Court that the defendant has means. Therefore, the Court will now make no order, but will reserve leave to the plaintiff to apply again on motion, without issue of fresh summons, on proof that the defendant has means to meet the amount of the judgment in whole or in part.

LUNTZ BROS. V. HOVELMEIER.

This was an application for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. There had, however, been short service of summons, six days only having been allowed, instead of eight. In order to save expense, Counsel suggested that the present summons should be allowed to stand, and that the case should be postponed for three weeks, notice of the postponement to be given to defendant, who resided at Kwelegba, district of East London.

Mr. Watermeyer moved,
Case postponed until the 23rd July, notice of postponement to be given to defendant by registered letter.

GOLDFOOT V. SIMSON.

Mr. Lewis (for plaintiff) applied for a postponement to enable his client to file replying affidavits.

Mr. Roux (for defendant) said that he consented subject to a long postponement being granted. The maker of the promissory notes in suit, was, he said, in New Zealand, and the defendant proposed to obtain an affidavit from him. There were other defences to the action, but his learned friend had not the notes at present, and could not put them in, so that he (Mr. Roux) could not argue the matter at the present stage.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It may be quite possible to decide the case without calling upon the maker of the notes.]

The matter was postponed until the 12th July.

Mr. Roux then said that the plaintiff was not domiciled within the jurisdiction, and he proposed to raise the question of security for costs.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You may now claim security for costs, as he asks for a postponement.]

Mr. Roux said that, if in order, he would apply for security now.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court will make it a condition of the postponement that security for costs be given to the satisfaction of the Registrar of the Court.

Ex parte ESTATE DORFLING.

Mr. Toms moved, on the petition of Gesina Sophia Snyman, as mother and natural guardian of her minor daughter, Gesina Sophia Dorfling, by her previous marriage, for authority to give and receive transfer of certain property in the division of Jansenville. The minor owns a share in Riet River, and also in Dwaas, and petitioner considered that it would be to her advantage to acquire a larger portion of Dwaas in exchange for her share in Riet River. Petitioner proposed to accept the offer of Mr. P. W. F. Weyer to transfer a thirty-seventh portion of Dwaas in exchange for the minor's sixth share of Riet River. Affidavits were also read showing that the proposed exchange was fair and reasonable. The Master, while pointing out that a tutor should have been appointed to the minor, reported that the exchange appeared to be fair and equitable.

Order granted as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and a Jury.]

BRADY V. PALMER.

1907.
July 4th.
" 5th.

Libel—Newspaper.

This was an action brought by Christopher Brady, attorney, Cape Town, against (1) Alfred Palmer, proprietor and editor of the "South African Review," (2) the Argus Printing Co., Ltd., and (3) the Central News Agency, Ltd., to recover £5,000 damages for alleged defamatory libel published in the "Review."

Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. Plaintiff is Christopher Brady, an attorney of this Honourable Court, practising at Cape Town, who from time to time has been appointed to act, and has acted, in the capacity of trustee in various insolvent estates.

2. The first defendant is Alfred Palmer, a journalist, carrying on business at St. George's-street, Cape Town; second defendant is the Argus Printing and Publishing Co., Ltd., a company with limited liability incorporated under the Companies' Act (25 of 1892) and carrying on business at Cape Town and elsewhere as printers and publishers; the third defendant is the Central News Agency, Ltd., a company incorporated under the Companies' Act (25 of 1892) and carrying on business at Cape Town and elsewhere as publishing agents.

3. The first defendant is the proprietor and editor, and second defendant is the printer, and third defendant is the publisher, of a certain weekly publication issued in Cape Town under the style and title of the "South African Review," and circulated in Cape Town and elsewhere in South Africa.

4. In or about the month of January, 1907, plaintiff received instructions from one Alfred Field, a dentist, practising in Cape Town, to recover by process of law a certain sum of one guinea due by one Harry St. Clair Tewson to the said Field for professional services rendered; thereupon plaintiff, on or about the 11th day of January, 1907, caused a letter to be sent to the said Tewson demanding payment of the said amount, but no reply was received thereto.

5. On or about the 19th day of January, 1907, the said Field surrendered his estate as insolvent, and on or about the 1st day of February, 1907, plaintiff was appointed sole trustee in the insolvent estate of the said Field.

6. On or about the 11th day of February, 1907, plaintiff caused a second letter to be written to the said Tewson demanding payment of the said amount of one guinea due to the insolvent estate of Field, and warning the said Tewson that, in case of his failing to pay, legal proceedings would be taken for the recovery of the said amount. No reply was received to the said letter.

7. Thereafter, on or about the 15th day of February, 1907, plaintiff issued summons in the Resident Magistrate's Court against the said Tewson for the said amount, and subsequently, on or about the 19th day of February, 1907, the said Tewson or his agent paid to plaintiff the said amount of one guinea, and thereafter, on or about the 22nd day of February, 1907, the said Tewson paid to plaintiff the amount of plaintiff's bill of costs incurred in and about the recovery of the said amount. The said bill of costs amounted to £1 5s. 1d. sterling, and contained only the usual and customary charges in such matters, and has been submitted to the clerk of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Cape Town, who has certified the charges contained therein to be the correct and customary charges.

8. In the number of the said "South African Review," issued on or about the 15th day of March, 1907, the first defendant wrote and caused to be published, the second defendant printed and caused to be published, and the third defendant published of and concerning the plaintiff in the way of his profession certain false, slanderous, malicious, and libellous statements contained in an article and in a letter signed by one "J. Lujt," together with the heading or headings prefixed to the said article and letter, which article and letter, plaintiff says, are and by the defendants were intended to be read together. The said article and letter were printed, issued, and published by the defendants in the said "South African Review" under a common title or heading, with sub-titles or sub-headings, viz.: "Small Debts Collecting," "Illegal Charges by Attorneys, etc.," "The Trustee-Attorney," "An Interesting Case," and contained the following false, scandalous, malicious, and libellous statement, viz.: "(a) I am aware of the fact that the Supreme Court judges have for long enough set their faces against solicitors acting as trustees in bankruptcy, but that does not altogether stop the practice, and the particulars of the under-mentioned case . . . forcibly illustrate the hardship entailed upon small debtors. (b) The debtor had been well known to the dentist for some years, and the latter had not even rendered his account for the service when he unfortunately had to place his affairs in the hands of a Cape Town attorney, who, at a subsequent date, was appointed sole trustee in the estate. This attorney cum trustee I will call Mr. X. (c) Mr. X. (meaning thereby the plaintiff) is appointed trustee, and in that capacity does not take the slightest trouble in order to collect this debt, nor, one may naturally suppose, any of the others. No, Mr. X., the trustee, having become possessed of the names and addresses of the debtors in the estate, adopted the truly Gilbertian course of gravely instructing himself, as attorney, to write letters of demand to the recalcitrant ones—at 3s. 1d. a time. (d) If Mr. X. incurs legal charges without making any effort at collection as trustee, then many pounds must be lost to the estate in a quite unnecessary way over debtors, whom any ordinary trustee would know perfectly well, it would be waste of time to proceed against. (e) Regarding lawyers who are trustees in insolvent estates, charging 3s. 1d. or 5s. 1d. for demands (a question raised in your issue of the 1st inst.) this is illegal, and any lawyer receiving such a fee (?) would lay himself open to a criminal charge of theft of money by means of false pretences. Similarly no attorney is entitled to demand 3s. 1d. when demanding a debt. Debtors should not be bluffed. (f) Attorneys here, however, go one better; besides demanding 5s. 1d. for the demand, they also claim 10 per cent. of the debt from the debtor, who is generally a simpleton and pays up. The attorney then draws another 10 per cent. from his client, the creditor. So on a debt of £10 he will demand from the debtor £11 5s. 1d., which he will probably get, and then he will pay over to his client £9, so on this £10 account the attorney has made £2 5s. 1d. This is simply nothing less than obtaining money under false pretences. (g) No wonder these sharks grow rich. But what can the public expect as long as they allow such a thing as the Incorporated Law Society to exist, which is only run for the benefit of a few attorneys in Cape Town."

Plaintiff craves leave to refer to the whole of the said article and letter which are annexed hereto, marked "A."

9. Plaintiff says that the said statements were intended by the defendants to apply to him (the plaintiff) and that they did so apply and were generally understood so to apply, and that by the said statements defendants meant to imply and did imply, that plaintiff had been guilty of unprofessional conduct and of making extortionate charges, that he had acted illegally, that he had been negligent and careless in the discharge of his duties as trustee, that he had laid himself open to criminal charge, and that his conduct as an attorney was such that the Incorporated Law Society ought to take cognisance thereof and make application for the removal of plaintiff's name from the roll of attorneys.

10. By reason of the said false, scandalous, malicious, and libellous statements, plaintiff has suffered loss and damages to his professional character and reputation in the sum of £5,000 etq., for which the defendants are jointly and severally liable, but defendants refuse or neglect to pay the said sum or any part thereof.

Wherefore plaintiff claims from the defendants jointly and severally, or from one or other of them: (a) The sum of £5,000 etq.; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

Defendants' plea was as follows:

1. The defendants admit paragraph 1 down to the words "Cape Town," save that the first defendant admits that plaintiff was appointed sole trustee in the estate of one Alfred Field, the defendants have no knowledge of the allegations in the remainder of the said paragraph.

2. Paragraph 2 is admitted.

3. The first defendant admits paragraphs 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7. The second and third defendants have no knowledge of the allegations therein contained.

It is admitted that the issue of the "South African Review" dated the 15th day of March, 1907, the first defendant wrote and caused to be published, the second defendant printed, and the third defendant published an article and a letter containing, inter alia, the words set out in (a) to (g) of the said paragraph inclusive! The defendants crave leave to refer to the whole of the said article and of the said letter when produced at the trial. Save as above the defendants deny the allegations in paragraph 8.

5. The defendants say that the whole of the said article in so far as it consists of allegations of fact is true in substance, and in fact, and in so far as it consists of comment is fair and bona fide comment upon a matter of public importance, and that the said article was written, printed, and published without malice, and in the public interest.

6. As to the said letter, the defendants say that the said letter was written and published as a reply by the said Luit to the following inquiry, which was published in the issue of the "South African Review," dated March 1, 1907, to wit:

"Whilst on this subject, I would like to ask if a law agent or an attorney, who is also a trustee, is entitled to demand legal fees for collecting accounts in the latter capacity, which would not be charged by ordinary trustees; and did not and was not meant to apply to the plaintiff. The said letter was printed and published without malice, and in the public interest, and was fair and bona fide comment upon a matter of public importance."

7. The defendants deny the allegations in paragraphs 9 and 10 as specifically as if herein set out.

Wherefore the defendants pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Dr. Greer), for plaintiff. Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Pohl) for defendant.

Alfred Field, dentist, of Cape Town, stated he had known the plaintiff, who had acted as his attorney for some time past. In January last, witness's affairs were in a troublesome way, and among the debts he gave the plaintiff to collect was one for a guinea, which was due by one Tewson. Witness sent out his accounts every month, and Tewson would receive his. On the 19th January, witness surrendered his estate. Witness saw the article in the "South African Review" on March 15, referring to "attorney cum trustee, Mr. X." As he was the only insolvent dentist in Cape Town he had no hesitation in saying that it referred to his case. He took the letter and the article to be one and the same thing.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He had known Tewson for several years, and witness believed he sent him an account for the amount in question. Witness was worried at the time on the account of the state of his affairs. The account was sent to Tewson somewhere at Green Point.

You recognised at once that Mr. X. was Mr. Brady?—Yes.

And, of course, you knew all the circumstances of the case?—Yes.

John Gabriel, dentist, of Cape Town, stated the plaintiff had acted as his attorney in various matters for many years. Witness had no difficulty in recognising that the article referred to Mr. Brady, as he knew of no other dentist insolvent in Cape Town. Witness naturally connected the letter with the article. After reading the article he expressed his surprise to plaintiff at what he thought was an exorbitant charge. The plaintiff assured him he would take steps to alter witness's opinion.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He took the article to refer to the plaintiff, and the letter of Lujt to be connected with it.

Abraham Berlyn, another dentist, who knew both the plaintiff and Field for some time, stated he had read the article in the "S.A. Review," and he knew it must refer to the plaintiff. He took it the letter had been placed in its position deliberately to substantiate the article. Witness had a small claim in the estate, and did not prove, as he thought the plaintiff would get the pickings by piling up bills of costs.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The first thing that struck him after reading the article was that Mr. Brady was making charges that he was not entitled to, and the heading "Illegal Charges" contributed to that belief.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The letter appeared to him to corroborate what had been written in the previous article. He did not prove his claim on the advice of the plaintiff, which proved to be correct, that no dividend would be paid to concurrent creditors.

[Maasdorp, J.: What did you think of the charge £1 5s. 1d. for collecting a guinea?—Well, I thought if it was not absolutely legal it was unfair.

John Aloysius Carroll, messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court, said he received his correct fee of nine shillings for the service of the summons at Tewson's place.

Jacob P. Brink, a clerk in the Insolvent Branch of the Master's Office, produced the record in the insolvent estate of A. Field.

Alfred N. Foot stated that the plaintiff suggested to witness that he should take the trusteeship of the estate, but he declined. It was well known among business men that the plaintiff was the trustee in the estate. He knew of no other dentist in Cape Town being insolvent. His attention was drawn to the article in question, and he thought it referred to the plaintiff.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The invariable practice was for the trustee himself to endeavour to collect the debts, but failing that, he generally employed the attorney who was connected with the estate. Attorneys locally did not usually seek trusteeships.

Christopher Brady, plaintiff, stated that for some time prior to the beginning of this year he had been acting as Field's attorney. Among the claims handed to witness to collect, was one for a guinea from Tewson. On the 11th January, witness sent a letter of demand to Tewson, but received no reply. If the guinea had been paid there would have been to charge to the debtor, he would have got his commission upon collection. When summons had been issued, he brought up a charge of 3s. 1d. for the letter. Witness wrote another letter to Tewson in his capacity as trustee in the estate of Field. It was all nonsense that he proceeded as trustee to send out letters of demand at the rate of 3s. 1d. a time. No one had been charged in respect of these letters. It was absolutely false that he, as trustee, took no trouble to collect the debts. Mr. Field's assets amounted to £84. They consisted of his office furniture, which he assessed at £70, and upon which witness realised £60, and there were a list of debts of about £14, of which witness collected £9 9s., including Tewson's guinea. There was £2 disputed, and abandoned, as witness was satisfied it had been paid. There was another pound which was looked upon as a bad debt, and a couple of pounds more were abandoned. The money was put into the estate, and witness got his commission paid. On the 15th February, Tewson was summoned, and on the 19th he sent a messenger with the guinea. Witness accepted the guinea, and wrote back that he would have to pay the costs, or application would be made to the Court. On the morning of the 22nd February, the morning of the trial, Tewson paid the bill of costs, which amounted to £1 5s. 1d. Witness explained that Tewson could have the bill taxed. The charges were all according to the Magistrate's Court tariff. In a letter witness inadvertently used the word "where" instead of "were," and the same mistake appeared in the "Review." Several of his friends called his attention to the article.

Palmer admitted to plaintiff it was Tewson who wrote the article, and if he (Palmer) did not accept it, the "Owl" would. Palmer said: "I haven't mentioned your name." I said: "Everybody knows Mr. X. is Mr. Brady." Palmer then said he would see what could be done in the matter. Witness said he would want full reparation. As nothing was done, witness issued a summons. Witness had acted as trustee in other estates. He did not covet the position.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He would swear positively that the letter of demand for which he charged in his bill of costs was the letter written on the 11th January as attorney for Field. He said nothing whatever of legal proceedings in his letter of demand on 11th January. He thought he put it in a polite way, but, in a subsequent letter, he threatened legal proceedings, as the trustee. On the 11th February he sent out a similar letter to every debtor in the estate.

Four days afterwards you sent a summons to Mr. Tewson?—Yes.

To every other debtor in the estate?—No.

Continuing, witness read several paragraphs in the publication, which he characterised as deliberately false. The costs of recovering nothing from Cato cost 14s.

If you wrote a letter to Cato in similar terms to that which you wrote to Tewson before your appointment as trustee, and that was a letter of demand, why did you not charge it in Cato's bill of costs?—If it is not there it should have been. If it has not been allowed, I cannot help that.

Proceeding, witness said it was a mistake that the 3s. 1d. had not been charged in the bill of costs submitted to the Master, although it appeared in witness's draft bill. The whole of the letter from beginning to end was a libel on witness. Until a summons was issued, an attorney could not charge the 3s. 1d. After summons, it became part of the bill of costs.

"But what can the public expect as long as they allow such a thing as the Incorporated Law Society to exist, which is only run for the benefit of a few attorneys in Cape Town?" That doesn't apply to you, Mr. Brady?—No.

Why should Mr. Palmer libel you when you were on friendly terms?—I think it was put in to enhance the sale of his paper. He had done the same in other matters, and witness had forced him to apologise.

You are referring to the case of the racehorse with that extraordinary name Ceyx?—Yes.

As a matter of fact, what the "Review" published was taken over from another paper in Johannesburg, the "Critic," about the horse being pulled?—Yes, but the "Review" added their own observations to it.

Yes, and they apologised?—Yes.

Without going into the merits of that case, the notice of suspension appeared in the Official Calendar?—I do not know that.

Have you found out how many summonses you issued?—Yes, three.

Who was the other to?—Mr. French.

You recovered the capital and the costs?—Yes.

And there you charged 3s. 1d.?—Yes.

That amount would not be in the Master's eye?—It was not necessary.

It was a letter of demand before insolvency?—Yes.

You met Mr. Palmer in the street, and he went to your office with you?—Yes.

You complained about this article to him?—Yes, as soon as I met him.

When?—A few days after it appeared, which was some considerable time before he put the explanation in the "Review."

He told you then he had no intention of libelling you at all?—He said he had no intention of referring to me in particular.

What did you want? £5,000?—I did not tell him so.

What did you mean him to do?—I think at the least he should have given me an ample apology. He never offered it.

Anything else?—I think he ought to have compensated me.

Also a little money as well as an apology?—Exactly; I think he was making a profit by doing that sort of thing, and I think he ought to be penalised for it.

Mr. Palmer said he was quite prepared to put in an explanatory paragraph?—Yes.

Nothing but an apology and a little money?—I did not even say so.

And then you told Mr. Palmer that an explanatory paragraph would not do, but that you were determined to issue a summons?—I do not think so.

Now, you know what took place?—I do not remember saying I should issue a summons.

Will you deny you said that?—I deny I said I would issue summons there and then.

What did you say?—That I would take action unless I was satisfied.

You are not satisfied with that explanatory article?—No.

What more do you want than that article and explanation?—I wanted a proper apology.

I, Alfred Palmer, do hereby apologise to Christopher Brady, attorney-at-law, and so on?—Not in such a dramatic fashion, Mr. Upington.

W. E. Moore, attorney, of Cape Town, who has been in practice for fifty-four years, stated that he had known the plaintiff in business. Witness read the article in the "Review," and he read the letter, which he took to be in support of the former publication.

If that conduct imputed in the article were true, would you say as president of the Law Society that it would form conduct for which they would take steps against him?—I take it the Council would call upon Mr. Brady for an explanation, and then, if not satisfied, they would move the Court to have the attorney struck off the roll, or such other order as the Court might see fit to grant.

Continuing, witness said that generally speaking, he looked upon the tone of the article as a reflection upon the conduct of the attorney.

Can you, as a witness, point out any particular part of the statement you have in mind?—I can only take it as a whole, because it charges him in the dual capacity of trustee and attorney with making charges he was not entitled to.

John Robert Lancaster, president of the Law Agents' Association, who read the article casually, stated that he took it to be an attack upon somebody. The first man witness met in the street told him who it was. Witness treated the article as a serious imputation upon the plaintiff that he was extracting charges he could not extract.

Wm. W. Brady, son of the plaintiff, also gave evidence.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Harry Sinclair Tewson said he wrote the article in question, which was sub-edited by Mr. Palmer. Witness had put in Mr. Brady's name in the article, but the letter "X" was substituted. In January last year he received a letter from Brady with regard to Field's account, but he did not regard it as a letter of demand, and told his wife when she was in town to settle with Field himself. Witness received a further letter from the plaintiff when he was trustee in the estate, and when he got the summons he sent a guinea to the plaintiff. The guinea was paid, and witness subsequently sent a small boy with five shillings to pay for the summons. The boy returned with a bill for £1 5s. 1d., and said that Mr. Brady said that the tender was ridiculous. Witness paid the full amount to save any further bother. A week or so afterwards he contributed this experience in this matter to the "Review," and what appeared there was to the best of his knowledge and belief true. There was only one letter of demand, and that was the one signed by the plaintiff as trustee. The original heading to the article was "A Warning To Small Debtors." Apart from this matter of the guinea debt, he had very little to do with the plaintiff. He was not actuated by any ill-will towards the plaintiff.

What was the object in writing this article?—I wanted something to do on Sunday afternoon, and there was some amusement, and profit in it.

What was the profit in it?—A guinea, as a rule.

What is the moral of this article, if I may put it to you as author?—Pay up.

Continuing, witness said in writing the article he had no doubt Mr. Brady was charging 3s. 1d. for the letter of February 11, and so witness wrote in the article that the plaintiff did nothing as trustee.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He objected in the first place to the bill because he was under the opinion that the trustee could not charge for sending the letter of demand.

Is that the only thing?—I objected to pay the messenger's fee for service when the fee was not known.

Did you object to pay this amount of nine shillings?—I wanted to settle the whole thing up.

Do you still object to the 3s. 1d.?—I do now.

Why now?—Because he now says he charged it as trustee.

That is just what he does not say?—He said he wrote the letter as trustee.

Proceeding, witness said he received no account from Field. Witness did not suggest that the plaintiff made any illegal charges, and he did not put a heading on the article to that effect.

Alfred Palmer, proprietor and editor, of the "South African Review," stated he took a considerable interest in the Small Debts Recovery Act, which was recently passed. He had written, or caused to be inserted in his paper, certain articles dealing with the recovery of small debts. He had known Mr. Tewson for some time, and had known him to be a reliable man as a contributor to the "Review." The letter headed "A Solicitor's Testimony," came to hand the day after he received Mr. Tewson's article. His object in publishing the article was to call attention primarily to the undesirability of attorneys acting as trustees, and, secondly, to call attention to the same old subject of heavy legal charges on small debts. The plaintiff's name appeared in the manuscript, and witness excised it, and substituted "X." He had no animosity against the plaintiff, who was good enough for a few weeks before to supply witness with information about the immigration Department. Witness satisfied himself that the article in question was not libellous. He put the headings on the article.

What is the heading "Illegal Charges by Attorneys" intended to refer to?—It refers to the letter of Mr. Lujt.

Continuing, witness said when he met the plaintiff, the latter appeared to be annoyed about the article.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The circumstances set forth in the article and those in the letter were entirely different. He thought it was time somebody should be put in gaol for attempting to extort this infamous 3s. 1d.

Do you still maintain the truth of this statement in this paper of yours?—I certainly do.

"That he was appointed a trustee, and in that capacity he did not take the slightest trouble in order to collect this debt, nor, one may naturally suppose, any of the others.—No, Mr. X., the trustee, having become possessor of the names and addresses of the debtors in the estate, adopted the truly Gilbertian course of gravely instructing himself as attorney, to write letters of demand to the recalcitrant ones—at 3s. 1d. a time." Is that the truth?—It is a fair corollary.

You did not mean to injure Mr. Brady?—No.

You do not expect this would injure this man in his business amongst people who knew the circumstances?—I think the whole tale is one to point out the undesirability of this dual capacity. It is not intended in any way to make an invidious distinction. I wished to point out the anomalous results that follow the dual capacity. I do not think the article called for any reparation at all, but as the plaintiff had done me a favour, I published the subsequent article.

I suppose you give the usual indemnity to your publishers and printers in case of loss by libel?—I believe there is no invidious distinction in the case of the "Review."

Do you give an indemnity to the printers and publishers in case of loss by libel actions?—Yes.

Re-examined by Mr. Uington: His printers and publishers had never had to come in under the indemnity.

Richard John Barry, chief clerk in the Insolvency Branch of the Master's Office, stated it was customary to see what endeavours the trustee had made to recover outstandings before collection was handed over to an attorney. The rule was followed that a trustee should not make any profit out of an estate beyond his ordinary commission.

Mr. Uington closed his case.

Mr. Burton, in his address to the jury, said he supposed they would have little difficulty in saying that the article as it stood was libellous, unless defendants succeeded in establishing their defence that what they said was true and justifiable, and that they were entitled to say this in the public interest. If what the defendant said was true, that his conduct was of this description, then he (Mr. Burton) did not intend to contend that it would not be in the public interest such a matter should be brought to light. Attorneys, like other men, were bound to practise their profession honourably. He did not intend to magnify the damages. The point they had to decide was whether this article was likely to injure a professional man. Law costs, until they had a more Utopian style of things, would continue to be heavy. Whereas prior to 1884 an attorney was not regarded as being a person who was entitled to be a trustee, the Legislature specially passed an Act by which it was made lawful and proper for an attorney to be a trustee. He did not suppose that anyone would be anxious to take this estate for the sake of what could be made out of it, and the jury must remember that the plaintiff collected an unusually large proportion of the outstandings for the benefit of the creditors. The accounts had all been confirmed by the Master, and the matters were all in perfect order. The plaintiff had collected practically everything without a single penny of expense to the estate, with the exception of a small item of 14s., which the Master had passed as correct. In Tewson's case, whether the plaintiff issued the summons himself or employed another attorney to do so, made no difference to the estate. The first defendant in his evidence adhered to the truth of the statement that the plaintiff did not take the slightest trouble to collect these debts, but proceeded to instruct himself to write letters of demand to each of the debtors at 3s. 1d. a time. Was the defendant justified in saying that this statement was true in substance and in fact? Where was the evidence to that effect? It was very far from being a true statement, and the untruth of it was of the greatest possible gravity to Mr. Brady. On the question of costs, counsel referred to Van Zyl in his Judicial Practice (p. 781). Bland v. Trustees, Insolvent Estate Ekstein (Ford's Reports, p. 103). and Bennet and Webster v. Kotze's Trustee (6, Juta, 317). Bills of costs were presented every day, in which items were struck out by the Master, although they were presented in all good faith. It was the law, even if a newspaper published a bona-fide and correct report of proceedings, if the headline of the report was not justified by what was contained in the report, there could be an action for libel. Counsel cited the case of Clements v. Lewis (Odgers, p. 26), where a correct report of the proceedings was headed: "Shameful conduct of an Attorney," and that was held to be libellous, and there was another case headed: "How Lawyer 'B'

Treats His Clients." There one true case was established in the article, but, as only one case was proved, damages were awarded. The heading "Illegal Charges by Attorneys," in this case, counsel contended was intended to refer to the statement made in the article, and the letter was placed in its position as a sort of confirmation of what preceded it. In conclusion, counsel urged that the publication was an unjustifiable libel, and for it the defendants were liable for damages.

Mr. Upington said his learned friend had told the jury that Mr. Brady came there to clear his character, but counsel did not think that was the object. It was clear on the evidence of the plaintiff himself that he came to Court to get damages. The motive of the plaintiff was a mercenary and sordid one, and it could be summed up in the word "damages." The point the jury would have to consider here was the right of a journalist to expose what he considered to be public abuses in the public interest, the right of a journalist to comment freely and fearlessly upon facts brought to his notice, so long as that criticism did not degenerate into unfounded abuse. The press was regarded as the very foundation of civil liberty, and it was right that that should be so. Counsel referred to Odgers on Libel (p. 42), and said what the jury would have to decide was whether the relationship between Brady and Tewson as set out in this article was substantially correct. He contended that not one single fact set out there could be seriously disputed. An attempt had been made for the first time, and apparently to the great surprise of the plaintiff's counsel, to establish that the letter for 3s. 1d. was charged as a letter of demand, which was written by Brady as attorney for Field before there ever was a question of Brady being appointed trustee at all. In the plainest possible language Brady told Tewson the letter he wrote on February 11, although not signed as trustee, was written in his capacity as attorney. Had any of the jury ever heard of a lawyer's letter of demand which did not threaten legal proceedings? It was an impossible position for the plaintiff to take up that the first letter he wrote was the letter of demand. He contended that the plaintiff, as trustee, had not stirred a finger to collect the debts before he commenced to send out letters, for which he was going to make legal charges. "Gentlemen," said Mr. Upington, "can you imagine the scene in Mr. Brady's office, as the trustee meets the attorney, and Mr. Brady, the trustee, says: 'Mr. Brady, I have the greatest confidence in you as an attorney. Your knowledge of the law is extensive. Your knowledge of human nature is extensive, and I have the greatest confidence and respect for you. Kindly draw out a power of attorney for me to sue,' and Mr. Brady, the attorney, says to Mr. Brady, the trustee, 'I am very much obliged to you for your complimentary remarks. I will draw out a power of attorney,' which he does, and he thereupon hands to Mr. Brady, the trustee, to which Mr. Brady, the trustee, then affixes his signature, and gravely hands it back to Mr. Brady, the attorney. Gentlemen, is there anything in Gilbert and Sullivan's operas to beat that?" Is there anything more laughable than that? Is that a justifiable comment that Mr. Brady, the attorney, has charged 1s. for drawing the power of attorney to sue." Proceeding, counsel said the hardship entailed upon the small debtor was a matter to which public attention should be directed, in the interest of the small debtor. The plaintiff had only the right to recover on behalf of the estate by way of costs from Tewson, the costs to which the estate was lawfully put, and if it was a fact that Brady had no right to charge more than his actual out-of-pocket expenses, then all that Mr. Tewson was liable to pay was this amount. The subject was one of great public interest, and this particular case was an illustration of the general principle. If a journalist could not render such a public service without being mulcted in damages, then to talk about the liberty of the press was to talk about a thing which was non-existent. The plaintiff had no wounded soul to soothe or assuage, and the only balm that could assuage Mr. Brady's wounds was golden balm, and he hoped the jury would make a striking illustration to the plaintiff of the ease of going out to gather wool and coming back shorn.

Maasdorp, J.: After the very exhaustive arguments which we have had from counsel, I think the issues of the case have become pretty clear to you. You know pretty well now all the points which are to be decided, and I think you will also find that a little application of common sense will enable you very readily to dispose of the points one way or another. The whole of this case depends upon the contents of this article, which appeared in the journal of the defendant Palmer. This article is partly serious and partly humorous. As far as its fun is concerned, it may be considered to be a little too prolix and long drawn out, but the result is that you have a long article which forms a very big text to make discourses upon, and the result has been that you have had discourses in due proportion; not undue proportion. But the effect upon your mind in consequence of all this, I am rather afraid, may be this: that you have come to think that you are here to-day with a case of very vast and intricate issues; that there are important matters which will require the exercise of large intellectual powers to decide. Now I think, gentlemen, it is nothing of the kind. The case is in a small compass in so far as the facts are concerned, and so far as its consideration is concerned it is a matter of pure common sense, as I have said before.

The plaintiff complains that an article has been written about him, for which the defendants are responsible, which implies that he has been guilty of unprofessional conduct, and making extortionate charges, that he has acted illegally, and been negligent and careless in the discharge of his duties as trustee. He says that it is implied that there is illegality in his charges, that his charges are too large, and if to some extent legal, nevertheless extortionate. Then, further, it is imputed that he has been negligent in his duties as trustee. He says that these imputations are false, consequently that a libel has been perpetrated, for which he is entitled to claim £5,000 damages. That is the complaint, and you are to decide if the complaint is a just one.

In the first place you have to consider whether it has been proved that this article refers to Mr. Brady. Mr. Tewson wrote about Mr. Brady by name when he sent this article to Mr. Palmer. The article contained Brady's name, so that Mr. Palmer knew to whom it referred. When he adopted the article he substituted the letter "X" instead of the name. In his mind that letter "X" referred to Mr. Brady. Well, when this letter was published it was seen by parties acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and they immediately applied it to Mr. Brady. Now, I leave it to you to say whether it was intended to apply to Mr. Brady, and did it, in the minds of the people acquainted with the circumstances, apply to him? That is a point which you have to dispose of.

Now the question arises as to whether it is a libel upon Mr. Brady. One thing you must guard yourselves against. You will observe how the article affected the minds of some of the witnesses. Here is an article referring, say, to Mr. Brady in his conduct as an attorney, and immediately the conclusion is come to by those who read the article: "Here is an attack upon Mr. Brady." Mr. Moore, amongst others, said to you that he considered it an attack upon Mr. Brady. He was asked to point out what exactly this attack was, which particular part was a reflection upon the character of Mr. Brady. Well, he could not point out any particular sentence as being such a reflection. He regarded it as a reflection, an imputation, and an attack upon Mr. Brady. You see how naturally that arises in a person's mind. Supposing any writer to a public print takes up a case, a special case, one which he has a right to take up, say a case which has appeared in Court, and makes comments upon that case as reflecting upon a certain individual. The first thing that would strike anyone reading those comments would seem to be that there is an attack upon the individual. It need not necessarily be so. It is for you to decide whether this is an attack, a libellous attack, upon Mr. Brady. A writer in a public print would be perfectly justified in making use of a case which has been tried in Court, or of matters in which a public character is interested, and he may make fair comments upon that case. Even if those fair comments were damaging, still, he would be justified in making those comments.

Now, Mr. Brady, in this particular case, is an attorney of this Court, and acted in the capacity of trustee, consequently he acted in a capacity in which the public have a right to see that the duties are properly performed. But also guard yourselves against this: A man may make fair comments in a reasonable way about a case in the interest of the public, and in so far would be justified; but if you could detect behind that something more, that is to say, malice, and intention of bringing forward that case merely to injure the individual, the justification would be gone.

The simple function which you, as a jury, have to perform, is to say whether there is fair comment in this article upon the circumstances, which, in the wording of it, conveys to your minds the idea that the writer was attempting to expose an abuse, or whether, under the cloak of privilege, he was trying to injure maliciously his fellow-citizen.

The defendant Palmer admits that he published this article, but he says it is a fair comment upon the facts which actually took place. Now, are the facts proved? I leave it in your hands. It has been so largely commented upon that I may safely leave you to consider whether the facts are proved. The facts are then these: That Brady, as trustee, had the administration of an estate in which it was necessary to collect certain debts; that for the purpose of collecting those debts he acted as attorney to institute proceedings against the debtors; and his bill of costs was produced and is put before you. The whole facts of the case hinge upon the joint capacity of trustee and attorney, and the bill of costs resulting. It is alleged to be a large bill of costs, the necessity for which might have been obviated if Mr. Brady had acted as trustee and not as attorney. The comment is that the costs are too high, considering the smallness of the debt. The further comment is that Mr. Brady was negligent in his duty as trustee, not as an attorney. These are the main charges in this article.

I must first direct your attention to the bill of costs that came under the consideration of the writer who wrote with reference to the hardships upon what he calls "small debtors." He says that a guinea had to be collected, and the costs for this collection amounted to £1 5s. 1d., and the way the writer refers to these charges in the article, the defendants contend, to be fair comment, and it is for you to decide whether it is fair comment or not. The charge was certainly made, and the debt was only a guinea. He writes: "I do not doubt for a moment that Mr. X had every legal right to do as he did in this case; namely, to hand the matter over to himself as his own attorney at the outset. But I think the creditors in the estate would be justified in asking what Mr. X has done in his capacity as trustee before running up law costs amounting to 25s. for a paltry debt of one guinea." As that is really the central feature of this case, I will direct my remarks first to that point, and after that has been disposed of, there is very little more to be said. Was the writer justified in saying that the trustee had not used sufficient diligence before he instituted legal proceedings? The circumstances which the writer of the article had in mind were these: He found that a letter of demand was promptly sent by the plaintiff, acting as attorney as he thought. The attorney's letter of demand being so promptly sent shows this: That the trustee stands aside and does nothing, and it is the attorney who comes forward and takes matters in hand. The writer says that the trustee should have done more. The question is, should he have done more? First as to the question in regard to the letter of demand. At what stage was the case taken out of the hands of the trustee and put into the hands of the attorney? If it was done at too early a stage, you would have the right to say that the trustee should have done more. Should he have instituted proceedings at once? The facts which the writer had before his mind were that Mr. Brady was appointed trustee, and at once a letter was written which in its form was a letter of demand. The writer says: "Here are legal proceedings being instituted by a preliminary letter of demand, written by the attorney, and it is wrong that he should do so, seeing that the trustee should attempt to collect the money without the attorney's letters of demand." It is his duty to do so. Has he done so? Well, we find nothing that Mr. Brady has done, except write a letter of demand. The writer of the article says he wrote it as attorney, and complained that he did not do his duty as trustee before instituting the proceedings, but that as attorney he set about making legal demands before he had made every effort to obtain the money as trustee. What does Mr. Brady say? He says: "When I wrote that letter after I became trustee, it was not as an attorney's letter of demand at all." But how is the writer of the article to know that? The writer had before his mind this demand threatening legal proceedings. He took it to be a demand by the attorney. Mr. Brady says: "No, it was not a demand by me as attorney, it was a demand by me as trustee; I was still working as trustee." Now, how would anybody reading that letter have taken it? Would he have taken it, as the writer of the article did, that the attorney had come up all of a sudden making demands and the trustee was doing no further work? If you say that the writer was justified in thinking that the attorney was now busy, you would consider whether the writer was not correct in saying that the trustee, under the circumstances, was not diligent enough, and was not doing his duty, and that is one of the objections that result when a trustee hands over the business to himself as attorney.

This is really the main point of the case; the charge of negligence on the part of the trustee, of not doing more as trustee before acting as attorney. Mr. Brady says that when he wrote that second letter of demand he was only acting as trustee; he was simply doing his duty as trustee. If you say that is so, you will say that Mr. Brady did use greater endeavours than the writer of the article seemed to imagine. He actually, as trustee, wrote these letters and did his best, and only ultimately came in with his services as attorney. But this is what the writer had before him. The writer in this case I take to be Mr. Tewson, and what Mr. Tewson communicated to Mr. Palmer the latter is responsible for; but in taking the responsibility he also took the information as it appeared to Tewson.

Upon the question as to whether Mr. Brady was acting as attorney or still doing his duty as trustee—which is a question that you must answer for yourselves—he himself says that he was acting as trustee, but at the back of the summons appears these words: "Take notice, that you are required to bring with you and produce at the hearing hereof on Friday, the 22nd February, 1907, letters of demand written and sent to you by the plaintiff's solicitor, bearing dates January 11th and February 11th." Mark you, by "the plaintiff's solicitor." Mr. Brady calls them letters of demand from himself as solicitor. I do not say he might not by an accident have put it that way, but, whatever he explains away now, what he told Tewson was that there were two letters of demand written by him as attorney. In the face of that you will consider whether at the time that Brady dealt with these letters he led Teweon to believe that they were letters of demand written from him as attorney. That will dispose of this point. If you think he sent them as attorney, or rather that his action was such as to justify the writer of that article in thinking that he was acting as attorney instead of acting as trustee, the question is: was he right at such an early stage to begin the work as attorney instead of acting as trustee? That is the point: whether the writer was justified upon the facts before him in saying that costs were being made by Mr. Brady, as attorney, when he should have done the work as trustee. If you think that he took up the matter as attorney, professionally, too early, the writer was justified in saying so. The case hinges also upon another point. The writer had in view, upon the face of the article, that it was inadvisable for attorneys to act as trustees. This is an opinion. It is not a reflection upon anyone. In itself it cannot be considered as a reflection upon Mr. Brady that he acted as a trustee, although some people looking upon this article casually would say it is an attack upon Mr. Brady, because he happens to be an attorney and was acting as trustee. This is the statement made, and there is no charge in that, because it is perfectly legal to say of a man that he has done so. There is nothing wrong in it, because he had a perfect right, as an attorney, to take the position of trustee. Therefore, in that allegation there is no libel, but it may become libellous if there is something behind it which conveys a charge that Mr. Brady, acting in this dual capacity, did something wrong and illegal. There might be such a case, but, on the face of it, it contains no imputation of anything wrong. This is one of the issues raised by the writer. He says it leads to evil consequences in that the attorney begins to take up the business as attorney and making costs before the trustee has done his part of the duty, and, not only this, but it leads to temptation. It seems, to my mind, to be conveyed by this article: "Here is an attorney taking advantage of his position as trustee." If that were so, as a matter of fact, then it would be a very fair comment to make that under the circumstances the attorney might take advantage of this position. The advantage is supposed to be this, that he makes costs and makes a profit out of the estate. The object of the writer seems to be to point out that, under certain conditions, it is a temptation to the attorney not to do his duty as trustee. Now, the idea apparently was that an attorney could legally make these costs. The writer says: "I admit that it is quite legal, but the charges are rather large." The word "extortionate" was not used. Now the question is, and you should dispose of that point also, are the charges legal? The object of the writer seems to be that he wants to check costs being run up for the benefit of attorneys who are trustees in insolvent estates. But the law has been beforehand with this subject, because it has been made a rule that an attorney shall not run up costs for his own benefit, to put money into his own pocket when he acts as trustee for an estate, except under circumstances which do not here exist. There may be circumstances under which the creditors may bestow these rights upon a trustee, but in this case they have not been bestowed. What the effect would be if they had done so it is not necessary for me to say. The creditors authorised Mr. Brady to act as trustee, and he thereupon took upon himself to act as attorney. The law then says this: That if you act as trustee whilst you are an attorney, you will do the work as trustee only; if you manage this estate as attorney and take upon yourself to do certain legal work in connection with this estate as attorney, you shall not charge for that. In England the law is clearly laid down that assignees or trustees in estates shall not, for their own profit, run up costs as attorneys. Such costs are not allowed, and it has been decided time after time that such costs are not legal. Here, as has been pointed out, we have not had any special case in point, but you have heard what the practice is: that such charges are not to be made, and that if an attorney helps an estate with his services as attorney, he does it as trustee and must charge nothing as an attorney. What the writer said in the article was that these charges were legal, but they were incurred rather too early, but, as a matter of fact, whether or not they were incurred too early, there are items in this account which are not allowed, and are known not to be allowed, and consequently they are illegal. I have before me the bill which is filed amongst the papers in the insolvent's estate. In connection with the item "demand and postage"—whether it is a demand made before insolvency or after insolvency, I do not want to go into nice technicalities—it is sufficient that the law will not allow it. Mr. Brady himself says, as you see on the endorsement behind the summons, that he acted in both these demands as attorney for the trustee, and that is the inference that would be before anyone who had to deal with the circumstances of this case before the evidence was given in this Court. Well, there is a demand made for which

3a. 1d. is charged, and the trustee is not allowed to make such a charge. Mr. Tewson has paid that amount. The Master would not have allowed the charge. Then there is the charge for summons—5s. That is another charge which the Master would not allow. The reason is this: these charges the attorney puts into his pocket, and the law says he should have done that work as trustee, and if the trustee is so kind as to put his legal services at the disposal of the estate, the estate will accept the services, but the attorney will not be allowed to charge. It has been pointed out to you that, if another attorney had been appointed, the same charges would have been made, so what difference does it all make? In other words, if, as trustee, Mr. Brady had appointed another attorney, the same charges would have been made, so, consequently, where is the injustice when he himself takes the money. The injustice is based upon the principle that the law will not allow a man to take advantage of his position as a trustee. The law will not allow a trustee to enable himself, in some other capacity, to make a profit out of this work, and that is why it is not allowed. But, as far as costs are concerned, if he pays money out of his own pocket, for the benefit of the estate, he may recover it. Stamps upon the summons he would be entitled to recover. If you consider that the summons should have been issued at all in this case, you may take it that the expenditure on the stamps must be refunded. "Stamps on Power" would be a legal charge. The amount of money which was paid to the messenger for his fees would also be a legal charge. The charge for drawing the bill of costs would not have been allowed. The charge for drawing the "Notice to produce" would not have been allowed. Consequently, gentlemen, you have this bill of costs, which bill was before the writer, and you have to determine whether the writer was fair in saying that Mr. Brady had taken advantage of his position as trustee to enable him to make a profit out of the estate. These are not his words, but that is the implication: that he neglected his duty as trustee and set about making costs as an attorney.

Then much has been said, fairly and properly, as to the application of the words "Illegal charges" at the head of the article. It seems to me that the defendant Palmer was very anxious to escape the application of these words to the article, stating that he used the words "Illegal charges," not as referring to the article at all, but as referring to the letter below it. The question, however, remains: are they not applicable to the conduct of the plaintiff? The words at the head of the article are these: "Illegal charges by attorneys." It is said that these words do not really refer to this article at all. If you believe that, you will not trouble yourself about these words when you deal with the article, but, supposing that you are not satisfied and think that they do embrace the article also, then you will say to yourselves: are they not applicable to the conduct of Mr. Brady? Did he make illegal charges? I have put it to you now how far certain charges are not to be made, and not to be allowed, and that such charges are illegal. It has been suggested to you that, very often in a bill of costs, charges are entered by attorneys honestly thinking that they may recover them: that an attorney may make charges in a bill of costs which, under the circumstances, he is not allowed to charge. Under such circumstances they are struck out of his bill, but he is bona fide under the impression that he ought to get them. If the rule of law is that an attorney who acts himself as trustee, and who has got no power from the creditors to charge as an attorney or to act as an attorney, will not be allowed to make such charges, and if he makes them, he knows he makes charges which the law does not allow, or, rather, he ought to know it, and that he is making illegal charges.

The object of the article is said to be to call attention to the double capacity in which the trustee-attorney acted. They are said to be general remarks as to the inadvisability of this, and, as such, they are perfectly justifiable. But your attention is called to special remarks; special imputations applying to the particular case. You will consider whether these are fair comments justified by the facts, and, under the circumstances, not libellous. First you will inquire what are the facts contained in the article that have actually been proved, and then, having these facts, you will say to yourselves, "What would a man with these facts before him fairly say upon them?" It would be in the interests of the public if a man found that the legal charges made in Court were rather high, to raise the question and say that attorneys and barristers charge fees which are too high, and that the public should be protected against them. Comments such as these would be very fair if there was no malice behind them or no reflections made. As I pointed out to you, supposing a particular case was brought to the notice of anyone who took an interest in those matters, who wrote an article upon it, and names were given there of attorneys and counsel, and all the circumstances of the case, and, we will take it, that it was a fair-minded man who took up the case with the intention of exposing, not dishonesty in the individuals, but only the high charges from which he considered the public must be protected. Suppose, gentlemen, Mr. Jones, an attorney, gets £1,000 in a case, and someone takes up the matter, saying that the public should be protected, and such charges should not be allowed. Any ordinary person reading the article would say it was an attack on this attorney, but you would have to consider, as a jury, whether it was an attack on him, or whether it was an attempt to expose an abuse.

Gentlemen, that disposes of the article itself. The two main points to consider are whether Mr. Brady acted wrongly in charging these fees, and whether he stepped in too soon to act as attorney when he ought to have done more as trustee, and whether when he charged £1 5s. 1d. for collecting a guinea, anyone who became aware of the fact would be right in saying, "These charges are too heavy for collecting such a small sum," and would be right in calling public attention to that. These are the matters for you to consider: whether the facts will bear these comments and whether these comments are fair. Now, as to the more serious imputations conveyed in the letter which follows upon the article. You say that pretty strong language is used in that letter, and again with reference to the letter the first thing you have to consider is: Is there any reference to Mr. Brady? Does that letter refer to Mr. Brady? Well, the writer of the letter in Cradock did not refer to Mr. Brady, so that it is not a case like the article which is complained of where the original writer had in mind the person he was dealing with. The writer in Cradock wrote a general letter upon the abuses to which his attention had been called in a previous article. That previous article is a general reference to trustees charging as attorneys, and there is a request for information, and the writer in Cradock supplies this. The question is: Does it refer to Mr. Brady? Would the public take it to refer to Mr. Brady? You have had two members of the public before you, Mr. Gabriel and Mr. Berlyn. These are the only two gentlemen who have come before you on the point to state whom it referred to, and they state that the article referred to the plaintiff, but not the letter. Now was it intended to apply in fact to Mr. Brady? Upon that point you will take the evidence and consider what reliance you can place upon it. The evidence given is that by Mr. Palmer and he says as a matter of fact: "I swear that it did not refer to Mr. Brady, and I did not intend it to refer to Mr. Brady." That is what he said on oath, but of course, you can accept his statement or not. Is he corroborated by the circumstances? He says that the letter was in answer to an enquiry which had been made beforehand by him in this paper, and at the time the enquiry was made it referred to quite another case that took place in Port Elizabeth. That is a statement upon oath. Of course, no one has appeared to deny that statement, and if you accept it then you have a letter in reference to quite another matter written by a person some distance off who was not at all aware of the circumstances of this particular case. Mr. Palmer has told you that it was merely accidental that these two matters, the article and the letter, were put in together. But the plaintiff says that even this was done to damage him, by conveying an imputation which was not true in fact. He says the letter is bolstering up the article and aiming a blow at him obviously, and to the knowledge of anyone who should read that paper. Well, gentlemen, it is quite possible by such means for a man to commit a libel. It is quite possible by some clever manoeuvre to injure a man, and do it in such a way that you might escape the consequences. But you will consider whether, upon the evidence, that has been attempted. Mr. Palmer says that it was not his object. He says that he takes a great interest in this matter of small debts collecting charges, and had made this enquiry beforehand, and had got this letter from Cradock about the same time that he received Tewson's article, and therefore it happened that they were put in together. Gentlemen, it is a matter which I must leave in your hands. If you find that the letter had no reference to Mr. Brady, and was not put in to damage his character, you will leave it out of account, and you will deal with the article which you may say clearly refers to Mr. Brady, and in regard to that you will say whether the comments were fair and were justified by all the circumstances of the case.

The jury retired, and after an interval of an hour, said that they had, by six to three, agreed on a verdict for the plaintiff, the damages to be £25.

Judgment was entered accordingly.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

PHILIPS AND PECHTER V. } 1907.
RHODIE. } July 4th.

Mr. Gutsche moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

SCHMIDT V. SCHMIDT.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence on a judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court, Wynberg, for £88 1s 1d., with interest on the sum of £100, at 6 per cent., from the 11th May, 1906, and for £2 11s. 10d., taxed costs, and for certain landed property specified to be declared executable.

Defendant handed in an affidavit.

Mr. Van Zyl explained that the defendant in the Resident Magistrate's Court raised a counter-claim, which the Magistrate held was not bona fide. His proper course was to have appealed from the Magistrate's judgment.

De Villiers, C.J. (to defendant): You can bring your action for your counter-claim.

Mr. Van Zyl read the defendant's affidavit. It appeared that he is a farmer, residing on the Claremont Flats, and that the plaintiff is his son. He said that he had a counter-claim against plaintiff for over £200, and he prayed the Court to refuse provisional sentence, and order the plaintiff to go into the principal case.

Defendant (in answer to the Court) said that he intended to proceed with his counter-claim.

Judgment granted, execution to be stayed until the 31st August, to enable defendant to proceed with his counter-claim, defendant in the meantime to be interdicted from selling or transferring the land mentioned on the back of the summons.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan applied for the release from insolvency of James Spence Wilson, of Draaibosch, division of Komgha. Counsel said that the application was made under the 107th section of the Insolvent Ordinance, and the conditions had been fulfilled which were laid down in ex parte Van Broemtsen (12 S.C., 239).

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte KNOX. } 1907.
} July 4th.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan (for petitioner) said he observed that, in his absence yesterday, the Court had been pleased to grant leave to sue by edictal citation at the same time as a rule was granted on the application to sue in forma pauperis. He pointed out that there had been some difficulty in ascertaining the exact whereabouts of respondent, and he had applied for an extension of the return day of the rule until the 1st November. Respondent was believed to be employed at H.M. Dockyard, Devonport, England.

De Villiers, C.J., said that, before making a final order, the Court would want more evidence as to the domicile of respondent.

Mr. Buchanan said that respondent came out to this country to work at Simon's Town, and there met the plaintiff, who was born at Simon's Town, had resided there, was married there, and for a few years lived with her husband there until he deserted her. These points were mentioned when the application for leave to sue in forma pauperis came before the Court.

De Villiers, C.J.: I believe there have been some decisions in the Eastern Districts Court somewhat conflicting with the practice here, and I should like to consult Mr. Justice Buchanan, before whom the application came originally, before giving judgment. I shall consider this question of domicile.

BEARD V. BEARD.

Mr. Swift moved for a decree of divorce in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule made absolute.

Ex parte SMITH.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Ex parte GRAY.

Mr. Gutsche moved for an amendment of petitioner's name in the Debt Registry. Petitioner was described as "Joseph Gray," and he desired to have his full name substituted.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte VAN EYSEN.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved on the petition of the widow for leave to raise a mortgage of £500 on the estate property in order to carry out necessary improvements at a brickfield.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the Master reports unfavourably, and I confess I do not see sufficient ground for overruling the opinion of the Master. The petition contains no statement that there is a demand for bricks, and there is no explanation why the property has been allowed to get into dilapidation, and it appears that the petitioner has sons of age who might help her, probably will help her, if the Court does DENGLER V. KLIBBE.

Execution—Movable and immovable property.

Where in one case execution had been levied upon the movable property of a debtor and a return of nulla bona had been made to the writ, the Court granted leave in a subsequent case to levy execution on the immovable property without first executing on the movables.

Mr. De Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £52 10s., payable at Queen's Town on the 17th January, 1907, for costs advanced, with interest from due date.

Order granted.

Mr. De Villiers also applied for leave to issue execution against the immovable property of defendant, without first levying execution against the movables. Counsel produced a judgment given against defendant in another case, in which a writ had been issued against his movables, and a return of nulla bona had been made.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think this has been done before upon another return of nulla bona. Leave will be granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

STANDARD BANK OF SOUTH AFRICA V. PHILIPS. 1907.
July 5th.

Mr. De Villiers moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £1,689, with interest at 7 per cent. from the 1st January, 1907, being the amount of a certain overdrawn current account, and for the property specially hypothecated under a certain deed as security to the aforesaid claim, to the extent of £1,600, to be declared executable. Personal service had been effected, but defendant did not appear.

Order granted.

BERGMANN V. FERREIRA.

Summons—Amendment.

The defendant, Jan Hendrick Ferreira, accepted service of a summons against Pieter Ferreira for the price of certain cattle seized by him, and, it being clear that the defendant was the person intended to be sued, the Court allowed an amendment of the summons from Pieter to Jan Hendrick.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £73 2s. 6d., due to plaintiff by defendant, being value of certain clothing, foodstuffs, and other articles of general merchandise taken from plaintiff's store at Karoo, Upington, by defendant on or about the 12th November, 1906, with interest and costs of suit. There was also a prayer for damages, but counsel intimated that he did not ask for judgment thereunder. He added that he had to apply for an amendment of the defendant's name which should not be Pieter Ferreira, as stated in the summons, but Jan Hendrick Ferreira, who had been served personally and had accepted service.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Sheriff's return is that service has been made upon Pieter Ferreira.]

Mr. Jones said that he had been briefed with a copy of an affidavit by the Sheriff's officer, but he had been unable to obtain the original signed by the Sheriff's officer before coming into Court.

The matter was ordered to stand over pending production of an affidavit of service upon Jan Hendrick Ferreira.

Postea (July 8th).

Mr. Jones read an affidavit by F. W. Herbert, an officer of the Deputy Sheriff, who said that he served the summons on defendant on the 22nd June. The defendant's correct name was Jan Hendrick Ferreira, the leader of the Ferreira raiders. Among the Ferreira raid prisoners at the Breakwater Convict Station, there was no one bearing the name of Pieter Ferreira.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Your summons is against Pieter Ferreira. Has an amended summons been served upon defendant?]

Mr. Jones: No. The affidavit was put in to show the identity of the individual against whom we are taking action.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How can the Deputy Sheriff say? How does he know?]

Mr. Jones: The position is that the whole of the goods were said to have been taken by the Ferreira raiders, of whom Jan Hendrick Ferreira was the leader. We are suing him, and by some mistake he is described in the summons as Pieter Ferreira.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Were there not two Ferreras in that raid?]

Mr. Jones: Yes, but they say there is not one bearing the name of Pieter Ferreira at the Breakwater Convict Station, and it is really the leader of the raid whom we are suing.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You don't ask for damages?]

Mr. Jones: No, the third prayer of the summons is withdrawn.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In strictness, there should be service of an amended summons upon Jan Hendrick Ferreira, because the summons is against Pieter Ferreira, and that is the only summons served upon him.]

Mr. Jones: Amendments have been allowed, for the matter has been discussed by your lordship in De Stadler v. Morris (9 Juta, 480).

[De Villiers, C.J.: The summons will have to be amended before judgment is given.]

Mr. Jones said that he had asked for an amendment on Friday last.

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears that really unnecessary expenses will be caused by fresh service, because it is quite clear that there is no other person likely to be liable, so that the Court will order the amendment by altering the name of Pieter Ferreira to Jan Hendrick Ferreira, and give judgment as prayed, except for damages.

WOODSTOCK MUNICIPALITY V. BETTINGTON.

Dr. Greer moved for judgment, under Rule 319, for £58 15s., balance of owner's rates, £9 10s., water charges, 9s. 10d., sanitary charges, £1, balcony rents, and £11 10s., street construction rates, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Defendant appeared in person, and said that he wished the Court to remove the bar so that he could plead to the claim. He explained that he had been busily engaged in another case in this Court recently, and he had had his hands full.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What would your defence be?]

Defendant: I dispute the rates.
[De Villiers, C.J.: You mean that they had no right to impose these rates?—That they were unjust rates.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: In what sense?—They are heavy charges, and the Municipality are not entitled to what they have charged.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: Not authorised by the Act?—Yes.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: You must consider whether it is worth while throwing good money after bad. What other case were you in?—I was in the action of Bettington v. Scott.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: You have not produced an affidavit of merits?—I am not acquainted with the procedure of the Court.]

Dr. Greer said he was instructed that the Municipality did not wish to be unduly hard upon the defendant, but it seemed difficult to understand what possible defence he could have to this action, and it might be in the defendant's own interests not to allow bar to be removed.

Defendant: It is a case of sending the ratepayers into bankruptcy, or fighting the Council. If they are not compelled to lower their rates, it means that the ratepayers are thrown into bankruptcy.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no doubt that the rates are becoming almost ruinous.]

Defendant: Well, then your lordship, it is best to fight it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But the Legislature has given the Municipality these powers.]

Defendant: There is a provision that the properties shall be valued at what they are worth.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Properties are valued, and you have a right to object to the valuations.]

Defendant: Last year, instead of lowering the valuations, they said they could not lower the rates owing to the bond-holders. Why should they be afraid of the bond-holders? It might look as if I were throwing my head against a brick wall, but I think the brick wall is very rotten, and that my head will go through.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Parties are generally very sanguine, and I am afraid the wall will be too much for you in this case.]

Defendant: Never mind, your lordship; I will chance it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you got means to defend the action?]

Defendant: That will depend on the result of the other case. If the other case goes against me, then it won't matter. Replying to further questions, defendant said that he would file an affidavit of merits if he were given an opportunity.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You have had ample time, and you have failed to comply with the rules of Court.]

Defendant (replying to another question) said that he did not make an offer of any portion of the claim.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The summons in this case was issued so far back as the 22nd May, the declaration was served on the 22nd June, and on the 1st July defendant was served with notice demanding plea, and he failed to file his plea, and now, when the case is all ready for judgment, he comes into court and says he wants time. Now, time can only be given upon an affidavit of merits, and other sufficient ground, to the satisfaction of the Court. That is not provided here.]

Defendant (interposing): I must see a legal adviser on those points.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But it is too late, and I think the truest kindness to you is to give judgment, because it will only be a waste of time to remove bar.]

Defendant again interrupted his lordship, and said that he disputed several of the amounts. He found fault with the charge of £11 10s. for street construction works, but he was unable to tell the Court how much he thought he was really liable for.

Dr. Greer said that the charges claimed went back a couple of years.

Defendant: I think it will be best for your lordship to pass sentence, and let the property be sold. I ask for no mercy whatever from the Woodstock Municipality, which refuses relief in cases of distress.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Judgment will be granted. I think, however, some of these rates are almost ruinous.]

Dr. Greer: That may be so, but still in the special case —

[De Villiers, C.J.: Unfortunately, very large powers are conferred upon these Municipalities by Statute, but it has reached a pitch now that the ratepayers, many of them, will be wholly unable to pay.]

Dr. Greer: One felt a certain amount of sympathy for the defendant, but with regard to this special case one feels that no defence could be set up.

Judgment as prayed.

Order granted as prayed.

FITZGERALD V. ARGUS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO., LTD.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for leave to the applicant to prosecute an appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment given by the Eastern Districts Court in an appeal brought by the present applicant against the present respondents.

Counsel stated that notice of appeal was given in due time, but owing to delay caused by pressure of work in the Eastern Districts Court, the record did not finally reach the Registrar of the Supreme Court in sufficient time to enable the case to be set down before three months had elapsed. Notice of appeal was given on the 7th March, and the record did not reach the Supreme Court until the 15th June. Counsel referred to the 23rd section of Act 35, 1896.

Leave granted, case to be set down for the first Monday in August.

Ex parte ESTATE BIGGE.

Mr. M. Bisset applied for an amendment of an order granted by the Court in this matter on Thursday. The Court had appointed a curator ad litem in certain lunacy proceedings, and made the summons returnable for the 2nd August. Counsel now applied for the return day to be fixed for the 12th July.

An order was made accordingly.

Ex parte PATERSON AND CO.

Mr. Roux moved, as a matter of urgency for the appointment of Gerald D'Arcy Orpen as provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Harry H. Scowen, carrying on business as a hotelkeeper at Muizenberg, with power to carry on the business pending the election of a trustee.

Order granted.

Servitude — Registration — Servient tenement — Conditions of sale.

In 1852 the predecessors in title of the applicants sold a portion of the estate in lots for ever, one of the conditions of sale being that the purchasers shall have the right of bringing the water from the springs, provided that they make a proper dam and enter a pipe two feet above the bottom of the dam. The servitude was registered in the title deeds of the purchasers, but not in that of the sellers. After having failed for 55 years to give effect to the servitude, the respondents being ex-holders, proceeded to construct a dam for the purpose of leading out the water in terms of the servitude.

Held, that the respondents should be interdicted from proceeding with the work unless and until they have obtained a registration of the servitude as against the title deeds of the applicants.

This was an application to make absolute a certain rule nisi restraining the respondents from trespassing on the applicants' farm The Fountains, situate at Jeffreys Bay, Humansdorp.

The applicants were Magdalena J. Swart, Mimmie E. Swart, Cornelia H. Swart, of Humansdorp, and Matthys G. Swart, of Adelaide, who, along with two or three others, were owners of the farm The Fountains, which was bequeathed to them by their parents. In their petition, they said that they held clear titles, with no servitude registered against their title deeds. The respondents claimed the springs on the farm, and had gone on the farm, and started works for the purpose of taking water from the property. Respondents had been warned to desist, but they persisted in their acts.

From the affidavits filed by respondents, it seemed that certain five owners of the farm Zeekoe River and Klein Zeekoe River had in 1853 laid out a township at Jeffreys Bay, and had then sold certain erven, on condition that the purchasers should have the right of bringing the water from the springs, provided that they made a proper dam and entered a pipe 2 ft. above the bottom of the dam. This condition was registered with the transfer deeds of the erf-holders. There were no other springs from which water could be brought to Jeffreys Bay. About that time the erf-holders had no money with which to construct works. After that, the then holder of the farm made an opstal at the springs, and built a house, and called it The Fountains. The farm was partitioned, and eventually bequeathed to petitioners. Since the sale all the occupants of the erven at Jeffreys Bay had obtained their water at the springs.

In reply, the petitioners said that the conditions of sale were not attached to the title-deeds of the sellers. There was nothing to show what springs were meant, as there were many springs on the farms held by the sellers, some of which were nearer the township than those now claimed. Shortly after the sale one of the sellers built a house, and also made an orchard and garden on the springs in question. On the 31st December, 1868, the farms were partitioned, and a portion was cut off and transferred to the trustees. No mention was made of the servitude claimed in any of the deeds then passed. Applicants' grandfather subsequently acquired a portion of what was then known as The Fountains, for valuable consideration. Their father subsequently acquired more of it by exchange, and an amended title was issued in 1899, after due notice, and no reference was made to any water rights in favour of the respondents. Originally forty lots were laid out and only 22 were sold, and the remaining 18 were sold in 1902 by Frederick Human, who was one of the original sellers, and no mention was then made of the alleged servitude. None of the inhabitants of Jeffreys Bay took water as of right.

Mr. Roux was for applicants; Mr. Benjamin, K.C., appeared for respondents (Pieter L. Swart and Isaac Newton) to show cause against the rule being made absolute.

Mr. Benjamin argued that the persons who had succeeded to this property were the descendants of the original grantors, and that, as such, the servitude would be binding upon them. The original grantors laid out certain erven in connection with their property, and those erven were subject to certain conditions. Those conditions were attached, possibly by inadvertence, to the title deeds of the purchasers, not to the title deeds of the vendors, so that the purchasers and their successors in title would have come into these erven with knowledge of the fact that this servitude had been originally granted. He argued that the servitude would be binding upon the owners of the servient tenements, and quoted Judd v. Fourie (2 E.D.C., 41), Burge, 3, 437, Voet, 8, 1, 6, and Jansen v. Fincham (9 S.C., 239).

Mr. Roux said he admitted that if his clients were universal successors, then it was not necessary that there should be registration of the servitude, but he did not admit that they were universal successors. Their predecessors in title had given valuable consideration. The servitude had been lost by non-user per modum et tempus. A servitude might be obtained by grant, by prescription, or by a decree of Court, but in the present case none of these requisites had been fulfilled. If the conditions of sale imposed a servitude against the springs, which he did not admit, then respondents had lost it because they had not built the dam and laid the pipe within thirty years afterwards. Furthermore, he did not admit that the applicants' springs were referred to, as there were other springs. If there were a servitude, it was a servitude in favour of individual erf-holders, and the trustees as such had no locus standi. In any case, they should bring a declaratory action to enforce the rights. Counsel quoted Grotius, 2, 37, 7, Voet on Servitude (8, 6, 7, and 8, 6, 9), Van der Linden I., 11, 4, Edmeades v. Scheepers and Edmeades v. Mostert (1 S.C., 334), Brawn v. Powrie (20 S.C., 476), Steele v. Thompson (13 Moore's P.C. Cases, 260), and Maas-dorp's Institutes (vol. 2, p. 204).

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case application is made to have a rule nisi granted by my brother Hopley made absolute. The petitioners are owners of a farm called the Fountains, in the Humansdorp district, and on that farm there is a spring from which the respondents now claim the right to lead water by means of pipes to a watering place called Jeffreys Bay. This right is claimed by the respondents by virtue of certain conditions of sale made on the 21st January, 1852, the 11th condition being the following: "The purchasers shall have the right of bringing the water from the springs, provided that they make a proper dam and enter a pipe two feet above the bottom of the dam, each purchaser bearing an equal share of the expenses, and all erven sold hereafter shall be subject to a proportionate charge to defray the expenses of the first purchasers." The then owners of the property transferred these erven to the different purchasers, and upon the deeds of transfer of the purchasers the conditions were duly registered. But, unfortunately, there was no registration of the servitude against the servient tenement, that is, against the property of the sellers, and from 1852 until last year no serious attempt was ever made to give effect to that servitude either by obtaining a registration of the servitude as against the servient tenement or by actually leading the water from the springs. What was done from time to time seems to have been for the people from the bay to send up carts or by other means to obtain water from the springs, but the owners say it was done but paid for. It was paid for, not in cash, but in fish. But anyhow, one thing is clear, that the servitude appearing upon the conditions was never acted upon, the pipe was never laid, and no registration was ever obtained as against the proprietors. The contention of the respondents now is that, inasmuch as the petitioners are not purchasers but are universal successors to the original settlers, they are bound by the original contract by which this right was given. It is by no means clear, however, that they should be treated in this case as universal successors, because their grandfather, Pieter Lafras, actually purchased this property, and transfer was made to him. But then it is said that, although he was a purchaser, he was aware of the conditions, and therefore he could not take advantage of the fact that there was no registration. Then after his death his son Matthys acquired the property. He was the universal successor, he was the heir, and his children also acquired as heirs. But, in my opinion, the length of time which has elapsed from 1852 to the present time certainly threw upon these erf-holders the duty to claim a registration of the transfer as against the servient tenement. They have failed during these 55 years to assert their rights practically, and I think that now, after these heirs have been in possession for this long period, they should not be harassed without clearer proof of the rights of these people to this water. I think, therefore, that, under all the circumstances, the rule should be made absolute, with costs, but leave should be given to the respondents to institute an action for the discharge of the interdict, for registration of the servitude, and for the costs of the present application, including repayment of any costs that may be paid by respondents under the present order.

Mr. Roux (for applicants) asked if the Court would put respondents to terms as to when they should bring an action.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You have got everything you want; you have got your interdict.]

Mr. Roux said that his clients might wish to sell the land, or other contingencies might arise.

Mr. Benjamin (for respondents) said that if a time were fixed the respondents should be allowed a considerable period in which to institute their action.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When do you think you would be able to bring an action?]

Mr. Benjamin: I think the earliest would be the November term.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The action must be brought before or during the November term.]

Act 43 of 1885—Previous conviction — Corporal punishment.

A prisoner cannot be sentenced by a Magistrate under Act 43 of 1885 to corporal punishment, unless he had been convicted more than once within three years.

De Villiers, C.J.: The case of Rex v. Page (from the Magistrate's Court, Cape Town) came before me, as judge of the week. The accused was charged with the crime of shopbreaking with intent. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour, and to receive 12 cuts with the cane. That was after the case had been remitted by the Attorney-General under the Act 43, 1885. The proof of the previous conviction was on account of the fact that on the 19th August, 1902, the accused had been sentenced to be detained in the Porter Reformatory. Well, the limit under the Act is three years. Under Act 43, 1885, corporal punishment can only be inflicted in case of a second or subsequent conviction within the space of three years. That portion of the sentence referring to cuts with the cane will be struck out. For the rest, the sentence will be confirmed.

KRIGE V. WILLEMSE. { 1907.
July 8th.
Aug. 5th.

Negotiable instrument—Signature obtained by fraud—Holder in due course—Negligence—Bills of exchange—Act (19 of 1893).

A person who is induced to sign a promissory note in favour of a payee or order by the false representation of such payee, that the document is something wholly different is not liable as maker even to a bona fide holder for value, provided that in so signing he acted without negligence.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Hon. Sir John Buchanan, sitting as a Divisional Court, in appeal, from a judgment given by the Resident Magistrate of Ceres, in an action brought by appellant against respondents, for judgment upon a promissory note for £50 (17 C.T.R., 285).

Appellant, Evelyn W. Krige, is an attorney practising at Ceres. He sued Johannes P. Willemse and his wife, Christina J. Willemse, and also Saul Gerber, for judgment upon a promissory note for £50, purporting to have been made by the Willemses and endorsed by Gerber. Gerber admitted the joint debt, the money having been paid to him, but the Willemses denied liability on three grounds, viz.: (1) That they denied their signatures to the note; (2) that the note was obtained by fraud and false pretences; and (3) want of consideration.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that he believed defendants' witnesses in preference to some of the plaintiff's witnesses. He believed that the daughter of the Willemses signed the names of her parents, and that Gerber induced her to do so, with the representation that it was a receipt. He gave judgment for plaintiff against Gerber, with costs, and absolution from the instance as regarded the Willemses.

Buchanan, J., said that the first question one had to consider was whether the finding on the facts by the Magistrate could be sustained by the evidence. The Magistrate had found certain facts, and there was evidence to support him, and as far as this appeal was concerned, he must accept his finding. The next question was whether upon the facts so found by the Magistrate, the plaintiff had a right to recover. He (the learned judge) assumed that there was consideration given by the plaintiff to Gerber for the promissory note. But could this document be treated as a promissory note at all? In this case the Magistrate found that there was no intention to contract. There was no intention to give a promissory note; there was only the intention to give a receipt. Willemse seemed to be an old man, whose eyesight was very bad, and he was about to go to Cape Town to take medical advice about his eyes. He could neither write nor read his name at the time. If he accepted the Magistrate's finding, he was bound to say that there was no contract, and no promissory note was made or intended to be made between Willemse and Gerber. Gerber got a paper signed, or rather he got the names of the defendants written by their daughter upon the piece of paper, under the belief that she was signing a receipt for an amount which Willemse had received from Gerber. This being the case, he (Mr. Justice Buchanan) could not say that the 27th section of the Act helped the plaintiff. The learned counsel for the appellant said he did not care for a judgment against Mrs. Willemse, as the parties were married in community. It was, therefore, the question of the husband's liability which was before the Court. The husband was a man who was nearly blind, and it was admitted that he never put his signature to any paper at all. He heard his daughter asked to sign a receipt, and he made no objection to her doing so. He (the learned judge) thought that, upon these facts, he ought not to be held liable, even to a third person who held the document for value. There was no contract between him and Gerber. There had been no negligence on his part which would estop him from pleading want of liability. Under these circumstances, he thought that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers), for appellant; Mr. Benjamin, K.C., for respondents.

Mr. Schreiner argued that the plaintiff was holder of the note in due course. Willemse's daughter was authorised to sign the note. Any allegation of fraud must be proved up to the bill. The Magistrate did not say there was fraud, but even assuming that there had been fraud, there had been negligence on the defendants' part, which debarred them from disputing plaintiff's claim. He cited Standard Bank v. Du Plooy (16 S.C., 161), Everett and Stroude on Estoppel (p. 277), and Price and Seeligman v. Prince (1 Roscoe, 198). On the face of the document, the person must have known what he was signing, that he was clearly undertaking a responsibility. Section 27 of Act 19 of 1893 gave the definition of law both here and in England under the Bills of Exchange Act. The fundamental security in a negotiable instrument by these legislative Acts would be swept away if it were possible for people to come afterwards and simply say they did not know what they were signing. The principals in the case of Lewis v. Clay (77 Law Times, p. 653), although the decision there went for the defence, were all in favour of the applicants in the present case. Krige was in the same position here as if he had been a bank discounting the note. On the point of the signature the defence broke down altogether, and with regard to fraud it required to be proved to the hilt, and the Magistrate did not venture to say that he did find fraud. He simply said the evidence of the Willemsees was more satisfactory than that of some of the plaintiffs. Counsel submitted that fraud had not been clearly established in this case, and referred the Court to the cases of Foster v. McKinnon (Chalmers, p. 277) and Bernhardt v. Du Toit (2 Juta, 359).

Mr. Benjamin submitted on the question of the facts it was purely one of credibility, and the Magistrate exercised his discretion in the matter, and he found that he must accept the statements by the defendants and not the statements by the plaintiff. The evidence of the two defendants and their daughter was perfectly consistent, and the Magistrate was justified in accepting their evidence. Counsel quoted the case of Foster v. McKinnon (Law Times, 4; Common Pleas, 704) and Chalmers on Bills of Exchange (p. 277). Section 27 of the Cape Act corresponded to section 29 of the English Act. Counsel also cited Young v. Groat (4 Bingham's Reports, 253), Scholefield v. Londesborough (1 Q.B., 1895, p. 536), Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Marshall (1906, A.C., 559), and Smith v. Prosser (heard in the Court of Appeal on the 4th and 5th June last). He submitted that there was no negligence on the Willemsees' part and that the Magistrate's judgment should be sustained.

Cur. Adv. Fult.

Postea (August 5th).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal against a judgment of a

Divisional Court dismissing an appeal from the Resident Magistrate's Court of Ceres. The action was on a promissory note for £50, made by the defendant Willemse in favour of one Gerber or order, and by the latter endorsed and delivered to the plaintiff. The Magistrate granted absolution from the instance on the ground that the defendant had been induced to allow his daughter to sign his name by Gerber's false statement that the document was in reality a receipt. There was some conflict in the evidence as to whether the defendant had signed the note himself, or whether it was signed by his daughter, but I accept the Magistrate's finding that his signature was affixed by his daughter. The defendant himself stated that he was satisfied with her signing, because he had been told by Gerber that the document was a receipt. He added that he could not sign because his eyes were too bad, and he could not read the document. The 90th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1893, enacts that where by that Act any instrument is required to be signed by any person, it is not necessary that he should sign it with his own hand, but it is sufficient if his signature is written thereon by some other person by or under his authority. We may take it, therefore, that the case should be treated as if the defendant had signed the promissory note himself. The mere fact, however, of the defendant having written his name at the foot of the note is not conclusive as to his liability thereunder. The object of the maker's signature is to authenticate the document, and give effect to his promise to pay, and if such signature was obtained from him by a fraudulent representation that he was signing a receipt, there is really no contract between him and the payee. It would follow that no liability is incurred to a holder in due course to whom the payee has endorsed and delivered the note, unless circumstances exist which legally preclude the person so signing from setting up the defence of fraud, or unless the 27th section of the Act created such a liability. That section enacts that "a holder in due course is a person who has taken a bill, complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions, namely: (a) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, if such was the fact; (b) that he took the bill in good faith and for value, and that at the time the bill was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it." The section then proceeds thus: "In particular, the title of a person who negotiates a bill is defective within the meaning of this Act, when he obtained the bill or the acceptance thereof by fraud or duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to fraud." There is much force in the argument of the plaintiff's counsel that if the plaintiff had no notice that the defendant's signature had been obtained by the payee's fraud, he should under this section be treated as a holder in due course, but, upon the whole, I feel bound to accept the view which has found favour in the English Courts, to the effect that an identical clause of the English Act does not apply to a case like the present. In the case of Foster v. MacKinnon (4 L.R., C.P., p. 704), which was decided before the passing of the English Act, it appeared that the defendant had been induced to put his name on the back of a bill of exchange by the fraudulent representation of the acceptor that he was signing a guarantee. In an action against him as indorser at the suit of a bona fide holder for value, the jury were directed that if the defendant's signature to the document was obtained upon the fraudulent representation that it was a guarantee, and the defendant signed it without knowing that it was a bill, and under the belief that it was a guarantee, and if the defendant was not guilty of negligence in so signing the paper, he was entitled to the verdict. It was held by the Court of Common Pleas that it was a proper direction. The ground of the decision was that not only was there fraud, but "the mind of the signer did not accompany the signature; in other words, that he never intended to sign, and therefore, in contemplation of law, never did sign, the contract to which his name is appended. If this view be correct, then I quite agree that it would have made no difference if the Act had then already been passed, for if in contemplation of law the defendant had really not signed as indorser, there is nothing in the Act to render him liable to the holder. In the case of Lewis v. Clay (77 L.T.R., N.S., p. 653), which was decided after the passing of the English Act, it was held by Lord Russell, C.J., that a person who had been fraudulently induced to sign a note as joint maker in the belief that it was a wholly different document, if he has acted with due care and without negligence, is not precluded from setting up the true facts as a defence, not only against the payee, but also as against a holder in due course. "I think it well," said his lordship, "to point out that cases like the present differ widely from those in which the party sought to be charged has agreed and intended to enter into contractual obligations by bill or note, but has been defrauded into agreeing, or been defrauded in the manner in which the bill or note has been dealt with. In such cases he is liable, on principle and authority, to any one who has dealt with the bill or note in good faith and for value." He added that in his opinion the Bills of Exchange Act had made no alteration in the law in this respect. It is important, however, to observe that in both the English cases just cited the jury had negatived the existence of negligence on the defendant's part. The law of England still stands as it did before the passing of the Act, that a person who is induced to sign a bill or note by the false statement that he is signing a wholly different instrument cannot set up the fraud as a defence to a holder in due course if in so signing he acted with negligence (see Chalmers on Bills, sec. 91). As to the law of this colony, the principle has been recognised that a defendant cannot set up the fraud of a third person as a defence against the claim of a plaintiff who has been induced by the culpable negligence of the defendant in signing an instrument without due inquiry as to its contents to act to his (the plaintiff's) prejudice upon the belief that the instrument is a genuine one. In the case of Standard Bank v. Du Plooy (16 S.C.R., p. 161), the defendant had signed a guarantee bond for Van der Heever in favour of the Standard Bank, in consideration of which the bank granted certain banking facilities to Van der Heever. The defence was that the defendant had been induced to sign the document by Van der Heever's false representation that it was a power of attorney to pass transfer of certain property, but the full Court held that Van der Heever's fraud would afford no defence, seeing that the defendant had acted with negligence in signing. The difference between the two cases is this, that there the form of guarantee specified the bank as being the party in whose favour the obligation was contracted, whereas in the present case the payee is Gerber, and not the plaintiff. It was pointed out in the Standard Bank case that it was not the case of a "cessional" document, which is clearly a misprint, for the statement that it was not the case of a cession of a document. It was not then necessary, nor is it now necessary, to inquire what would have been the rights of a person to whom the obligee of a bond obtained by fraud had ceded it. We have now to deal with a document which contained a promise to pay to the payee or order, and was therefore in such condition that the payee by indorsing it could transform it into a negotiable instrument payable to the lawful holder. If the defendant was aware of the contents of the document he would have been legally presumed to know what the legal effect of his signature would be. If he culpably neglected the obvious precaution of acquainting himself with the contents of the document before signing it the resulting liability to the holder in due course would be the same as if the promisee had been to pay such holder. I am clearly of opinion that by our law also, the rule that a person who is induced to sign a promissory note in favour of a payee or order by the false representation of such payee, that the instrument is a wholly different one, is not liable to a bona-fide holder for value must be qualified by the proviso that in so signing the note he acted without negligence.

The question then arises whether the defendant acted with reasonable care and diligence. This is a question of fact dependent not upon the credibility of the witnesses, but upon the inference which should be drawn from the admitted facts of the case. Unfortunately, the Magistrate did not direct his attention to the point, for he seems to have decided that because Gerber had been guilty of fraud, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The two English cases to which I have referred, have been much relied upon as showing under what circumstances negligence has been negatived by English juries, but upon questions of fact, findings in other cases cannot be of much assistance. In the case of Foster v. Mackinnon, the defendant, who was a gentleman far advanced in years, swore that he had never accepted or indorsed a bill of exchange, but there was evidence that the signature was his, and that he wrote the indorsement under the following circumstances. The defendant had previously, at the request of one Callow, signed a guarantee for £3,000, and Callow now asked the defendant to put his name on it, telling him that it was a guarantee, whereupon the defendant, in the belief that he was signing a guarantee similar to that which he had before given, and out of which no liability had arisen to him, put his signature on the back of the bill. The jury, it is true, returned a verdict for the defendant, but the full Court of Common Pleas granted a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The case, so far as it goes, is therefore rather in favour of the plaintiff in the present case. As to the case of Lewis v. Clay, the circumstances under which the defendant had been induced to sign the note were also very special. Lord William Nevill, an intimate friend of his, had requested him to sign a document. The defendant asked what the document was about, to which Lord William Nevill replied that he would show it if the defendant insisted, but he would rather not, as it was a private matter, and he wanted a power of attorney in connection with his sister, Lady Cowley's marriage settlement, and certain divorce proceedings then pending. The jury found that there was no negligence, and Lord Russell's judgment was given, not on an application for a new trial, but upon the findings of the jury in the action which had been tried before him. In the present case there is much to be said in favour of the plaintiff's contention that the defendant had been guilty of such negligence as to estop him from setting up the defence of fraud. The conclusion, however, at which the learned Judge in the Divisional Court arrived was that there is not sufficient proof of negligence, and with this conclusion I understand my brother Hopley to agree. Seeing that this question of negligence was not raised at the trial, and seeing also that the judgment was absolution from the instance only, I consider that the course most consistent with justice would be to dismiss the appeal and allow the question of costs to stand over, with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to institute a fresh action, either in the Resident Magistrate's Court, or in this Court, in which latter case a summons will be dispensed with. The plaintiff can then decide for himself whether he will proceed afresh either in the Magistrate's Court or in this Court. An opportunity will thus be afforded to the parties to give further evidence not only upon the question of negligence, but upon the questions whether the defendant had really been induced by Gerber's false statements to authorise the signing of the note, and whether, and to what extent, the plaintiff gave value for the note. The case to be brought to trial before the end of next term.

Maasdorp, J.: I concur.

Hopley, J.: I am of the same opinion.

Mr. Benjamin (for respondent) asked whether the Court would make any order as to costs in case an action were not brought by the plaintiff.

The Chief Justice: I think there would not be much additional expense in applying for costs.

Patent rights—Assignment—Registration—Act 17 of 1860, Sec. 28.

One J. obtained certain letters patent in this Colony, and afterwards assigned them to one W., who assigned them to D. D. granted certain interests in the patent to certain two other persons and subsequently joined them in assigning all rights in the patent to the defendant Company for valuable consideration. The former assignments were all duly registered, the latter was not. In 1906, D.'s estate was sequestrated as insolvent, and his trustees claimed the patent rights as part of the estate, on the ground, that as the assignment to defendants had not been registered, no property in the patent had passed to them.

Held, that although registration is prima facie evidence of proprietorship in letters patent and is necessary under Act 17 of 1860, Sec. 28, to pass property therein from a grantee to an assignee, it is not necessary in order to pass property in a patent from one assignee to another.

This was an action brought by the trustees in the insolvent estate of Eugenio Dapino for a declaration of rights as between themselves and the defendant company, in respect of the ownership of certain patents and the rights, privileges, and profits thereunder.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows: (1) The plaintiffs reside in Cape Town, and sue in their capacity as the joint trustees in the insolvent estate of Eugenio Dapino, which was compulsorily sequestrated by order of this Honourable Court on or about the 28th of June, 1906, and whereof the plaintiffs were duly appointed as such joint trustees on or about the 20th of July, 1906. The defendant is a company with limited liability, whose head office is in Cape Town. (2) On or about the 14th of November, 1903, letters patent for a certain invention known as an "automatic pit to be used for drainage purposes" were taken out in this Cape Colony by one Wilfred Thomas James Johns, which letters patent were duly assigned to one William Birmingham White on the 15th day of December, 1905, and again assigned by the latter to the said insolvent on the 28th of December, 1905, the said last-named cession being duly registered as by law required on the 25th of January, 1906. (3) Prior to the 30th of December, 1905, the said White and one Francois Boucharel had obtained letters patent for the said invention in the Transvaal Colony, Orange River Colony, and Natal, and on or about the date last mentioned the said White and Boucharel ceded to the insolvent the said letters patent, and all their rights, title, and interest in and to the said invention and the use thereof in South Africa. The said cession was duly registered in favour of the insolvent, as regards the Transvaal letters patent on the 24th of January, 1906, the Orange River Colony letters patent on the 24th of January, 1906, and the Natal letters patent on the 23rd of January, 1906. (4) On or about the 30th of December, 1905, the insolvent entered into an agreement for working the said patent with one Hermann vom Dorp and one Maynard Nash. (5) Shortly thereafter the defendant company was formed for the purpose of acquiring the said patent rights and of exercising them, and on or about the 31st of March, 1906, the insolvent, together with the said Vom Dorp and the said Nash, entered into an agreement with the defendant company, whereby the three former purported to sell to the latter the rights conferred under all the above-mentioned letters patent, with the full and exclusive benefit thereof. The said agreement has not been registered in terms of the Company's Act, section 17. (6) Thereafter the defendant company proceeded to work and exploit the said patents in this colony and elsewhere, and they still continue to so exploit them, and claim to be the proprietors thereof, and entitled as such to the profits derived from working the said invention. (7) The said patent still stands registered in the name of the insolvent in the register of proprietors, kept in terms of section 28 of Act 17 of 1860, and no cession thereof, as by law required, has been given by the insolvent to either the said insolvent, Vom Dorp and Nash, or to the defendant company. The plaintiffs say that there has been nothing tantamount to a delivery to either the insolvent, Vom Dorp and Nash, or the defendant company, of rights under the said letters patent, and that the company has not and never had title to the said letters, but that in law the insolvent was after registration of the cession to him and up to his insolvency the exclusive proprietor of the said letters and the rights thereunder, all of which have accordingly become vested in the plaintiffs. (8) The plaintiffs say further that the working and exercising of the said patent rights by the defendant company as aforesaid were wrongful and unlawful, and that the defendant company is not entitled to any benefits derived from such working. Wherefore the plaintiffs claim: (a) A declaration of rights as between themselves and the defendant company in respect of the ownership of the said patent and the rights, privileges, and profits thereunder. (b) A declaration that the insolvent estate of the said Dapino is the exclusive proprietor of the said letters patent, and is exclusively entitled to work the said invention and to all profits derived therefrom. (c) An account by the defendant company of all its dealings with or in respect of the said patent. (d) Debate of such account. (e) Payment of all and any profits made by the defendant company from the working or exploitation of the said patent rights. (f) An interdict restraining the defendant company from making any further use of the said invention or further exercising the said patent rights. (g) Interest a tempore morae. (h) Costs of suit.

The defendants' plea was as follows: (1) Defendant company admits the allegations in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the declaration, save that it says that for greater certainty it craves leave to refer to the originals of the agreements referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 when produced at the trial, and save that it says that the agreements were duly signed by the parties thereto; (2) it says that in or about January and February, 1906, and prior to sequestration of the estate of Eugenio Dapino as insolvent, the various letters patent, the subject matter of this action, were handed by Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinne, acting for Bouchel and White, to Messrs. Syfret, Godlonton and Low, acting for Dapino, and who were likewise acting for a certain partnership, on behalf of which partnership they received them in accordance with the agreement, and thereafter so continued to hold them until about 28th March, 1906, when it commenced and continued to hold them on behalf of the defendant company. (3) It says that it admits that the patent still stands registered in the name of the insolvent Dapino in the register of proprietors kept in the terms of section 28 of Act 17 of 1860, but it otherwise denies all the allegations of fact and conclusions of law contained in paragraphs 7 and 8. Wherefore defendant company prays that the claim be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Dr. Greer), for plaintiffs. Mr. Benjamin, K.C. (with him Mr. Howes), for defendants.

Joshua Pell, clerk in the Master's Office, produced the record in the proceedings of the insolvent estate of Dapino. There were no schedules filed; it was a compulsory sequestration, and he could not say whether there were any assets in the estate.

Carl Brauer, clerk in charge of patents in the Colonial Secretary's Office, produced a book containing the register of proprietors. The patent was first issued to W. T. J. Johns on November 14, 1903. Then it was assigned by Johns to Wm. B. White on the 16th December, 1905. On the 28th December, 1905, there was another cession by White to E. Dapino, and Dapino stood in the book as the registered proprietor. The book only referred to the Cape Colony.

Ise Levy, incorporated accountant, Cape Town, one of the co-trustees in the insolvent estate, and one of the plaintiffs, stated that as yet no assets had been handed over by the insolvent. The debts proved amounted to about £330. On going into the affairs he ascertained that the insolvent had acquired certain letters patent which were held by the company, but there was no registration of any assignment. Two of the directors had proved private debts against the estate. Witness took counsel's opinion, and succeeded in getting copies of certain agreements between Dapino and Messrs. Vom Dorp and Nash and the company. Prior to the defendants' plea in this case he could get no information as to where these letters patent were. Witness had received no information from his co-trustee about the details of this matter. He did not see any share register or minute book, the only information he could get with regard to the shares was from the counterfoils on the share block, which showed that 448 shares had been issued to Dapino, 447 to Vom Dorp, and 98 to Maynard Nash.

By His Lordship: He had done nothing as yet with regard to the shares issued to the insolvent.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

William Henry Low, partner in the firm of Syfret, Godlonton and Low, stated he acted on behalf of Mr. Dapino in connection with some negotiations, with Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissonne, who were acting on the time on behalf of White and Boucharel. The latter were registered at that time as the proprietors of this patent. White and Boucharel claimed to be entitled to the letters patent of this invention in the other colonies. On the 29th December an agreement was signed between Dapino and White and Boucharel for the assignment of these letters patent. That was the agreement put in. The company was registered on the 29th March, 1906. Subsequently he received instructions to draw up an agreement between the company and the partnership in respect of these rights. That was executed by two directors of the company, and by the members of the partnership. It was then lodged for registration, and subsequently returned to witness, the Registrar requiring an endorsement of identification, and that the agreement should be counter-signed by the secretary. Witness signed it for identification, but knew nothing of it being signed by the secretary. The instructions came entirely from Nash with regard to these agreements. Dapino signed the documents, but took no further part. The charges had been rendered to Mr. Nash first of all, as acting for the company, and subsequently rendered to Messrs. Le Roux and Wege, acting for Nash. From the time he received these letters patent until the execution of the vendor's agreement he would have handed them over to the partnership on payment of the charges, and after the execution of the vendor's agreement he would have handed them over to the company. In January, February, and March he was acting for all three parties. The agreement between the partnership and the company was drawn up by witness.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He simply acted as attorney in connection with the registration of the company.

E. Dapino stated that his 448 shares were held by Vom Dorp against an advance of £60. Witness paid no money at all in connection with the acquisition of these patents. All the money had been supplied by Vom Dorp.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He was to get 45 per cent. of the profits for doing the work. The company had been carrying on the work in the Cape Colony, but not in the Orange River Colony, Transvaal, and Natal, until February last, when operations ceased owing to the bad times. The company was to be found at Vom Dorp's office in Burg-street. There were seven shareholders. The work had been going too slow to make any profit. Witness did not know that Vom Dorp had proved in his estate for £60 as an unsecured debt. He did not trouble much about the affairs of the company.

Maynard Nash, who was a party to two of the agreements, said the books of the company were kept at Burg-street, although under the agreement of the 30th December the books should have been kept at his office, but it was found inconvenient to keep them there. From time to time witness wrote up the books. Through Vom Dorp's books he ascertained on April 22 there was a debit balance of £1,551 on the working of the Automatic Pit Company. Vom Dorp paid every penny in connection with the working of the company.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The company was practically the same, as the old partnership. It was a very small matter, and no share register was kept. In course of time he thought a share register would have been kept. The debit balance of £1,551 in Vom Dorp's book meant that he had advanced that amount beyond the £750. Witness could get up an intelligible account of the company's affairs, but he had never been asked to do so. This would probably take him a week.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: If a proper account were drawn up the company would show a loss.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

Mr. Burton said the trustees' case was based upon the provisions of the 28th section of Act 17 of 1860. The provision there was clear and imperative. It was a provision which it was difficult to see how the defendant in this case was going to get over. Until a person was registered in that book, the only person who was deemed by law to be the sole and exclusive proprietor was the person who appeared in that book. On the question of the view taken by the Court in regard to such matters generally, counsel cited the case of McGregor's Trustees v. Silberbauer (9 Juta, 36). If the principle in McGregor's case was to be applied to this case, then he would submit on the facts that the defendants were not in such a position that they could claim the same relief as the defendant did in McGregor's case. Counsel also referred to the case of Preston and Dixon v. Biden's Trustees (1 A.O.R., 322). The defendants had not said their position was unfortunate for them in law, but that it was one in which all the equities demanded should be rectified. In England, the effect of this provision had been held very strongly, as was shown by the decision of the case of Chollet v. Hoffman (7 Ellis and Blackburne, p. 686). The law of the Orange River Colony was practically the same as that of the Transvaal, and in neither was there any provision like there was in the law of the Cape Colony, and upon which plaintiffs based their claim in the present case. The company had no right to come to court and say that anybody but the trustees in the insolvent estate were the owners of the patent.

Mr. Benjamin, dealing with the account, which was claimed by the plaintiffs, said if ever there was a case of bona-fide possession it was that of the defendant company. Counsel cited Voet (41, 1, 33), Grotius (2, 6, 33), Van der Kessel (section 205) in support of his contention. The provision in the Patent Act was simply for the purpose, as far as the original grantee was concerned, of determining who was the person entitled to sue for an infringement of a patent. The Natal Act, No. 4 of 1870, had a similar provision to that of the Cape Act, but there was no such provision in the Orange River Colony Act, and sub-section 4, of section 33, of the Transvaal Proclamation of 1902 offered a sharp contrast to the law of the Cape Colony. Counsel submitted, unless it was absolutely forced upon the Court to extend the doctrine in the case of Harris and Buissinne, it would be very reluctant to do so. Coming to the facts of the case, counsel said that to show how Mr. Low regarded his holding of these letters patent, his bills had not been rendered to Dapino but to the company.

Dr. Greer having been heard in reply,

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (August 6th).

Maasdorp, J.: On the 14th November, 1903, letters patent for a certain invention, known as the "Automatic Pit, to be used for drainage purposes," were granted to one Wilfred Johns, who assigned them to William White, on the 15th December, 1905, and White assigned them to the insolvent Dapino on the 28th of December, 1905: both these assignments were duly registered on the 25th of January, 1906. Dapino granted certain interests in the patent to Vom Dorp and Nash, and the three of them jointly assigned the patent for valuable consideration to the defendant company. This last assignment has not been registered in the register of proprietors, and on the 28th of June, 1906, the estate of Dapino was sequestrated as insolvent. Upon this state of the facts the trustees claim that at the date of the insolvency the patent was the property of the insolvent, and became vested in them for the benefit of creditors, and the company contend that upon assignment they became the proprietors of the patent. The question the Court has to decide is whether registration of the assignment of a patent by one assignee to another is essential to pass the ownership, or whether the property passes when the unconditional agreement to assign is concluded. Under the terms of Act 17 of 1860, a patent is the grant of a personal right which is capable of assignment, and the right of assignment is usually provided for in the letters patent. Under the general rule of our law, a right which is capable of assignment passes by the mere agreement to assign. In the case of a cession of action, the right ceded passes to the cessionary at once, even without notice to the debtor, but a debtor who has no notice or knowledge of the cession can lawfully pay the original creditor. It has been held in several cases decided by the Supreme Court that an out-and-out cession of a right of action will, upon the insolvency of the cedent, avail against his trustees in insolvency. But it is contended in this case that the provisions of the Act bring the assignment of a patent within the rule laid down in the case of Harris v. The Trustee of Buissinne (2 Menz., 113), when it was decided that the property in land sold before insolvency, but not duly transferred and registered in the Registry of Deeds, remains the property of the insolvent, and becomes upon insolvency vested in the trustee under the Insolvent Ordinance. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire whether there is anything in the Patents Act enacting that the property in a patent which has been assigned shall not pass to the assignee until the registration of the assignment. Section 27 of the Act provides that: "There shall be kept at the office to be appointed as aforesaid, a book or books to be called 'The Register of Patents,' in which shall be entered and recorded all letters patent granted under this Act." Section 28 contains the following provisions: "There shall be kept at the same office a book or books entitled 'The Register of Proprietors,' wherein shall be entered the assignment of any letters patent, or of any share or interest therein, any licence under letters patent, and any other matter or thing relating to or affecting the proprietorship in such letters patent or licence; and a copy of any entry shall be prima facie proof of the assignment, licence, or proprietorship: provided always that until such entry shall have been made the grantee or grantees of the letters patent shall be deemed and taken to be the sole and exclusive proprietor or proprietors of such letters patent." The contention that registration is necessary to pass the property in a patent must be founded upon the proviso contained in the latter section, without which there seems to be nothing in the section to alter the ordinary rule that unconditional assignment transfers the ownership at once, and conditional assignment transfers the ownership upon the happening of the condition. Without the proviso the registration would merely provide convenient evidence of dealings with patents, and even then the evidence would be merely prima facie proof. Now strictly construed the proviso only enacts that the grantee of letters patent shall be deemed to be the sole proprietor until the entry of and assignment by him, it says nothing of the ownership of assignees. I do not see upon what ground the Court can hold that the proviso should in this respect be extended to assignees. The Legislature, in this section, was expressly dealing with assignees, and seems to me to have deliberately selected the case of grantees, to distinguish their position expressly from that of assignees. While before the registration of assignment the grantee is to be deemed exclusive proprietor, the presence of the assignee's name as proprietor is only prima facie evidence of his proprietorship, which can be rebutted. It is unnecessary to search for the reasons for this distinction, but it may be pointed out that the section deals not only with assignees, but also with licensees, and persons holding rights affecting the proprietorship in letters patent, and although it might be considered desirable to enable these persons to record the evidence of their title, it might not be advisable to make their title entirely dependent on registration of such evidence. Still, this strict construction leads to this curious result, that an assignee who takes direct from the grantee, cannot become proprietor until his right is registered, whereas he may be divested of his right by assigning to another without that other assignee registering his title. However, I do not think the language of the section is such as necessarily to lead to the conclusion that the Legislature must have intended that where an assignee of a patent assigns it again to another person, the former shall, until entry of such assignment has been made in the register, be deemed to be the sole proprietor of such letters patent as is the case with the grantee. This would, it seems to me, not be an interpretation of the law, but an addition to or amendment of it. Nor does the bare fact that the register is called "The Register of Proprietors," the contents of which are prima facie proof of facts entered, carry with it the consequence that no one can be proprietor until his name appears upon the register as such. The two sections of the Act under consideration are identical with those of the English Statute of 1852, and yet very little assistance can be obtained from the English decided cases, because most of them deal with the later Statute of 1883, which seems to put an end to the distinction as to registration between the grantee and the assignees of letters patent. Under the later law, only one book, called the register of patents, is kept, and the grantees of patents no longer appear in a separate book from other proprietors. Section 87 of that Statute provides that: "When a person becomes entitled by assignment to a patent, the Comptroller shall, on request, cause the name of such person to be entered as proprietor of the patent. The person for the time being entered on the register of patents as the proprietor shall, subject to such rights appearing from such register to be vested in any other person, have absolute power to deal with the same." Under the present law in England, grantees and assignees stand on the same footing as regards registration. But even then it will appear, upon comparing section 87 with section 23, sub-section 2, that registration affects proprietors differently from other matters of which it is only prima facie evidence. It was decided in the case of Chollet v. Hoffman (7 Ellis and Bl., 685), under the earlier Statute, that an assignee, taking from the grantee, could not sue until his assignment had been registered, otherwise, as the Statute provides that before such registry the original patentee should be deemed the sole owner, a defendant would be liable to be sued at one and the same time by the grantee and assignee of the letters patent. And Lawson, in his work on Patents, page 468, says: "The reasoning in the case of Chollet and Hoffman appears equally to apply to the 87th section of the present Statute, and it would seem that under the present Act, as under the Act of 1852, registration of the assignment is necessary to enable the assignee to maintain an action for infringement." It would, therefore, seem that the only case upon the point in question, under the earlier Act, is one which decides that an assignee taking from the original grantee cannot in an action claim to exercise rights of ownership before his name has been entered as assignee upon the registers, but there is no case either in the English Courts or our Supreme Court dealing with the effect of registration in passing the ownership of letters patent from one assignee to another. In the form of letters patent given in the schedule to the Act, the letters patent purport to be: "Give and grant to John Doe, his executors and assignees, the full power and authority to make, use, and vend the said invention," and it may be contended that the assignee may himself be regarded as the grantee after he completes his assignment. But however that may be for certain purposes, and notwithstanding the form of the letters patent, I cannot help, in view of the language of sections 27 and 28, coming to the conclusion that the distinction for purposes of registration remain between the original grantee and the assignees. Upon the agreement being entered into between Dapino and Vom Dorp and Nash, the attorneys who acted in the matter were allowed to remain in possession of the letters patent, and intended to hold them on behalf of the partnership. Again, when the assignment to the company took place, they held the letters patent for the company, and it is quite clear that Dapino, after the assignment to the company took place, did not regard the custodians of the letters patent as holding them on his behalf. If, therefore, actual delivery of the letters patent were necessary to complete the assignment, then there is proof of such delivery. I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the declaration prayed for, and judgment must be given for the defendants, with costs. There is also a claim in respect of the letters patents in the neighbouring colonies, but counsel seemed to admit during the argument that it was hardly within the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with the adverse claims to property in those patents. Moreover, the law in those colonies was not laid before the Court, and it is quite possible that different principles may prevail under those laws. Upon that part of the case the Court will grant absolution from the instance.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ADMISSION. { 1907.
 { July 9th.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., moved for the admission of Reginald Arthur Theophilus as an advocate.

Application granted and oath administered.

BOOSE V. MILLS AND OTHERS.

Mr. Roux moved as a matter of urgency on the application of Mills and others for an order for the removal of the above action from the roll for the 12th July pending the confirmation or otherwise of the provisional order of sequestration of the plaintiff's estate. Applicants said that a provisional order had been made against the estate of Frederick Boose (the plaintiff) on the 3rd July, returnable on the 16th July. If the case were not removed from the roll defendants would be compelled to incur needless additional costs.

Mr. Rowson (for respondent) read an affidavit by Mr. Boose, who said that he had every reason to believe that the provisional order for the sequestration of his estate would be withdrawn. If not, he believed he would be able successfully to oppose the same, and had reason to believe that the final order would not be granted.

Mr. Rowson urged that the case should be postponed until a day out of term as soon after the 16th July as the Court would be pleased to allow.

Mr. Roux submitted that the case should be withdrawn, and set down for some date next term, after the provisional order had been disposed of.

Buchanan, J.: I do not think this application was necessary, because, by the Insolvent Ordinance (sections 23 and 24), all actions pending either by or against an insolvent are stayed by the insolvency. Immediately the provisional order of sequestration was granted, no further proceedings could be taken by the insolvent, and the action could not possibly come on for trial this term. As formal application has been made to strike off the case, the Court will strike it off the roll, and leave matters there. Costs may be costs in the cause.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

PETERSEN, LTD. V. WEBBER.

This was an application for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Petitioners alleged that defendant was liable for £4,849 15s. 1d., with interest from the 4th June, for goods sold and delivered. Defendant had been in partnership with two others, carrying on business as a chemist under the style of Cameron and Hamilton, at Observatory-road, Salt River, and Sir Lowry-road. Defendant subsequently agreed to take over the liabilities of the partnership, and he granted a bond against his property to the amount of £3,500.

The defendant's position was that he was solvent, and that his assets were in excess of his liabilities. The three branches of his business were all bringing in good returns.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones for plaintiff: Mr. W. P. Buchanan, K.C., for defendant.

Mr. Buchanan said that the application was made under the Act 38, 1884, on the ground that defendant was insolvent, and that it would be for the benefit of the creditors that his estate should be sequestrated. The plaintiffs had lulled the defendant into a false sense of security by giving him amounts of goods from time to time far in excess of what he was paying them from time to time, and had then launched an ultimatum that unless he agreed to a most stringent deed of inspection they would sequester his estate. Under the circumstances, the onus was strongly upon the plaintiffs to produce clear, unmistakable, and absolute proof that defendant was insolvent. Plaintiffs, he submitted, had not sufficiently discharged the onus to entitle them to a final order against the defendant.

Buchanan, J.: In this case there has been no act of insolvency committed.

and, consequently, the provisions of the Insolvent Ordinance do not apply, but the application for provisional sequestration is made under the Act 38, 1884. The Act of 1884 requires that the petitioning creditor shall show that the estate is insolvent, and that it is for the benefit of the creditors that the sequestration shall take place. In this case, in answer to the affidavits made by the petitioning creditor, the debtor himself has filed a schedule by an accountant, which shows a deficiency in his estate of £650. The statements in the affidavits have been directed to several of the items in the account, and on looking at the account itself, it is clear that the deficiency stated is the very least that can be expected in the estate. It seems much more probable that the deficiency will be much greater. I think, on the papers before the Court, there is no doubt that the defendant is insolvent. The petitioning creditor is a creditor for over £4,000, and this account is payable on demand, and if sequestration were refused it would only lead to an immediate action being brought to recover this amount. I asked counsel to suggest an answer to such an action which would prevent judgment being given for the amount of the debts, and he was unable to do so. It would thus only be postponing the evil day if sequestration were refused at the present stage. The debtor entered into his arrangements with the petitioning creditors at the end of 1906, and passed a hypothecation for the then existing debt of about £3,500. The petitioning creditor agreed to continue supporting the debtor, as he said, on the understanding that any advances subsequent to that date should be paid monthly as the goods were supplied. Instead of that, we find that at the end of May, 1907, the indebtedness had increased from £3,650 to £4,723, an increase of about £1,100 during that period, so that the defendant has not complied with the conditions upon which time was given. In this case there is an insolvent estate, there is inability to pay, the debts are due, and it is in the interest of the creditors, that the sequestration should go through, because it seems that the estate is going from bad to worse month by month by being allowed to run on. These circumstances satisfy the requirements of the Act to which I have referred, and I think the sequestration must be made final with costs. Final adjudication granted.

EBERT AND CO. V. DICKSON AND TURNBULL.

Mr. Inchbold moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate as insolvent.
Order granted.

LAMBERTO V. BASBO.

Mr. Wallach moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £50 and taxed costs amounting to £59 odd.

Defendant said that he was without means, and was unable to make any offer. He had taken goods to Lobito Bay, and had lost his goods and caught fever.

No order.

HIDDINGH V. BRADY.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,000, with interest from the 1st July, 1906, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest. Counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

DISTRIBUTING SYNDICATE FOR { 1907.
COLD STORAGE V. WALDER. { July 9th.

Mr. Wallach moved for judgment under Rule 319, in default of plea, for £247 10s., with interest a tempore morae.

Judgment in terms of declaration.

COURTENAY V. PLATNAUER.

Mr. Louwrens moved for judgment under Rule 329d, in terms of summons, for (1) an account of certain goods entrusted by plaintiff to defendant to be realised by him for plaintiff's account, (2) debate; and (3) payment of such sums of money as upon debate may be found due to plaintiff, with interest and costs.

Buchanan, J.: Judgment will be given for an account, account to be delivered within 14 days, with costs.

DE WIT V. DE WIT.

This was the return day of a summons calling upon defendant and the curator ad litem to show cause why the defendant should not be declared of unsound mind and incapable of managing his property.

Mr. Marais was for plaintiff.

Mr. Marais read affidavits by C. J. Roux, R.M. of Riversdale (the curator ad litem), Dr. De Vos, and the defendant's mother in support of the application.

The matter was ordered to stand over until to-morrow (Wednesday) for further information on several points, no additional costs to be allowed for the second hearing.

Postea (July 10th).

Mr. Marais stated that he had now been instructed that Mr. Jacobus F. van Wyk, who was suggested at curator bonis to defendant, was prepared to give security.

The Court made an order declaring defendant to be of unsound mind, and appointing his mother curator to his person, and Mr. J. F. van Wyk curator bonis.

REHABILITATIONS.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan applied, under section 14 of the Act 38, 1884, for the rehabilitation of Cornelius J. J. Olivier. The trustee, in his report, commented on the fact that Olivier had not kept books.

Buchanan, J.: The law requires everybody who goes into business to keep books. The applicant has not kept books. Application refused, but leave given to apply again in six months.

Mr. De Waal applied, under section 14 of the Act 38, 1884, for the rehabilitation of Charles Roberts.

Order granted.

Ex parte CLOETE.

Mr. Inchbold moved on the petition of Anna J. C. Cloete as executrix testamentary of her late mother, for leave to raise a sum of £300 on mortgage of the landed property. In order to secure that no one would be prejudiced, petitioner said that she would be prepared to insure her life for £300. The Master recommended that the application be granted subject to security being given for the payment of the premiums. Counsel said that half the property would in any event revert to petitioner's estate, and he urged that it would be sufficient if the petitioner insured her life for £150, and gave security for £150.

Order granted in terms of Master's report, insurance to be for £150.

HOFFMAN V. CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL.

Mr. Lewis (for plaintiff in the action) moved for the appointment of a commission de bene esse to take the evidence of Morris Joseph, who was leaving for England—not later than the 20th July. Counsel said that he ought to mention that this was a pauper suit, and he did not see how the Commissioner would be protected for his fees. He had not any name to suggest to the Court.

Buchanan, J.: The matter will be ordered to stand over until to-morrow. You can see in the meantime if some counsel will be prepared to take the commission, and you may mention a name to-morrow. Of course, if your client is successful in the action, costs of the commission will be costs in the cause.

Postea (July 10th).

Mr. Lewis moved for the appointment of Mr. Toms to take evidence on commission.

Order granted.

Ex parte ESTATE ALBERTSE.

Mr. Gutsche moved on the petition of the mother and natural guardian of certain three minors for leave to pass transfer of their undivided shares in defined portions.

Order granted.

Ex parte INSOLVENT ESTATE MYERS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order recognising Solomon S. Lorie as trustee of Estate Isaac Myers, of Johannesburg, and formerly of Birmingham, and authorising him to deal with the insolvent's assets in this colony. From the petition, it appeared that the insolvent was entitled to certain moneys in the business of Myers Bros., of Cape Town, but that Mr. Philip Myers would not negotiate or deal with the attorney appointed on behalf of the trustee to represent the estate in Cape Town, unless petitioner were recognised as trustee in this colony to deal with the assets. He prayed for an order declaring that, by virtue of his appointment, he was entitled to administer the assets aforesaid, and auxiliary to the order of the Supreme Court of the Transvaal recognising his appointment as trustee.

Buchanan, J., asked if the petitioner had got a request from the Transvaal Court.

Mr. Bisset said that he had not. He believed that, technically, that was the proper course; but in one or two cases the Court had granted an order. He cited In re Motam (15 C.T.R., 563).

Buchanan, J.: In the case of Viljoen (16 C.T.R., 860), there was a distinct intimation that there should be a request on future occasions. It was there pointed out that there should be a request from the Court of the Orange River Colony.

Mr. Bisset: I was not aware of that case.

Buchanan, J.: At present we have no statutory law in the country, although there is a Bill at present before Parliament, but we have the general Imperial Act, which governs this case (sec. 74, Cap. 71 of Victoria, 32 and 33). A rule will be granted on condition that a request is filed.

Mr. Bisset said that his client would apply for the necessary request.

Buchanan, J.: If the Bill now before Parliament goes through, it may obviate the necessity for a request. A rule nisi will be granted in terms of the prayer of the petition, rule to be published once in the "Government Gazette" and "Cape Times," and to be returnable on the 1st August, a request of the Transvaal Court to be filed in the meantime.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

VAN DER MERWE V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT AND OTHERS.	{ 1907. July 10th. " 11th. " 24th. Aug. 13th
--	--

Railway — Expropriation — Compensation—Acts 9 of 1858, Sec. 11, 10 of 1874, 19 of 1874, Sec. 3.

In June, 1874, R. P. M. offered to the Colonial Government gratuitously the use of sufficient ground on his farm for railway station buildings. His offer was accepted, and within three years the buildings were erected. The boundaries of the land thus acquired by the Railway Department were not demarcated at that time. It was, however, fenced in 1884, but R. P. M. still remained the registered owner thereof. He died in 1886, his estate was sequestrated as insolvent, and the land in the estate was purchased by the plaintiff. In 1906, plaintiff claimed as against the Colonial Government an order of ejectment from all land on the farm occupied by them for railway purposes; or in the alternative, compensation and damages.

Held, (1) That as to the land occupied by the line of railway, the Government had acquired prescriptive rights thereto; (2) That the land occupied by the station was not acquired by contract from R. P. M., but was expropriated under Acts 9 of 1858 and 19 of 1874, Sec. 3; (3) That as R. P. M. had waived any right he might have had to compensation for this land, and as plaintiff had purchased with the knowledge that a portion of the land was occupied for railway purposes, he was not entitled to succeed in his action.

Gillet v. Colonial Government (7, C.T.R., 187) distinguished.

This was an action for ejectment and damages in respect of the occupation by the Government of a certain piece of land, which the plaintiff said was his property, at Hex River Station.

The declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is the owner of a certain portion of the farm Vendutie Kraal, situated in the district of Worcester, including the two erven hereinafter mentioned, and through which runs the line of railway belonging to the Cape Government. The first-named defendant is the Commissioner of Public Works, and as such represents the Colonial Government. The other defendants are owners of other portions of the said farm and are joined for reasons hereinafter stated.

2. In the year 1878 the plaintiff's father, Roelof Petrus van der Merwe, was the registered owner of a certain portion of the said farm, and on the 8th of October, 1879, he entered into a contract with the second-named defendant Gie by which he sold to the said Gie a certain portion of his said land, with the exception of the two erven aforementioned and two small portions called 10 and 20, which it is not material to locate, and on the 28th October, 1879, transfer was passed to the said Gie, and though the said erven and the pieces 10 and 20 formed no part of the land sold, the transfer passed to the said Gie did include portion of them, but it was so passed in error and by mutual mistake, and did not contain the true contract between the said seller and purchaser.

3. In June, 1886, after the death of R. P. van der Merwe, his estate was sequestrated as insolvent, and in the same year the trustee in his said insolvent estate sold to the plaintiff the said land, which belonged to the estate, including the erven and the said pieces of land 10 and 20, but owing to the initial mistake aforesaid the transfer to the plaintiff did not, owing to error and mutual mistake, include the whole of the erven and the said pieces of land. Thereafter the plaintiff claimed from the trustee in the said insolvent estate transfer of the remainder of the said erven and pieces of land sold to him, and thereupon the said trustee, in order to carry out the said contract of sale, sued the said second-named defendant Gie in this honourable Court for a rectification of the transfer passed by R. P. van der Merwe to the said Gie, so as to exclude the remainder of the two erven and the two pieces of land called 10 and 20. After pleadings filed, the said Gie admitted the said claim, and agreed to give possession of the remainder of the said erven and two pieces of land to the said trustee, who has given possession to the plaintiff, and to pass transfer thereof to him for the purpose of passing transfer to the plaintiff, and transfer thereof is being passed but has not been perfected, and the trustee in turn will pass transfer to the plaintiff.

4. In July, 1889, the plaintiff sold a portion of the said land sold to him by the said trustee to the third-named defendant, P. J. de Wet, excluding the two erven but including the pieces 10 and 20, but owing to the aforesaid errors the transfer to P. J. de Wet did in error and by mutual mistake transfer to him a small and upper part of the two erven but not the two pieces 10 and 20. The said De Wet has given possession to the plaintiff of the said upper part of the two erven, and is ready and willing to pass transfer thereof upon receiving in turn transfer of the two pieces 10 and 20, and upon completion of the transfers by the said Gie and the said trustee as aforesaid the plaintiff will transfer the two said pieces to De Wet, and the latter will transfer the upper part of the said two erven, and pending the completion of the said transfers the plaintiff is entitled to the possession and occupation of the said erven.

5. The aforesaid railway runs through the said erven, and was constructed after the year 1876, and was built upon land which was cultivated, and the Cape Government has from time to time taken possession of more and more of the said erven, and has built upon it a station, a goods shed, stationmaster's quarters, porter's cottage, platelayers' cottages, native labourers' cottages, and has enclosed portions of the said erven for gardens and poultry runs and is using the land for these purposes.

6. The plaintiff says that the original occupation and possession by the Cape Government of the erven in question for the construction of the railway was wrongful and unlawful, that the construction upon and fencing in of portions of the erven from time to time as aforesaid was wrongful and unlawful, and that the first-named defendant is now in wrongful and unlawful occupation of the said land and is not legally entitled to possess and occupy the said erven for any of the purposes aforesaid, and that the plaintiff is entitled to claim that the first-named defendant shall quit and give up possession of the said erven to the plaintiff so that he may complete the possession and occupation given to him by the second and third-named defendants, and that the first-named defendant shall remove from the said erven all the rails, buildings, enclosures and matters and things placed thereon by the Colonial Government from time to time, but the first-named defendant refuses to quit and give up possession or to remove the buildings, etc., as aforesaid. By reason of the premises the plaintiff has suffered loss and damage to the extent of £2,000.

7. Further and alternatively, the plaintiff says that, if this honourable Court should find that the first-named defendant is entitled to use and occupy any portion of the said erven for any of the purposes aforesaid, he, the plaintiff is entitled to fair and reasonable compensation for the same.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims: (a) An order declaring that the first-named defendant shall quit and give up possession of the said erven, and that he remove from the said erven all rails, buildings, structures, enclosures, and other matters and things placed thereon by the Colonial Government, and that the plaintiff be placed in possession of the said land; or, alternatively and further in case this honourable Court should find that the first-named defendant is entitled to use and occupy any portion of the said erven for any of the purposes aforesaid, an order declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to fair and reasonable compensation for the same, and (b) an interdict restraining the first-named defendant from trespassing upon the said erven by himself, his servants, or agents; (c) the sum of £2,000, as and for damages; (d) alternative relief; (e) costs of suit as against the first-named defendant.

The plea of the first-named defendant was as follows:

1. The first-named defendant admits paragraph 1 of the declaration.

2. He admits paragraphs 2, 3, and 4, but denies that the allegations therein contained disclose any right of action against the Colonial Government.

3. He admits that the line of railway runs through the said erven, and that it was constructed upon land which was partly cultivated, and that that Government has built upon portion of the farm Vendutie Kraal, acquired by it, a station, a goods shed, stationmaster's quarters, and cottages such as are described in paragraph 5, but otherwise denies the allegations contained in the said paragraph, save that parts of the said erven are used by occupiers of the cottages as gardens and poultry runs.

4. The said line of railway was constructed under the powers conferred by Act No. 19 of 1874, and that portion of the farm Vendutie Kraal over which it runs was duly expropriated and taken possession of by the Colonial Government prior to August, 1876, pursuant to the powers conferred by the powers contained in the said Statute and Act No. 9 of 1858, and the said Government has had open, peaceable, and undisturbed possession thereof as of right for a period exceeding the period of prescription.

5. In the year 1876 Roelof Petrus van der Merwe, who was then the registered owner of the said farm, for valuable consideration, namely, that the station should be upon his land, made over and ceded to the Government a certain portion thereof, which portion was thereafter duly taken possession of and enclosed for railway purposes; the station, goods shed, and other buildings, and the gardens and poultry runs mentioned in paragraph 5 hereof are upon the land herein referred to, and the plaintiff has not and never had any right in regard to that portion of the farm.

6. The plaintiff purchased the land referred to in the declaration, with full notice and knowledge of the facts set out in the preceding paragraphs numbered 4 and 5, and he had not at any time any right to claim compensation.

7. The said farm was held by the said Roelof Petrus van der Merwe upon perpetual quitrent tenure, subject to the terms of the Proclamation of the 6th August, 1813, and other laws relative to such tenure, and the said Van der Merwe in or about the year 1878 claimed compensation for the expropriation referred to in paragraph 4, but inasmuch as the benefit and advantage derived by him by reason of the formation of the railway exceeded the amount of the compensation which might otherwise, under section 12 of the Act No. 9 of 1858, have been claimable by him, the said claim was rejected.

8. The defendant further says specially, that inasmuch as more than thirty years have elapsed since the expropriation referred to, no compensation is now claimable in respect of the said expropriation.

9. The first-named defendant denies paragraphs 6 and 7, save that he refuses to quit and give up possession of the said erven.

Wherefore he prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Mr. Bisset), for plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. H. Jones, K.C.), for the first defendant. The other defendants did not appear.

A clerk in the Deeds Office produced a deed of transfer in favour of Roelof Petrus van der Merwe, dated November 29, 1886. The date of sale was the 31st August, 1886. The sale to Naude was on the 28th February, 1878.

John Brown Ellis, Civil Engineer, of Worcester, stated that in August last year he proceeded to Hex River Station and framed a plan of the locality. The plan showed the land in question, which had been fenced in by the Government. In 1883 witness was Government District Engineer at Tows River, and had the line from Worcester fenced in upon instructions from the Government, which included this particular ground. In April, 1884, the station ground was fenced in on a special plan sent to him from Cape Town.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had nothing to do with the preparations of the original plans.

Stephanus F. Naude, farmer, who owned portion of the farm Vendutie Kraal, said he purchased his property from old R. P. van der Merwe in 1878. When the latter sold to witness he reserved a couple of erven on which the station buildings stand. He did not know why Van der Merwe kept out the two erven. There was no cultivation of the ground, which is now fenced in, when he got there in 1878, although he could see it was arable land. Witness was there when the ground was fenced in. His cattle grazed right up to the railway line. In recent years the people working on the line made gardens and planted trees.

Jan. A. Beneke, assistant to the Pound Master at Worcester, stated that for some time he was living upon the two erven of the plaintiff at Hex River. He hired the two erven in 1880, from old Mr. Van der Merwe, for which he paid £18 a year. Witness cleared the ground, and started cultivating it.

Roelof Petrus van der Merwe, plaintiff, stated that his father, who was the owner of the property referred to, died in August, 1885. As far as witness could remember, his father was the owner of the whole farm ten years before. His father's homestead, The Pines, was about a mile and a half from the railway station. He remembered the sale of a portion of the farm to Naude in 1878. Witness saw the railway built. His father's estate was put up for sale in 1886, and witness bought it provisionally. When his father sold to Naude, witness was aware that the two erven were kept out of the sale. Witness got possession of the two erven, and continued the lease to Beneke. Some time after witness got possession, Gie claimed the erven, and witness allowed him to enter into possession, until inquiries were made. In July, 1889, the balance of the farm, with the exception of the two erven, was sold to De Wet. In 1904 or 1905 he took steps, and had negotiations with regard to his rights, and as a result the second and third defendants agreed to let him have transfer. Immediately after he settled with Gie and De Wet, he had a letter of demand sent to the Government. During the last couple of years the cultivation by the Cape Government had been increased. When witness bought out his father's insolvent estate, he was not informed of any reservation on the property.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had conditions of sale with De Wet, but no contract.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Harry H. Elliott, resident engineer of the Western System of the Railway Department, who had made investigations into the matter, said that not until July, 1906, was there any claim in regard to this matter. He could not trace the actual notices of expropriation, but he found that the resident engineer in October, 1875, had sent notices of expropriation out to the different farmers. The laying of the rails passed through the station yard in October, 1876. Before the laying of rails the earth-works should be completed some months before. There was an antagonism as to two sites, and in October, 1876, the Government intimated it accepted Mr. Van der Merwe's offer. The station buildings, according to the records, were completed at the same time as the line.

Henry Francis Mellet, ganger in the employ of the C.G.R., stationed at Worcester, stated he was on the construction of the line between Worcester and De Doorns. Shortly after the line opened witness lived at Hex River station. He remained there for about eighteen months. He remembered the fencing-in of the area though he had nothing to do with it. Recently he had looked at it, but could find no alteration. It was originally rough ground, and witness could not see any trace of former cultivation.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He did not remember Beneke being at Hex River. After the 18 months he was not prepared to say if there was any cultivation.

Mr. Schreiner said the parties had agreed, without prejudice or without creating a precedent, that all the documents should go in, so that counsel would not require to go into the details of all the correspondence.

Edward Stapleton, chief clerk in the Surveyor-General's Office, where he had been since 1874, stated he was well acquainted with the practice of that office. With regard to the farm Van Dutie Kraal, he found there had been correspondence on the subject of compensation in regard to the original expropriation and construction of the railway.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Where they obtained permission from the owner, and he made a cession, it was a rare thing to take transfer. In a case where a farm was a quitrent farm, the Government considered it had the right to take land, and so it did not trouble to take transfer or steps to get its title to the land secure. In those days the view of the department was that, where the line ran through a quitrent farm, it could take land for the line and station buildings without compensation.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: In 1876 the station ground had been offered gratuitously by Mr. Van der Merwe, and accepted by the Government in that year.

Allan Grant Dalton, Engineer-in-Chief to the Railway Department, stated that in 1876 he was on the Midland station. The area at Hex River was smaller than usually required for such a station. The land for the station area was too small. There was correspondence to show that the department had been negotiating with Naude for extra ground for the station purposes.

Harry H. Elliott (recalled) stated he had made very full search of all the documents in the case. There was a report by a railway officer giving the measured lengths of fencing made by Naude on his part of the farm.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The records went to show that De Vos received £200 for the area at De Doorns. Transfer had been taken of portion of the area from the present owner, who had received £360 from the Government for a store, and an additional area which was expropriated.

Samuel Atherton, of Worcester, stated that before the station was built, he managed for old Mr. Van der Merwe a store and an hotel near the station. There was a lively and good business done there, on account of the number of navvies employed at the construction work. He remembered in a conversation hearing Mr. Van der Merwe say to Mr. Golding, the engineer, "If you build a station on this farm, I will give you the ground free."

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Postea (July 24th).

Counsel were heard in argument. Mr. Burton said that in this case plaintiff claimed an ejectment and damages in respect of the occupation by the Government of certain land at Hex River Station. He did not see how he could press the claim for compensation. He recognised that as regarded the land on which the rails were laid, the plaintiff could not press his claim. The substantial question in the case was as to the rest of the fenced-in area, where the Government had their railway station and the platelayers' cottages, and he contended that the Government clearly had no right to be there. So far as title represented by documents was concerned, the plaintiff was the owner of that ground. The Government had not acquired by prescription the right of occupation of the land in question. The Government had never purported to appropriate this ground. The defence of the Government was that they had acquired the ground by cession from old Mr. V. d. Merwe, and that plaintiff bought with full notice and knowledge of the cession. The Government based their case on a contract with old Mr. Van der Merwe. At the very best, when plaintiff bought there was a promise by old Mr. Van der Merwe to let the Government have the ground for station purposes, etc. Then old Mr. Van der Merwe became insolvent. He was the equitable owner of the erven. He had promised to let Government have the ground, and resting on what they believed to be a secure position, the Government took no further steps. The trustee was not bound by that promise, and he sold the erven. Plaintiff became the purchaser. It was important to remember that plaintiff purchased this property in an insolvent estate. Did the question of notice enter into the legal consideration of such a case? He submitted that the question of whether plaintiff had notice of the arrangements between old Van der Merwe and the Government would not in law affect a person in the position of plaintiff who had bought in an insolvent estate. Nothing could have prevented the trustee from selling the assets in the estate without reservation. The doctrine of notice did not apply in this case. The Government had neglected to secure its rights, when Van der Merwe became insolvent those rights fell into the estate, and plaintiff bought without reservation. Counsel went on to discuss the question of whether the plaintiff had any knowledge of the arrangements entered into between his father and the Government. He submitted that it was quite consistent with the probabilities that plaintiff had had no clear notice of the position when he purchased the land. If the Court found that the Government had been illegally upon the ground, then the plaintiff would be entitled to some damages. Counsel quoted section 3, Act 19, 1874, sections 11 and 12, Act 9, 1858, Logan v. Colonial Government (18, S.C., 125), Judd v. Fourie (2, E.D.C., 41), Richards v. Nash (1, Juta, 312), Jansen v. Fincham (9, Juta, 289), Grimbeck v. Colonial Government (17, S.C., 200), and Bower v. Colonial Government (13, S.C., 158).

Mr. Schreiner said his learned friend had stated that he did not intend to insist upon the claim for compensation, and yet he said that he did not abandon that claim. It was difficult to know what the claim was that he made on behalf of plaintiff. In 1876 old Mr. Van der Merwe pressed the Government to put the station on his property. Other people pressed the Government to put the station on their property. A sale by auction was arranged in 1878, and it was significant that the two erven were left out of the sale. All the cases showed that the Government had never taken transfer when they were taking unimproved quitrent ground. He cited section 3, Act 19, 1874. Plaintiff was the executor of his father's estate, and he surrendered the estate as insolvent. When he bought the ground he bought it at a reduced price, knowing of the ground that was in the occupation of the Government. The owner had consented to the gratuitous occupation by the Government. After all, it was a question of fair dealing. Plaintiff bought minus what the Government was in occupation of. He could not now be heard to say "Remove your station or pay me compensation." Where had the plaintiff shown that he acquired a right over against the Colonial Government to apply for an ejectment against them or compensation? There was absolutely no proof why the Government's quiet occupation should now be upset. The Government were occupying pursuant to the provisions of the Act 19 of 1874. Counsel cited Grimbeck v. Colonial Government and Gillet v. Colonial Government (14 S.C., 185).

Mr. Burton, in his reply, quoted Slabber v. Bell (4 Searle, 3), and Town Council of Cape Town v. Table Bay Harbour Board (19 S.C., 117).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 13th).

Maasdorp J.: In the year 1874, Act No. 10 of 1874 was passed, providing for the construction of a railway from Worcester, via Hex River and De Staat, to Beaufort West, and in the year 1876 the construction work had advanced to the neighbourhood of what is now the Hex River Station, when it was considered necessary by the railway authorities to set about selecting a spot for a railway station, and to occupy it for railway purposes. The powers vested in them for this purpose are those contained in section 3 of Act 19 of 1874, and it was by virtue of these powers that the Railway Department contemplated taking possession of and occupying the land required for the purpose of a station. The owners of land in the neighbourhood, becoming aware of the intention of Government, took steps to secure the locating of the station at a spot most convenient to themselves, and some of them being desirous of obtaining the advantages likely to arise from the presence of a railway station on their farms, held out inducements to the authorities in the shape of a free grant of land without claim to compensation. On the 22nd day of June, 1876, R. P. van der Merwe, owner of the farm Vendutie Kraal, situated in the Hex River Valley, offered to the Government gratuitously the use of sufficient ground on his farm for railway station buildings. On the 29th of September, Mr. Brounger, the railway engineer, reported in favour of placing the station upon Van der Merwe's farm, and on October 9, Mr. Elliott, the Assistant Commissioner, wrote to inform the owner of the land that his offer had been accepted by the Commissioner. The Railway Department took possession of a site for the station, and proceeded during the course of the years 1876 and 1877 to put up the necessary buildings as they were required. Van der Merwe's object in granting the land for the station was to reap the benefits arising in consequence of the enhanced value of the rest of his property, and in February, 1878, he made preparations for selling adjacent portions of his farm. On the 5th February, he informed the Railway Department that he was about to sell some of his land in the neighbourhood of the railway station, and as the land ceded by him to Government appeared to be undefined, he asked for a diagram or plan to enable him to trace the boundaries. And Mr. Elliott stated in evidence that it was in response to this application that plan No. 2,188 was prepared and filed in the Surveyor-General's Office. Van der Merwe was referred to the Surveyor-General's Office on the 2nd day of March by the Resident Engineer, where he was told he would soon be able to obtain the necessary information relative to the land taken by the Government for railway purposes at the Hex River Station. The land expropriated by the Government remained unfenced until the year 1884, when a wire fence was constructed, in consequence of representations made by the neighbouring farmers. Until the year 1886 R. P. van der Merwe remained the registered proprietor of that portion of Vendutie Kraal upon which the railway station is situated. He died during that year, and his estate was sequestrated as insolvent in June, 1886, when the land belonging to the estate was bought from the insolvent estate by the plaintiff. I may mention here that in 1878 Van der Merwe, sen., started a claim for compensation for expropriated land, but that claim seemed to be confined to land taken for the railway, and not for the station. The Government refused to recognise his claim, and after the correspondence had run into the year 1881, the matter was dropped. It is quite clear that any right to compensation which had then accrued to Van der Merwe for land expropriated would not pass to a subsequent purchaser, and if such purchaser is now entitled to redress against the Government, his claim must be grounded on other considerations. In 1886 the plaintiff purchased from Van der Merwe's insolvent estate such land as was still vested in him. If the land in question was then duly expropriated and vested in the Government, it could not pass by purchase to the plaintiff. If, however, it should prove that steps were taken to expropriate the land, but everything had not been done to divest Van der Merwe of the ownership, then other considerations might arise. It was only in 1906 that the plaintiff advanced the claim he now makes against the defendant. As I have already pointed out, when the plaintiff bought the property the ground which the Railway Department had taken for the purposes of the Hex River Station was properly enclosed, and almost all the buildings now standing there were already constructed. The plaintiff admits that when he purchased the property he was aware that the Government was in occupation for railway purposes of the land and buildings. Such knowledge on his part has a material bearing upon the question at issue, but here again the matter is complicated by the circumstance that his title comes from the trustee in an insolvent estate, and supposing in the absence of certain necessary conditions, the title to the land vested in the trustee, the plaintiff would purchase all the trustee had a right to sell, and the question of notice of adverse rights in others would not arise. The plaintiff's claim embraces not only the area taken for station purposes, but also the land upon which the railway is constructed, and he prays that the defendant may be compelled to remove the rails, and give up possession of the land, or pay him compensation. It may be as well to dispose of this part of the case at once. Both parties seemed at the trial to agree that the actual line of railway stood on a different footing from the land taken for the station. The defendant pleaded that the ground occupied by the railway was expropriated more than thirty years ago, and has been in occupation of the railway department ever since as their property, and consequently vested by prescription in the Government before the plaintiff instituted proceedings. I find it proved by the evidence that before the middle of the year 1876 the Government had demarcated the line from Worcester to beyond the Hex River Station, had taken possession of the ground, and the work of construction had advanced in sections further than the Hex River Station. In my opinion, therefore, the defendant has established his case as far as the line of railway is concerned. I need say nothing more upon this part of the case, because the plaintiff's counsel at the trial gave up all claim in respect of the ground actually occupied by the railway. The question of prescription does not affect the land taken for the purposes of the station, and it remains to be considered whether that land vested in the Government before 1886. The answer to that question depends upon what was done in virtue of the power given by section 3 of Act 19 of 1874. In my opinion, it is clear upon the evidence that the Government, through its officers, acted throughout under and by virtue of the powers they possessed under the provisions of that section, and not in terms of any special contract entered into between Van der Merwe and the Government falling outside the provisions of the Act. The 5th paragraph of the defendant's plea gave some ground for the argument on behalf of the plaintiff, that the case of the defendant depended upon a special acquisition of land by means of a contract, which could not avail without duly executed transfer, against the trustee of the insolvent estate, and a purchaser without notice, but it was admitted at the same time that there was sufficient in the defendant's plea to indicate that the Government claimed the station ground by virtue of expropriation. Under the provisions of section 3 of Act 19 of 1874, the Government entered upon, took possession of, and used the land required for the purposes of the railway station: before doing so it was necessary, under section 11 of Act 9 of 1858, to give previous notice to the proprietor. That ample notice was given will appear from the correspondence which passed between the Government officers and the agents of Van der Merwe. Considering that the land taken for station purposes was land which the owner was not bound by law to allow the Government to take and use without requiring recompense and payment, it would, under ordinary circumstances, be necessary for the parties to proceed in terms of section 12 of Act 9 of 1858, to ascertain the compensation which Van der Merwe was entitled to. But the Legislature seems to have anticipated the possibility of a case arising where the owner, as in this case, is willing to forego his claim to compensation. The 12th section is intended to meet the case of a person who is entitled to compensation, "and who may think proper to require compensation." V. d. Merwe thought proper not to require compensation, and intimated as much to the Government. That is all in my opinion that his gratuitous offer of land for the Hex River Railway Station amounts to. It would, therefore, seem that the Government did everything it was necessary to do for the purposes of expropriation; unless actual transfer of the land is necessary effectually to complete the expropriation. Cases may arise in which the alleged expropriation is performed in such a manner that, without transfer, no notice is conveyed to subsequent purchasers of the land that it has been reduced by expropriation, and in such cases such purchasers might be entitled to redress. This happened in the case of Gillet v. Colonial Government (7 C.T.R., 187), where the Government contended that land had been expropriated to the extent of 30 feet on each side of the railway, but this contention was disallowed because there was nothing upon the land itself to indicate expropriation, and there was no notice of such expropriation to the purchaser. On the other hand, it was held in the same case that the test of expropriation is the actual use of the expropriated land for railway purposes; and that it was vain for the plaintiff in that case to attempt to prevent the department from using land on which there is an embankment for the line, however wide that embankment might be, or from using buildings erected for railway purposes. The ground in question, was to the knowledge of the plaintiff in the present case, when he purchased, enclosed, occupied and used by the Railway Department for railway purposes; and at the time he bought it had been so occupied for nearly ten years. At the time he brought his action, the Department had been in occupation for not much under 30 years. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to an order for ejectment, or to compensation, or damages. And judgment is given for the defendant, with costs.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.)]

BINASE V. MAHLUTSHANA. } 1907.
July 10th.

Set off—Necessaries supplied to wife—Prescription.

The plaintiff claimed from the defendant the return of certain cattle, alleged to have been lent to the defendant about 12 years before, or their value. The defendant claimed to set off the amount of necessities supplied by him to the plaintiff's wife, to which the plaintiff objected on the ground that the counterclaim had been barred by prescription.

Held, that as the counterclaim was capable of being opposed in compensation before the period of prescription had arrived, the plaintiff could not avail himself of the defence of prescription.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Stutterheim in an action brought by Petros Binase, of Nqamakwe, against Isaac Mahlutshana, of Upper Kabousie, to recover £20, value of certain oxen.

Appellant, it appeared, alleged that in 1886 he lent certain two oxen, of the value of £10 each, to defendant at Mookino Hill, defendant to be allowed to retain and use the oxen until they were wanted by plaintiff. In 1903 plaintiff requested the return of the cattle, and defendant then said that he had sold them and would be prepared to pay plaintiff the value. This he had failed to do. Defendant pleaded a denial of liability and a counter claim for £20. He said that plaintiff owed him £48 for maintenance of his (plaintiff's) wife, who is defendant's sister, during 1894 and 1896, and he deducted £29, the proceeds of the sale of the cattle, leaving a balance of £19 in defendant's favour. Further maintenance provided for plaintiff's wife in March and April, 1907, raised his claim to £23, which he reduced to £20 to bring the matter within the Magistrate's jurisdiction.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said he considered that the £29 already received by defendant for the cattle was an adequate remuneration for maintenance of plaintiff's wife until April, 1907. He accordingly dismissed the counter claim for the balance.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for appellant; Mr. Ingram was for respondent.

Mr. Jones said it was extremely difficult to ascertain from the Magistrate's reasons what he had really found. He submitted that the counter claim for maintenance of defendant's wife in 1894 and 1896 was not bona fide, and that defendant's evidence on this point should not have been accepted by the Magistrate. Counsel cited Grassman v. Hoffman (3 Juta, 282), and Mason v. Bernstein (14 S.C., 504), and referred to section 3, Act 6, 1861. He would not deny that £4 should have been allowed for maintenance in March and April, 1907, and he submitted that judgment should have been given by the Magistrate for plaintiff for £16.

Mr. Ingram commented on the long delay which took place before plaintiff claimed back the cattle and brought his action, and submitted that defendant's witnesses were entitled to credence. Delivery from plaintiff to defendant had not been proved. The cattle had always gone with plaintiff's wife, and in community, at any rate, she was entitled to deal with them. Counsel contended that plaintiff's wife had power to pledge her husband's credit for necessities, and she was entitled to pass over the cattle to defendant. The claim for maintenance was not prescribed, because it did not refer to goods sold and delivered.

Mr. Jones having been heard in reply,

De Villiers, C.J.: The action was brought in the Magistrate's Court to recover two oxen which the defendant was said to have borrowed as far back as the year 1886, or their value. On the face of it, it is a stale claim of 12 years ago, and I think the Magistrate was quite right in requiring clear proof of the existence of such a claim and in allowing the counter-claim for what defendant had expended on behalf of plaintiff. It appears that plaintiff had been married to his wife by Christian rites, and as there was no ante-nuptial contract, we must take it that they were married in community of property. It seems that the wife had received certain cattle from her father about a year after her marriage, and her statement is that the two oxen now in question are part of the cattle which her father had delivered to her about a year after the marriage. Then it seems that the plaintiff was dissatisfied with his wife because she bore no children to him, and, as the Magistrate found, he put her away. She then went about, and naturally was taken up by her brother, who, for a period of time at all events, looked after her, the brother being the man to whom the plaintiff says that he lent two oxen. The case now on behalf of plaintiff is that she really was not supported by defendant for the full period mentioned, but only during two months of 1907, but the defendant positively states that during 1894 and 1895 he did support plaintiff's wife, and the Magistrate must have believed the statement. On some points, no doubt, the sister contradicts him, or is not quite consistent with his evidence, but the Magistrate was satisfied that during a considerable period defendant did support his sister, and certainly for a sufficient period to make up the amount of £20, which is all he allowed. Seeing that these cattle had practically been left in the wife's custody, according to her evidence, and seeing that plaintiff had put away his wife, and that defendant had taken that wife (his own sister) and for a considerable period supported her, I consider that he was justified in claiming that there should be an allowance for that support which he had given to plaintiff's wife. But then, it is said that the claim is so stale that it has been actually prescribed. But plaintiff's claim is stale also. His claim is just as stale, and, at all events, the defendant's claim is one that is capable of compensation, and as soon as the plaintiff's claim arose defendant's claim already existed, and that therefore could be set off. So that I do not see that the question of prescription really applies in the present case, because it was a valid claim at the time when plaintiff's claim arose and if plaintiff had then sued it could have been set off against his claim. The plaintiff cannot, therefore, now, by reason of having postponed his action until the period of prescription had arisen, claim the full benefit of his claim, and say as to defendant's claim that it is prescribed. I think, therefore, that the Magistrate is right, on the whole, on the facts, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Evidence — Hostile witness — Cross-examination—Impeaching evidence.

Where the Court is of opinion that a witness is hostile to the party by whom he is called, the Court may allow such witness to be cross-examined whether he has made a former statement relative to the subject-matter of the action and inconsistent with his present testimony, and if he does not admit that he made such a statement, proof may be given that he did in fact make it.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Mount Fletcher in an action brought by respondent against appellant to recover £45 19s. 6d., damages sustained by reason of a grass fire alleged to have been lighted by appellant.

The summons called upon defendant to show cause why he should not pay plaintiff £45 19s. 6d., damage to certain forage and fencing caused by defendant in having on the 12th September last set fire to or caused to be lighted a fire on his land at the farm Newton Peak, without proper notice or warning to plaintiff, and having negligently, carelessly, and for want of due and proper precaution, allowed the fire to spread to the farm Antelope Park. The defence was that defendant did not set fire to or cause to be fired the land on Newton Peak, which did not belong to defendant, and liability was denied. Defendant also claimed certain amounts in reconvention, but at the trial this claim was abandoned.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said it was clear to the Court that the fire lighted on the farm Newton Peak spread to plaintiff's land, and that the defendant had lighted the fire, and was responsible for the damage caused. The Court based its judgment almost entirely on points of fact, deciding that plaintiff and his witnesses were to be relied upon. Judgment was given for the amount claimed, less 30s., in respect of certain wire.

Mr. Upington was for appellant (James D. Harvey); Mr. Gutache was for respondent (Ceoil St. C. Thomas).

Mr. Upington said that the appeal was brought on two grounds. The first was that upon the evidence there was no proof that appellant was the person who set fire to the grass. It was admitted that the farm belonged to defendant's sons. The other point was that the Magistrate acted irregularly in permitting plaintiff, in the course of the hearing, to lead evidence to contradict his own witness, one Christoffel. Counsel said that plaintiff appeared to have rested his claim mainly on this witness's evidence as to the identity of defendant, and then when the witness went into the box and said that he was not sure that he saw defendant light the fire, plaintiff was allowed to lead evidence to show that before the trial this man had stated that he saw defendant light the fire. Such evidence ought not to have been allowed, and as a consequence defendant had been prejudiced. He submitted that there was not sufficient evidence to identify defendant as the person who started the fire.

Mr. Gutsche submitted that the evidence of Edward and Africa was quite strong enough to connect defendant with the fire, apart altogether from Christoffel's. As to the alleged irregularity, no objection was taken at the trial, and it was now too late to raise that point. He quoted Stephen's Law of Evidence (p. 148).

Mr. Upington having replied,

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 12th).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal from the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Mount Fletcher, in an action in which the plaintiff claimed £45 19s. 6d. loss sustained by reason of the defendant's negligence in setting fire to certain lands on Newton Park, the fire having spread from there on to Antelope Park, the property of the plaintiff. The Magistrate found that the defendant had set fire to the grass, which had spread to the plaintiff's property, and he founded his judgment upon the evidence of certain native witnesses. One of these witnesses was a man called Stoffel. Stoffel, in his evidence, said that the man who set fire to the grass was a white man, wearing a white hat, but he could not be sure it was the defendant. Thereupon Stoffel was cross-examined by the plaintiff's agent as to whether he had not previously stated to the agent of the plaintiff that it was the defendant who set fire to the grass. He denied it, and thereupon the Magistrate allowed the evidence to be given to prove that the witness Stoffel had given a different version of the affair to the plaintiff and his agent. One of the grounds of appeal is that this evidence was wholly inadmissible. Now, the law of England upon the subject I think is stated correctly in Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence, Art. 131. There it is said that "every witness under cross-examination in any proceeding, civil or criminal, may be asked whether he has made any formal statement relative to the subject matter of the action, and inconsistent with his present testimony, the circumstances of the supposed statement being referred to sufficiently to designate the particular occasion, and if he does not distinctly admit that he has made such a statement, proof may be given that he did in fact make it. The same course may be taken with a witness upon his examination in chief, if the judge is of opinion that he is hostile to the party by whom he was called." The 48th section of our own Ordinance 72 of 1830 enacts that it shall be competent for any party to impeach or support the credibility of any witness produced against or for such party, in any manner and by any evidence in which and by which, if the case were depending in the English Courts, the credibility of such witness might be impeached or supported." It is not quite clear whether, at the date of the Ordinance, the law was as stated by Stephen. In the case of Greenough v. Eccles (5 C.B.—N. 3802), Williams, J., referred to the right of a party to contradict his own witnesses by other evidence relevant to the issue, as a right not only established by authority, but founded on the plainest good sense. The Court there construed the term "adverse" in the 22nd section of 17 and 18 Vict., 125, as meaning "hostile," and I do not understand from the remarks of the Judges that, in their opinion, the 22nd section had made any material alteration in the law. In the present case it is not clear that the Magistrate found that the witness was a hostile witness before he allowed the cross-examination and the rebutting testimony. I assume that the Magistrate must have so found that the witness was hostile else he would not have allowed the cross-examination. If he found that the witness was hostile I am not prepared to say he was wrong in allowing the evidence to contradict the statement of the witness. On that ground I am not prepared to set aside the verdict. The question remains upon the evidence, was he justified in coming to the conclusion that the defendant set fire to the grass? Well, there is no witness who swears directly that the defendant was the man who did it, but certainly a witness did state that there was a man on horseback, who got down from the horse and set fire to the grass, and then proceeded to drive away the defendant's cattle. About the same time that this took place, it is undoubtedly true that the defendant did ride a horse, but he said it was not a bay horse; it was rather too dark, and he had a white hat, which he says had become dirty. There is nothing to show that any other person was upon that solitary farm riding a horse and firing the grass on that occasion, and it is difficult to believe that the person who set fire to the grass was not the person who wore this white hat and rode the horse, and afterwards drove the cattle away. Now, that is a question for the Magistrate as a juror. If the case had come before a jury I do not think the Court would set aside the verdict against the weight of evidence. The Magistrate saw the witnesses, and he believed they were speaking the truth. Apparently he did not believe the defendant's evidence, so that upon the whole I am not prepared to set aside the verdict of the Magistrate on the ground of this being against the weight of evidence. The appeal will therefore be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

VOS AND SCHULTZ V. { 1907.
GREEFF. { July 11th.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £325, purporting to be signed by the defendant. The defendant denied that the signature was his.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., with him Mr. Roux, was for the plaintiffs; Mr. Buchanan, K.C., with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones, was for the defendant.

Henry de Luke Vos, one of the plaintiffs, said he lived at Prieska, where his firm carried on business as general agents, auctioneers, etc. He was also a Justice of the Peace. In December, 1906, one Hirschhorn came to him with the note now sued upon, which was signed in two places by J. J. Greeff. Witness took the note to the Standard Bank on December 31. Hirschhorn came back, and witness discounted the note for him, having made inquiries regarding Greeff's financial position. The witness deposed as to payments made by him to Hirschhorn, who said he had sold wagons, mules, and donkeys to Greeff, and had received the note in payment. The witness also spoke to interviews with the defendant. Defendant came to the office, and asked to see the note. On it being shown to him, he fainted, and went out, but did not deny his signature. Upon his returning, he looked at the note for about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, and then said the signature was not his. Later on Greeff was asked by the corporal of the police for information, but witness considered he did not give satisfactory answers. Witness was satisfied of the genuineness of the signature. A warrant for Hirschhorn's arrest was issued at the instance of witness. He thought that by this means he would get Greeff to speak the truth. Witness still believed the signature was genuine. Hirschhorn had gone away.

Hermanus Adriaan van der Merwe, assistant to the chief inspector of sheep for the Prieska and Kenhardt districts, said that he knew Greeff, and had had communications from him in writing. He knew Greeff's handwriting well. Towards the end of December, Vos showed witness the promissory note, and made inquiries of him as to the financial position of Greeff. Witness believed that the signature on the note was Greeff's. He thought the signature was a genuine one.

By the Court: He had seen about twenty letters from Greeff, and on comparing these signatures with that on the note, he thought the signature was genuine. He had never seen a forgery in his life.

Thomas B. Daly, law agent, of Prieska, said he had acted as Greeff's agent, and had had correspondence with him. When shown Greeff's signature on the promissory note, witness considered it genuine. He had no doubt at the time, nor had he any doubt now about it being Greeff's signature.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: If it is not his signature, you say it is a clever forgery.

Witness: A very good forgery.

Further cross-examined: Witness considered Greeff a distinctly honest and upright man.

[Hopley, J.: Does the fact that he, on his oath, repudiates this signature shake you in the least as to this being his signature?]

Witness: No.

[Hopley, J.: Then you can't believe him an upright and honourable man?]

I am more or less astonished at the position. I don't know what to think.

[Hopley, J.: But you used to think him an upright man. Now you think him a dishonest blackguard, a rascally perjurer—is that it?]

I don't know what to think. Until now I have never had occasion to disbelieve him. It is a strange position. I don't know exactly what to think.

Thomas J. Melville gave evidence to the effect that he believed the signature to be Greeff's.

Daniel Cornelius Boonzaier, handwriting expert, said he had had put before him several signatures of Mr. Greeff, and had compared them with the signature to the promissory note. The witness pointed out various characteristics in connection with the signature. There was a peculiarity in the joining of the loops in the initial "J," while the space was greater in every case between the two "J's" than between the second J and the G. There was also a peculiarity in the loop of the G, while in each instance the letters r e e f f were all joined together, whereas the r was not attached to the G.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: In your opinion, as an expert, would there be any doubt as to the genuineness of the disputed signatures?

Witness: I have scarcely any doubt. It is one of the surest cases I have had in my hands. Witness added that the signature on the document put in had too great freedom to admit of the theory that it had been traced. There was no sign of deliberation about it, such as would be found in a tracing on a window or through a paper on a table.

Hopley, J., pointed out that in all the signatures produced on which the witness had founded his evidence, there was the little characteristic that the final "f" ended with a straight dash, whereas in the disputed signatures the dash ended in a different way.

The witness said that, of course, a person's writing varied, and in certain circumstances there might be such a trifling variation. The dash was not a flourish, but an abrupt finishing jerk.

Hopley, J., said that in the "g" there seemed also a discrepancy between the admitted signatures and the disputed ones.

Witness said this seemed to be a smudge. He was strongly of opinion that all the signatures were written by the same person. A forger must stop often in doubt, whereas in these disputed signatures there was no sign of hesitancy. The difference between the spaces occupied by the two signatures was also remarkable.

Other witnesses were called for the plaintiffs, it being stated that Hirschhorn left the district at about the end of December, after he received the money.

Jacob J. de Greeff, the defendant, said he knew Hirschhorn, and had seen him often. In October Hirschhorn came to his place and bought a mule for £13. Witness took merchandise to the value of £10 10s., and a balance of £2 10s. was left, which he said a certain Mr. Joubert would pay. Hirschhorn said he had a case coming on in Cape Town in November. Afterwards Hirschhorn wanted to buy sheep from witness, but witness refused to let him have any until he brought his uncle to sign a promissory note. Afterwards Hirschhorn came with his uncle, who signed the note. In December Hirschhorn came again, and said he wanted to pay the £2 10s. He asked witness for a receipt. Witness asked why he wanted a receipt, and Hirschhorn said he had lost his case, and was going to surrender his estate. Thereupon witness signed the receipt. Witness was sure it was a receipt. It was not the promissory note produced. It was not true that witness bought wagons, mules, and donkeys from Hirschhorn for £325. He had never bought anything of that kind from Hirschhorn, nor did he know that Hirschhorn ever possessed such things. It was on or about the 23rd January that witness first heard anything about the promissory note. When he heard of the matter, he caused a wire to be sent to the Standard Bank inquiring if there was such a note, and on receiving a reply, he immediately went to Prieska and saw Vos. He saw the note, and told Vos it was a forgery. Vos said witness must make an affidavit, and witness told him he would come back again. Witness went to see his attorney, who sent him to Mr. Vos, in order that they might go together to the Magistrate. Then witness made an affidavit. Later in the day a policeman came to witness with a message that the corporal wanted to see him at the police station. He went there, and the corporal said he must make a declaration. Witness replied he had already made one declaration, but Vos and the corporal said he must make another. He replied to questions which were asked him, though he was unwilling. He swore he did not sign either of the documents put in, and alleged to bear his signature.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He had never on any occasion bought stock or a wagon from Hirschhorn. He had never given anyone a promissory note for a greater sum than £100. He told Vos at once that the signature was not his. Then he fainted. Witness had heard about promissory notes which Hirschhorn had altered.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

After hearing Mr. Benjamin in argument on the facts, the Court gave absolute from the instance, with costs.

Hopley, J., said he was asked on the ground of the similarity of the signatures to say that this note bore the genuine signatures of the defendant. He perfectly agreed that the signature on the note were extremely like the admitted signatures of Greeff, but that was not sufficient to justify the Court in granting provisional sentence in the face of the circumstances of the case, and of the denial of the signature on oath by the defendant. If there had been a transaction between Hirschhorn and Greeff of the magnitude supposed, then one would have expected that there would have been some corroboration of such a transaction, which would lend colour to the view that this was a genuine note given for value received. But there was no evidence of any dealing between the two people involving this large sum. The only business which is proved to have been transacted by Hirschhorn and the defendant was the sale of one mule by the latter to the former, for which Hirschhorn paid; and it is said that on paying the last instalment of £2 10s. he obtained a receipt from the defendant, thus procuring a specimen of a signature which, it is suggested, that he must have used for forging the names appended to the note now sued on. Defendant's conduct throughout was consistent with his present statement that the signatures were forgeries, for long before the due date of the note he, on hearing, as he alleges for the first time, of the existence of this note, at once telegraphed to Prieska to ascertain if in fact there was such a document, and upon his hearing that there was, he journeyed to that place and repudiated liability. He went further, for he made an affidavit charging Hirschhorn with forgery, upon which a warrant for the arrest of Hirschhorn was issued. This was at the end of January, a date at which it seems quite unlikely that defendant could have known that Hirschhorn had absconded. Hirschhorn has, as a matter of fact, absconded, or at all events it has not been found possible to arrest him upon the warrant which is still in force, and in the hands of the police of that district. To hold that this was Greeff's signature would be to hold that a man who had the reputation of being an upright man, was a perjurer. It would be unsafe for the Court to hold this must be Greeff's signature, and the Court would therefore grant absolute from the instance, with costs, leaving it to the plaintiffs, if they could get any new evidence, to re-open the matter, and plaintiffs would, in such an event have leave to claim the costs of the present case as part of the damages.

STANDARD BANK V. PHILLIPS.

Mr. Watermeyer moved for costs against the defendant of an action in which he was sued under Rule 329d on the 5th July. Costs were not asked for in the summons, and it was omitted to apply for them when the Court gave judgment. Counsel now asked for an order against the defendant for costs of the action.

[Buchanan, J.: You must give notice to the defendant, or you can only have a rule at plaintiff's own expense.]

Mr. Watermeyer said that notice had not been given to defendant, but his lordship had granted an order in a similar case previously.

[Buchanan, J.: I should not have done it then.]

Mr. Watermeyer: It was only a clerical error in the printed form of the summons, which failed to mention costs.

Buchanan, J.: It is a mistake of the attorneys' in not putting it in the summons. They should do their duty properly. You may take a rule nisi calling upon defendant to show cause on the 1st August why he should not pay costs, no costs to be allowed for this rule. The process must be carried out at the attorneys' own expense.

JORDAAN V. JORDAAN.

Arbitration—Disagreement as to umpire—Act 29 of 1898.

This was an application brought by Jacobus Louis Jordaan upon notice to Johannes Lodewicus Jordaan to show cause why the Court should not appoint an umpire in the matter of the arbitration or reference pending between applicant and respondent to determine the purchase price to be paid by respondent for applicant's share in the farm Doornkraal in the division of Somerset West.

The affidavits showed that the parties are sons of the late Gideon Jacobus Jordaan and his pre-deceased spouse, Johanna Magdalena, and are part proprietors under their parents' will of the farm Doornkraal. The property was bequeathed to them "on condition that one of them shall have the right to alienate his share only to one or more of the co-legates or proprietors of the same farm or ground, and that for a price to be fixed by two impartial men, one to be chosen by him or her who wishes to sell or alienate and the other by him or them who wishes or wish to buy."

Applicant desires to sell his share, and respondent is prepared to buy it. They have appointed as their arbitrators F. van Eysen and J. A. Vosloo respectively, but the arbitrators wish to have an umpire appointed to decide between them in case of non-agreement. Applicant suggested three names, the Resident Magistrate, Mr. W. L. Lombard, or Mr. P. R. Botha, all of Somerset East, while respondent suggested Messrs. W. Hookly, ex-M.L.A., Frederick Wienand, ex-M.L.A., P. W. Michau, M.L.C., or M. Pretorius, M.L.C., the two former of Bedford, and the latter of Cradock.

Mr. McGregor was for applicant; Mr. Upington was for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: The late Mr. and Mrs. Jordaan made a mutual will by which they disposed of certain of their property to their sons, and imposed a condition that none of the sons should have the right to alienate his share in the property to anyone except one or more of the co-legates or proprietors of the farm, and that this alienation should be at a price to be fixed by two impartial men, one to be chosen by the person who wished to sell and the other by the person who wished to buy. The applicant and respondent are two of these sons, one (the applicant) wishes to sell his portion of the farm, and the other (the respondent) is ready to buy. They cannot agree upon a price, and they have fixed upon two impartial men. These two men before going to arbitration cannot agree as to who should be the umpire in case of dispute between them. The parties agreed to arbitrate under the Act 29, 1898, which makes provision for the appointment where the parties themselves cannot agree, or where the arbitrators cannot agree. It appears this dispute has been going on for some time between the parties in Somerset East. The property is close to the town, and there is a good deal of local feeling about it. One umpire suggested is the Magistrate of the district. The Magistrate of the district, I think, where there is a dispute like this, had far better keep out of the matter, otherwise he might be a very useful man as umpire. The question in dispute is the value of a certain farm. It may be well that farmers in the neighbourhood, who know the value of the farm, should be called upon to decide this question. The two arbitrators are local farmers. A number of names have been suggested as umpire, and four names have been mentioned by the respondent of persons not exactly in the district, but in the neighbourhood, in the adjoining district of Bedford and Cradock. The applicant objects to two of the names mentioned from the Cradock district on the ground that they are both members of Parliament, and at present engaged in legislative duties. The other two names mentioned are Mr. Hockley and Mr. Wienand, both of whom are well-known men, and both of whom are impartial men, and both of them farmers. Under these circumstances the Court will order that Mr. Fredk. Wienand, who, I think, is the elder man, and, failing his acceptance, Mr. Wm. Hockly, be appointed umpire, who, in case of non-agreement of the arbitrators, shall determine the price to be paid under the conditions of the will, costs of the motion to be costs in the discretion of the arbitrators. The Court is asked to give some indication as to what course should be taken. This can only be done as advice to the parties. I cannot make a formal order on the matter. They will go to the arbitration under the terms of the will. They will have the will before them, and the conditions before them, and it will be open to the arbitrators to take any evidence they may want if they cannot of their own motion settle the dispute between the parties. If they find it necessary to take any evidence, they can take it, but that will not be part of the order.

Ex parte HARRIS.

Dr. Greer moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Maurice Harris, for an interdict restraining one L. Levenshon from removing certain movables from premises situate in the Main-road, Simon's Town, pending an action to be brought by petitioner (who is the landlord of the premises) for £40, being amount of four months' rent.

Buchanan, J.: As this is an ex parte application, a rule nisi will issue, to operate as an interim interdict, pending an action to be instituted forthwith, leave reserved to the respondent, if so advised, to move to set aside the interdict.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

BETTINGTON V. SCOTT. { 1907.
July 12th.

On taking his seat, Mr. Justice Hopley said that he wanted to make a remark in open court about this case, which was standing over for judgment. Some person or persons had been addressing envelopes to him marked private, enclosing cuttings with portions underlined. This was highly improper and foolish, because it would not affect the mind of the judge at all. He would not be swayed by such consideration. The parties apparently knew they were doing wrong, and he (the judge) would take no notice of the cuttings, beyond handing them to the Registrar to be dealt with as he thought fit.

A lady had also approached him in chambers, and wanted to make some communication about the case. This was an improper procedure, and if she had anything to bring to the notice of the judge, she should do so in open court by counsel.

GODDESS V. PIENAAR.

This was an action for the recovery of £52 7s. and £3, damages suffered by plaintiff by reason of defendant's failure to take delivery of certain four buck-wagons built for him by plaintiff.

Mr. Roux appeared for the plaintiff; there was no appearance for the defendant.

Myer Goddess, a coachbuilder and farrier, of Cape Town, the plaintiff, said that in December last defendant entered into an agreement with him under which he had to build four buck-wagons for defendant at a purchase price of £200. The wagons had to be inspected by Alfred Boag, a coachbuilder, and the balance of the purchase price had to be paid before delivery. Mr. Boag inspected the wagons when they were being built, and had given certificates that the work was satisfactory. When the wagons were completed, defendant promised to pay the balance of the purchase price (£158, as he had paid £42 in instalments) in a few days. He failed to do that, and plaintiff gave due notice on February 14 that if the wagons were not taken and the balance of the price paid, he would have them sold by public auction, and hold defendant responsible for all loss. He had to hire a store for £3 to keep the wagons in, and on defendant not taking delivery, he had the wagons sold by public auction. The four wagons fetched about £105 net, and plaintiff had consequently suffered damages in the sum of £52 7s., in addition to the £3 store rent.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment as prayed in the declaration, and also asked for the costs of an application made by defendant for a postponement, which costs had been reserved.

The Court granted judgment for £55 7s., with interest from May 10, and all costs, including the deferred costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

COOK AND CO., LTD. V. ESTATE OF STEPHAN. } 1907.
July 12th.

Promissory note—Aval—Surety—Appropriation of payments.

A., being indebted to B. in the sum of £4,325, including a promissory note for £1,500, made by A. in favour of B. or order, paid B. the sum of £4,275 on account. B. credited A. in his books with the payment, and the counterfoil of A.'s cheque book showed that the amount had been paid on account of his indebtedness, but the note was retained by B.

Held, that the plaintiff, who became holder with notice of such payment, was not entitled to recover the amount of the note from the defendant who had indorsed the note before B. as payee had indorsed it.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff company to recover from the defendant estate two sums of £1,000 and £500 in respect of two promissory notes endorsed by the late Hendrik Rudolph Stephan.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff carried on business in Cape Town, and the defendants were the executor and the assumed executor in the estate of the late Hendrik Rudolph Stephan, and they were sued in their capacity as such. Some years prior to June, 1905, Frank Cook and James Wakelin carried on business in Cape Town under the style of F. Cook Company as importers of machinery, coal, and other merchandise. The said firm dealt largely with the Croydon Brick Company. The said firm from time to time supplied the company with machinery and coal, and did certain work in connection with the kilns. The company had made payments from time to time, and there was a balance remaining due to the firm on the 30th September, 1904, amounting to £2,675 13s. 1d. In consequence thereof the said firm refused to supply the company with any further goods without a guarantee of a substantial part of the balance. The company was in need of a further large supply of coal, and in October, 1904, the said firm agreed to supply the coal in consideration of two promissory notes, amounting in all to £1,500, to be signed by the company in favour of the firm, and guaranteed by H. R. Stephan, who was to signify his consent on the back of the notes. The two promissory notes for £1,000 and £500, due on the 20th December, 1904, and 19th January, 1905, and payable at 82, Strand-street, Cape Town, were signed by the company in favour of the firm and payment was duly guaranteed by H. R. Stephan, who affixed his signature to the notes. The notes were presented on the respective due dates, but the notes were dishonoured. Due notice of the dishonouring of the notes was given by the firm to H. R. Stephan. The business of the firm was thereafter floated into a company, which was duly registered on the 5th June, 1905, with limited liability, as "F. Cook Co., Ltd.," who took over the assets of the firm, and F. Cook Co., Ltd., thereupon became the legal holders of the promissory notes. The Croydon Brick Co. went into liquidation, and there was no dividend available for concurrent creditors, as the assets of the company were swallowed up by a preferent claim of a bond for £20,000. The defendants neglected and refused to pay the amounts due, and judgment was claimed for £1,000 and £500, with interest and costs.

The plea set out that the defendants had no knowledge who the members of the said firm were, but they admitted that the firm did business to a considerable extent with the said company. The defendants had no knowledge of the allegations contained in paragraphs 4 and 5, that was as to the amount due on the 30th September; the refusal to supply further goods, and the agreement to supply the company with coal in consideration of these promissory notes being guaranteed. The defendants admitted the signing of the notes by the company in favour of the firm, and that the signature of H. R. Stephan was affixed, but they did not admit that the notes were given in pursuance of any such agreement as was alleged, or that Stephan guaranteed the payment of the notes to the firm, or that his signature signified such guarantee. The defendants did not admit the presentation of the notes as alleged, and they said, even if they were presented, they were not duly protested for non-payment in accordance with law and the plaintiff was therefore not entitled to recover thereon from the defendants. They denied the alleged dishonouring of the notes, or that due notice was given as alleged, or at all. They did not admit that the company took over the assets of the firm. The promissory notes were given by the Croydon Brick Co., Ltd., in October, 1904, to F. Cook on account of the amount then due by the former to the latter company. During the guarantee of the said notes, namely, down to the 19th January, 1905, when the second note fell due, the amount due by the former company to the latter company had increased to £4,272 and upwards, but not exceeding £4,325 18s. 4d., according to the books of F. Cook Co., and thereafter, on or about the 15th April, 1905, the Croydon Brick Co., Ltd., paid in cash to F. Cook Co. the sum of £4,272, and thereby paid and discharged the debt on account of which the said promissory notes were given, and by reason of the premises, the said promissory notes were paid and discharged, and the liability of the late H. R. Stephan (if any, which the defendants do not admit) was likewise discharged.

The plaintiffs, in their replication, admitted that the notes were not protested for non-payment, but the plaintiffs said it was at the special instance and request of Stephan, through his authorised agent, Miller, that the said notes were not so presented.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. D. Buchanan) for plaintiffs; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton, K.C., and Mr. Van der Byl), for defendants.

Frank Herbert Cook, managing director of the plaintiff company, said the company was registered in June, 1905. Prior to that he had carried on a general business, and for some years he carried on business with Mr. Wakelin as F. Cook & Co. In 1903 he was supplying coal machinery and other merchandise to the Croydon Brick Company. On the 30th September, 1904, their indebtedness amounted to £2,675 13s. 4d. for goods supplied and work time. On more than one occasion the Croydon Brick Company had to be pressed for payment. At the end of September, 1904, the secretary of the company was informed that further coal would not be supplied. After several interviews, the secretary agreed to give bills for £1,000 and £500, payable at 60 and 90 days. When he received the notes from Davis, the secretary of the company, Stephan's signature was not on them, and witness could not discount the bills at the bank. The notes were returned as the bank manager told him Croydon's name was no good. The secretary brought the notes back with the signature of H. R. Stephan on the back. Witness discounted the £1,000 note, and proceeded to supply further coal to the company. If the coal had not been supplied the works would have been more or less closed. On the due date the secretary said he could not meet the note, and witness retired it with his own cheque. Witness went to see Stephan, but was told that he was too ill to see him. The manager, Miller, asked witness to hold the matter over until he could see Stephan, and endeavour to effect a settlement. Subsequently Miller told witness not to worry, that the notes would be settled all right. On the 19th January witness presented the note for £500 at the office of the Croydon Company, and was referred to Miller, who again asked witness not to note the bills.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The company which took over from F. Cook Company at the time of the flotation had in the outstanding debts £848 3s. due by the Croydon Brick Company. There was no special endorsement making the notes over to F. Cook Company, Ltd. The auditor, who was acting for Stephan's, wrote off £500 due by the Croydon Brick Company in the accounts of F. Cook Company, Ltd., as irrecoverable. Letters with reference to the promissory notes were written and pressed in his book on the dates they bore. On many occasions he went to Miller about the debt before Stephan's death.

Harry George Davis, formerly secretary of the Croydon Brick Company, stated that on a number of occasions the company had difficulty in meeting the accounts of F. Cook Company. It was on the instructions of the directors that he approached Mr. Cook to get a further supply of coal on two promissory notes. Mr. Stephan was a director, but was then ill. When witness heard from Cook that the notes were no good he took them to Millar, and when witness got them back they bore Mr. Stephan's signature. Stephan was more interested in this Croydon Company than anyone else.

Mr. Uppington closed his case.

De Villiers, C.J., then intimated that argument might be heard on the question of appropriation.

Mr. Uppington said the evidence of the person making the bill was that he had not then intended to discharge these notes, and the evidence of the person to whom the payment was made was to the same effect. In the books of the Croydon Company these bills still remained open. The secretary said his intention in making this payment was that it should be applied to what one might call the unsecured account, and it was quite clear arrangements had to be made for a further supply of coal at a later date. There was a mutual understanding that this money was to be applied to the unsecured portion of the debt. The secretary of the Croydon Company made no effort to get these bills back. They remained in the possession of F. Cook Company. If it had been intended this cheque for £4,272 was to be applied to a discharge, and these two bills of £1,000 and £500 in the ordinary course of business, the secretary of the Croydon Company would have got these bills back. If the documents were ineffective they would not have got these bills back. If the documents were ineffective they would not have been left in the hands of F. Cook Company. Counsel cited Klopper v. Van Straaten (11 S.C.R., 94), Priest v. Stegman (15 C.T.R., 407), and Murais v. Michau and Hofmeyr (16 C.T.R., 264).

Mr. Schreiner, having been heard in reply,

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action brought upon two promissory notes, one for £1,000 and the other for £500. They were both notes made by Miller and Stephan in their capacities as directors of the Croydon Brick Co., in favour of F. Cook Co., and before the payee had endorsed the notes, they were endorsed by the late Mr. Stephan. A very interesting question has been raised as to what the actual legal position was of Mr. Stephan in reference to these notes, whether he is a mere surety or whether, by the operation of the Bills of Exchange Act, he should be treated as an endorser for the purpose of the present case. In the case of Klopper v. Van Straaten (11 S.C.R., 94), this Court held that a person who endorses a promissory note which has not been endorsed by the payee does not incur the liability of an endorser, but prima facie incurs the liability of a surety, and that Act 19 of 1883 had not altered the law in this respect. In the case of Priest v. Stegman (15 C.T.R., 407), the Court would appear to have held that the liability of an endorser would be incurred under the 54th section of the Act. That section enacts that "where a person signs a bill otherwise than as drawer or acceptor, he or she thereby incurs the liabilities of an endorser to a holder in due course." But under the 27th section of the Act, a holder in due course is "a holder who has taken a bill complete and regular on the face of it," and it would be difficult to hold that a promissory note endorsed by a stranger, and not by the payee, is a note complete and regular on the face of it. It is not necessary, however, to decide whether Stephan was surety or endorser, because, in either case, he would be discharged if the maker paid the note. It appears, from the books of Cook Company, that at the time when the payment of £4,272 was made to them by the Croydon Company there was owing to Cook Company the sum of £4,325, and it appears to me clear, from the books, that the payment of £4,272 was made in respect of that existing debt of £4,325, so that from the books of the creditors it is clear they intended to appropriate the money to the payment of the existing debt, £4,325. Then, of course, it may be said it is the debtor that must appropriate, and not the creditor. When we look at the counterfoil of the cheque book, which was given by the debtors, we find that it was a payment on account. On account of what? On account of their indebtedness to Cook Company, that indebtedness being £4,325, which included this indebtedness of the two bills of £1,500, so that it is quite clear from the documents themselves, and from the books of the parties, that there was the appropriation of the payment to the past debts. Then it is said that the creditors retained these notes, and that they still intended to hold Stephan liable for these notes, but their intention to hold him liable cannot affect his legal right. If, at the time the payment was made it was not distinctly understood between the parties that the appropriation was not to be made in a certain way, then the appropriation would be to the older debts. The older debts would, in the first instance, be paid off, and if these debts were paid off, the promissory notes were paid off, and the mere fact that the creditors chose still to retain these notes cannot affect the rights of Stephan whether he is treated as security or endorser. In my opinion, it is quite clear that the debt has been paid, that the endorser or surety's liability has ceased, and that the plaintiff, who became holder with knowledge of the payment, is not entitled to recover the same amount again from the defendants as executors of the late Mr. Stephan. For these simple reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court must be for the defendants, with costs.

The matter had been standing over for further information, and counsel now renewed the application, and said that since the first hearing petitioner had been able to obtain better terms. She was at first asked 8 per cent. interest, but had now been offered the money at 7 per cent. Counsel observed that the rate of interest in that part of the country seemed to be high.

He proposed to institute an action against Peel to compel him to give transfer and cession of the said lease. Petitioner also asked for an interdict against the Surveyor-General and Tredgold, McIntyre and Bisset, in whose possession the two original leases are, restraining them from parting with same pending the action.

Order granted for the attachment of Peel's interest in the lease ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and leave granted to sue respondent by edictal citation in an action to be instituted by applicant against Peel and others, citation returnable on the 12th August, with leave to serve interdict and notice of trial at the same time.

PINNOY V. DRISTIG.

Mr. Watermeyer applied for an extension of the return day and directions as to publication.

Ordered that publication be made as before, and that the return day be extended to the 29th August.

ANDREWS V. ANDREWS. } 1907.
} July 12th.

This was an action brought by Bertha Andrews against her husband, F. B. Andrews, of Cape Town, for an order of restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce.

Mr. Gutsche was for plaintiff; there was no appearance for defendant.

Plaintiff said she was married to defendant at Johannesburg on the 21st June, 1905. Mr. Andrews was living in Cape Town both before and subsequent to the marriage. They entered into an antenuptial contract, under which defendant agreed to give her £500, and cede and transfer to her trustee a policy on his life for £1,000, and pay the premiums as they became due, and give up his interest in any wedding presents which he had received. Witness at present had the majority of the wedding presents. She had not received the sum of £500, nor the policy. Witness was born at Worcester, Cape Colony. After the marriage she stayed in Cape Town about three months, and afterwards went to her mother in Johannesburg. Witness and her husband went to England together later on. He left her in London, and proceeded to the Continent. They returned to Cape Town about January, 1906. Witness proceeded to Johannesburg, where, in April, 1906, she gave birth to a child. Witness had remained in Johannesburg about 17 months. Defendant promised to go and bring her back, but he did not do so. He had allowed her £10 a month. In January, 1907, defendant paid a visit to Johannesburg, but only stayed three days, promising to return in February and bring her to Cape Town. He, however, did not return in February. Defendant had not given her any satisfactory reasons for not taking her back. Witness came down to the Cape a few weeks ago with the intention of rejoining him. He did not, however, even come to the railway station to meet her, although she had written to him saying that she was coming down.

[Buchanan, J.: I suppose some dispute arose between you?]

Witness: No, nothing. He had forbidden me to come.

[Buchanan, J.: Have you any suspicion of anything?—No. Of course, people talk a lot.

[Buchanan, J.: It seems an extraordinary thing on his part.]

Plaintiff's father also gave evidence as to having received a letter (produced) from defendant. When witness saw defendant all that the latter said was that he could not afford to keep his wife and child. When defendant visited his wife in Johannesburg they were apparently on affectionate terms.

Counsel read correspondence, from which it appeared that defendant had intimated his intention of withdrawing appearance if the claim for payment of £500 at once was withdrawn, plaintiff to have custody of the child, with reasonable access to him (defendant), and he on his part to pay £8 a month towards the maintenance of the child until her marriage.

Buchanan, J., said that the question of the conditions sought to be imposed by the defendant could be argued on the return day of the rule.

Order granted, directing defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before the 20th July, failing which, rule to issue calling upon him to show cause on the 1st August why he should not be ordered as prayed in the declaration, with costs of suit.

GRANT V. GRANT.

This was an action brought by Charlotte Grant, of Burgersdorp, against her husband, Charles Dunraven Grant, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce.

Mr. Toms was for plaintiff; there was no appearance for defendant, who was believed to be in Johannesburg.

Defendant had been sued by edictal citation, and leave had been given to plaintiff to have her evidence taken at the Circuit Court, Burgersdorp. Counsel read the record of evidence taken at the Circuit Court.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 19th August, failing which, to show cause on the 30th August why a decree of divorce should not be granted as prayed, service as before.

BOYES V. BOYES.

This was an action brought by Johanna Magdalena Boyes, of Prince Albert, against her husband, Charles Duncan S. C. Boyes, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce.

Mr. De Waal was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

Plaintiff gave evidence, from which it appeared that she was a widow at the time of the marriage. Defendant was a dentist, but was not licensed to practise. He moved about the country a good deal, and ultimately left, saying that he was going to a country where he could practise in his own name. He sent the plaintiff a letter, in which he complained bitterly that she had not helped him to get a practice out of her means. He expressed his disappointment with the marriage. Defendant was now in India.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to plaintiff on or before the 19th October, failing which, to show cause on the 12th November why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs.

LESTER V. LESTER.

Mr. Watermeyer moved for a decree of divorce, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights. Counsel said that the rule had inadvertently been made returnable for the 14th July, which happened to be a Sunday.

Ordered to stand over until Tuesday next.

Postea (July 16th).

Decree of divorce granted with costs, and forfeiture by defendant of benefits of the marriage.

SILBERMAN V. SILBERMAN.

Mr. Lewis moved for a decree of divorce, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule absolute, with costs.

EVANS V EVANS.

Mr. Roux moved for a decree of divorce, with custody of the minor child, and payment of £3 per month as maintenance of the child, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule absolute, with costs.

JANSON V. JANSON.

Mr. Toms moved for a decree of divorce and a declaration that defendant had forfeited her share of the benefits of the marriage, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule absolute as prayed.

LEWIS V. INSOLVENT ESTATE WILLIAMS.

This was an application upon notice to the trustee in the respondent estate to show cause why an order should not be granted against him to forthwith pay taxed costs incurred by applicant in connection with certain proceedings in the matter of Lewis v. Insolvent Estate Williams (17 C.T.R., 521).

Applicant had, it appeared, instituted proceedings against respondent for an order for delivery of certain furniture and fittings of the billiard room at the residence of insolvent, Saxmundham, See Point, which applicant alleged were his property. The matter came before the Court on the 11th June, and the learned Judge, while declining to grant the order asked for, suggested that the parties should come to terms, ordered applicant to proceed by action, and directed the question of costs to stand over. Subsequently negotiations were entered into, and after the declaration had been issued, W. A. Currey (the trustee), as he said, gave the applicant the benefit of the doubt, and said he was prepared to hand over the articles, only on the understanding that the estate should not suffer in the matter of costs. Mr. Currey complained that he had been rushed into the proceedings. The applicant, however, denied that he had rushed the trustee into litigation, and declined to accept the condition sought to be imposed.

Affidavits having been read, Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for applicant; Mr. Close was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin said that the procedure adopted by applicant was not improper, and submitted that he was now entitled to his costs. The facts, his lordship found, were too complicated to be decided on motion, and ordered applicant to proceed by action. The applicant's attorney had not exhibited any undue haste. Respondent had ample time to investigate the claim of the applicant before proceedings were instituted. Even to-day the respondent occupied a most unreasonable position. He had handed over the furniture, and yet on the affidavits he impugned the bona fides of the applicant's claim. That was not in very good taste.

Mr. Close said that the trustee was faced with two claims, one by the insolvent's wife, and the other by his cousin (Lewis), representing all the furniture found in the insolvent's premises. He was entitled to facilities for a full and complete investigation into such an extraordinary situation, but he had not had an opportunity of going thoroughly into the matter. Counsel cited Giraffe v. Estate Goldess (20 S.C., 552). He contended that the trustee had adopted a reasonable attitude throughout, and that he should not be mulcted in costs occasioned by the precipitate action of the applicant.

Mr. Benjamin, in his reply, said that if any one were responsible for the costs which had been incurred through the delay, it was David Ayr and Co.

Buchanan, J.: This is an application for costs, and a fundamental principle which guides the Court in granting costs is that where the parties are in the wrong, all necessary costs should be granted against those parties, but the Court always sets its face against allowing unnecessary costs to be piled up in any application or in any motion.

The matter originated out of an application on motion for an order to compel the trustee of an insolvent estate to deliver up certain property which he found in the insolvent estate, and which was claimed by applicant. At the time this motion came on the trustee certainly had not had a very long time to consider the matter, and he felt he was being rushed, and had not had time to consult the creditors fully. Well, I think the trustee deserved some little sympathy in the matter, but still, on the whole, I thought when the matter came on he might perhaps have come to some decision by that time. The application was made by affidavit on notice of motion, and so many questions were in dispute, and the question as to whether this applicant had any right whatever to succeed was so uncertain, that I felt it could not be decided on motion, but I allowed this notice of motion to stand as summons in the case. Now, there is nothing which requires that a summons should be taken out instead of a notice of motion, and had the application been altogether unfounded and unnecessary, then the applicant would have had to pay costs of the notice of motion, but the notice was allowed to stand as summons, and, as usual in such cases where a motion is brought forward and action is afterwards taken, the costs of that would become costs in the cause. Then we come to consider whether the motion was wholly necessary. The trustee in this case thought it advisable to give up the furniture, and thus admitted that he was in the wrong, and consequently he ought to pay the costs of the motion. He did not offer to do so, and while the delay was going on, the declaration was prepared and filed. Well, as the notice of motion was allowed to stand as summons, the next ordinary step would be to file declaration, but it was unnecessary to incur costs by respondent in that matter, and the costs of the original motion only will be allowed and the costs necessary up to and including the filing of declaration will also be allowed. Then come the costs of this application. Well, there has been a great deal of correspondence between the attorneys, and affidavits, all of which make very interesting reading, and are to some extent very entertaining, but they were wholly unnecessary to the parties of this case, and, looking at the way in which the matter has been conducted, I am not inclined to allow more as to the costs of this application than the bare costs of the application, excluding the costs of all the correspondence and all the affidavits filed. I think that a great deal of unnecessary licence has been taken by the parties, and I do not think these costs ought to be charged against the unfortunate clients in the case. The order will be that the costs of the original motion will be allowed, and costs up to and including the filing of declaration be allowed and that costs of this application, excluding the costs of all correspondence and affidavits, be allowed. The rest of the costs will not be allowed.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

CHASE AND ANOTHER V RIGG.

This was the return day of a summons calling upon respondent to show cause why she should not be declared incapable of managing her own affairs, and a curator appointed to manage her estate.

Mr. M. Bisset was for applicants; Mr. Sutton appeared as curator ad litem of the respondent.

Mr. Sutton said that he had seen the respondent, and he was unable to satisfy himself that she was of unsound mind. He desired that the respondent should come to the Court and be seen by the judge, and suggested that the case should stand over until the 2nd August.

Mr. Bisset said that his clients did not oppose a postponement, but in the meantime it was desirable that some one should be appointed to manage her estate. He suggested that Mr. Coulter should be appointed interim curator.

[Buchanan, J.: He will have power to conserve the estate, but he must not part with any of the assets.]

The matter was postponed until the 2nd August, and Mr. Coulter was appointed curator of respondent's property pending result of the action, and Mr. Sutton to continue as curator ad litem.

Trade mark—Unauthorized registration—Expunction.

This was an application upon notice to the respondents to show cause why the Registrar of Deeds should not expunge from the register a certain trade mark registered on the 2nd March, 1905.

Mr. Roux was for applicants; Mr. W. J. van Zyl was for respondents.

From the affidavits it appeared that the plaintiff company (of Minneapolis, Minn., U.S.A.) had been in the habit of selling their cereal food (called Cream of Wheat) to respondents and to no others direct in this country. Respondents complained that other firms were able to sell Cream of Wheat in South Africa, and to prevent this they registered applicants' trade mark. Applicants having read in a certain paper that their trade mark was registered here in the name of respondents, decided to have this registration cancelled, and to apply to have their trade mark registered in their own name.

Having heard counsel in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J., said that applicants had a trade mark which they wished to register, and which they found they could not now register owing to the previous registration of a trade mark by respondents. From the correspondence it appeared that applicants at no time agreed to appoint respondents as their agents, although they were willing to sell only to them for export to this country. Nowhere did it appear that applicants had in any way given respondents the right to register applicants' trade mark. Notwithstanding that respondents had registered it, and as they had no right to do that, the Court would authorise the Registrar to expunge the mark registered by respondents from the register. Respondents to pay the costs.

Transfer duty—Cancellation of sale—Act 5 of 1884, sections 18, 20 and 21.

Where a sale of immovable property is cancelled and no portion of the purchase price has been paid, no transfer duty is payable: but where a portion of the price has been paid, duty is payable on that portion.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones appeared for the applicants in each matter, and moved for the cancellation of certain sales. The principal question to be determined was whether the applicants were liable to pay transfer duties on the sales which it was sought to cancel, and if so to what extent. Counsel, in argument, cited Ex parte Sterens (6 C.T.R., 150), Liquidators, South African v. Orange Free State Mining Association (1906, T.S.C., 346), Scott v. Isaacs (12, C.T.R., 791), and Estate Owen (16, C.T.R., 79, 290, and 439).

[Buchanan, J.: There are three applications before the Court. In each case application is made for the cancellation of certain contracts of sale under the 18th section of the Transfer Duty Act, No. 5, 1884, which reads: "As often as any contract of sale, upon which duty shall be payable, shall be set aside or cancelled, or declared or made void by the judgment of any competent Court, the transfer duty upon such sale, if unpaid, shall not be payable, and if paid shall be returned." I take it, therefore, that though no transfer duty is payable on a sale cancelled by the Court, the judgment of the Court may impose any condition that seems required by the justice of the case in granting this order for the cancellation of the sale. In the case of the Fernwood Estate, the Court will order that the sale be cancelled without any further condition. The rule will be made absolute, and no condition will be imposed. The effect of the order will be that there will be no transfer duty payable at all. In that case there has been no portion of the purchase price paid. In the two subsequent applications there have been payments made on account. When we look at the two subsequent sections of the Act, we find that the Act imposes a duty upon the transfer of any land from one person to another, but where no transfer is effected, then only in certain cases is the duty payable. Upon the 20th section, it is competent for the purposes of a contract sale by mutual consent to cancel that contract within six months, and if no part of the purchase price has been paid, or no consideration given for the cancellation of the contract, then under section 20 of the Act there is no duty upon such sale. In the case of Albrecht there was no written contract put in, and I do not think that that section applies to Albrecht's case, but it does apply to Friedlander's case. In the case of Friedlander a number of lots of ground were put up by the applicants for sale, a number of them were bought by different people, and on a number of these sales no portion of the purchase price has been paid at all. In regard to these sales, the Court, in ordering the cancellation of these sales, finds that they come under the 18th section, and the rule will be the same as the rule in the Fernwood Estate. All sales by which no purchase price of any kind has been paid will be cancelled under the 18th section of the Ordinance, and consequently no duty will be paid on those sales. In regard to the sales on which portions of the purchase price have been paid, the Court will apply the principle of the 21st section of the Act, which is to the effect that as often as a contract of sale upon which duty is payable shall be by mutual consent cancelled, and a part of the purchase price has been paid, then transfer duty shall be payable only upon the part of the purchase price which has been paid. The 21st section, it is true, is a section by which cancellation takes place by mutual consent, but where persons under written declarations of sale give the right of cancellation, if the conditions are not carried out, it is in effect a mutual consent to cancel the sale, and, therefore, in ordering the cancellation under the 18th section, I think I should follow the principle laid down in the 21st section. The spirit of the Act seems to be that where a sale is cancelled, and no portion of the purchase price has been paid, no duty should be payable, but where there has been a portion of the purchase price paid, duty will be payable on that portion of the purchase price which has been paid, and as to the balance in Friedlander's case, any balance after the duties have been paid the seller is entitled to keep, that will be declared forfeited, and the rule will be made absolute, duty to be paid on the portions of the purchase price paid, the balance declared forfeited, with costs against the parties. With regard to Albrecht's estate, the same order will be made, and the sale will be declared cancelled, on condition that the transfer duty is paid on any portion of the purchase price which has been paid. From that amount, the sellers will be entitled to deduct their interest and costs, and the balance, if any, will be ordered to be paid over to the Master. In the Fernwood Estate the rule will be made absolute, with costs; in Albrecht's case the rule will be made absolute on paying transfer duty on the amount of the purchase price paid, from the balance the sellers to deduct interest and costs, and the balance, if any, to be paid to the Master; and in Friedlander's case the sale is cancelled, on condition that the duty is paid on the amount of the purchase price paid, the balance to be forfeited, with judgment for costs against respondents.

Mr. Payne moved for the admission of Frederick Kimberley Loewenthal as an advocate.

Application granted, oath to be taken before the Registrar of the High Court of Griqualand, at Kimberley.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL V. BOOSE.

This was an application for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for applicants; Mr. Rowson was for defendant.

Mr. Buchanan applied for a postponement until to-morrow to enable applicants to file additional affidavits.

Mr. Rowson submitted that if a postponement were allowed applicants should pay the costs of the day.

Postponed until to-morrow, question of wasted costs to be mentioned at the hearing.

GOLDFOOT V. SIMSON.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a certain promissory note.

Mr. Lewis (for plaintiff) said that he could not at present ask for provisional sentence as he was not in possession of the notes. The notes, he believed, had been in Cape Town, but had, for some unexplained reason, been sent back to Johannesburg.

Dr. Greer (for defendant) pointed out that there had been previous postponements, and on Friday last Mr. Justice Buchanan intimated that unless the notes were in court to-day, the summons would be dismissed.

Mr. Lewis applied for a further postponement.

Hopley, J.: As both counsel are agreed that Mr. Justice Buchanan only postponed the case last time on the understanding that if the notes were not produced to-day, the summons would be dismissed, I think I can only carry out his intimation, and order that the summons be dismissed, with costs.

HOWARD V. MABUYA.

Mr. Louwrens moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £100, with interest from the 30th June, 1906, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest. Counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones (for defendant) said his client's position was that he denied the validity of the bond in that the power of attorney on which the bond was passed was never signed by him. Under the circumstances, he submitted that the Court should appoint a day for hearing evidence as to the alleged signature.

[Hopley, J.: Who appeared before the Registrar of Deeds and purported to act under the defendant's power of attorney?]

Mr. Jones: One Gustave Donnian.

Mr. Louwrens submitted that the Court could determine the question on the affidavits. He cited Bright and Others v. Durwood's Executors (11 S.C. 357).

Mr. Jones said that it was a long-standing practice in cases of this kind to direct that evidence should be led as to the disputed signature, and he cited Louw v. Harris and Freeman (1876, Buchanan, 143).

The matter was set down for the hearing of evidence on the 23th August.

OUTDSHOORN BUILDING SOCIETY AND SAVINGS BANK V FRY.

WALKER V. BRUNT (N.O.).

Insolvent estate—Trustee—Expenditure by trustee on property of insolvent.

Applicant's estate had been sequestrated as insolvent. The immovable property consisted of a house in a very dilapidated condition, and respondent, the only creditor who proved in the estate, having appointed himself sole trustee, spent a considerable sum on repairing the property before attempting to realize it.

Held, that he was not justified in charging the moneys so spent against the estate as part of the costs of administration.

This was an application upon notice brought by Mrs. Walker, calling upon the trustee in her insolvent estate to show cause why the account called the first liquidation account should not be amended by striking out an item of expenditure, Glendore Villa, Claremont, £753, with the exception of £2 2s. paid to the "Cape Times" for advertising the sale of the property, and £12 2s. 1d. paid to the Suburban Municipal Waterworks for water rates, why he should not be ordered to file a correct and proper first liquidation and distribution account in the estate of the insolvent, and to pay costs of this application de bonis propriis.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., was for applicant; Dr. Greer was for respondent J. O. Brunt.

Having heard affidavits and counsel in argument,

Hopley, J.: The circumstances of this case are peculiar, and, as far as I know, the application, in form, at all events, is a novel one. In June, 1906, Mrs. Walker was in possession as the owner of the house called the Wilderness or Glendore Villa, at Claremont, which she had purchased not directly from the respondent in this case, but through a broker, who had purchased the property from the respondent, and had immediately re-sold it to her. She now says that misrepresentations were made to her as to the state of the property at that time, but of course she must hold to the property such as she found it. She paid something like £4,000 for the property, and I suppose paid £1,000 in cash, and there seems to have been a bond on first mortgage for £3,000. She bought the property with the idea of making a boarding-house of it; but very soon found that, owing to the badness of the times and the defective condition of the property, it was not possible to carry on such an establishment. Matters drifted from bad to worse, and the property also drifted from bad to worse, with the result that in June, 1906, she was compelled to relinquish the struggle. She was sued by the present respondent, Mr. Brunt, on his mortgage bond, and was forced into insolvency. Matters after that went on in the ordinary course. The estate was in liquidation, and meetings of creditors were called. In this particular case the only creditor that has proved at all is Mr. Brunt himself. He was the only one, and elected himself sole trustee. Since such election he has given himself as trustee directions from himself as creditor as to the management of this estate. Well, when he came into the place he found that the property was in a very unsatisfactory and dilapidated condition, and the question then arose to himself whether he should at once proceed to realise this estate as it stood, or whether he should try to make it look better so as to fetch a better price in the market, or to make it more comfortable to live in? He is living at the house. He says that this idea all along was to sell it. Now comes the question whether in sending in his account and plan of distribution, which he has done after nine months, he is entitled to include a large sum of money which he has expended on the property in putting it into a better state. It is not a small sum, and the principle involved seems to me to be a very important one. In this comparatively small estate this property was put up to auction, and it had fallen into such a state that, although Mrs. Walker had a few years before paid £4,000 for it, the only bid the respondent could get was £1,000. That may be accounted for in more ways than one. Between the two causes, the depression in immovable property and the unsatisfactory state of the property itself, it was probably considered at the time by Mr. Brunt, and rightly considered, very difficult indeed to get rid of the property unless he spent more money upon it. Now, may he charge what he has spent which amounts to over £750, against the estate, and may he, consequently, say that the liabilities of this insolvent estate have been increased, and fairly increased, by him by the amount of between £700 and £800? In my opinion he has no right to do this, if I may express an opinion upon it at this stage of the account. It comes to this, that practically this is an application to the Court to approve or disapprove of the account and allow it to pass, or otherwise. Now it appears to me that when an insolvent surrenders an estate he surrenders it as it is at the time of his insolvency, and the creditors must make the best of it in their own interests. The liabilities of the insolvent are stated and fixed and determined upon the day of the sequestration, and are not to have subsequent additions by large sums of money, however meritorious the object may be for which they have been expended. I think if such expenditure is incurred at all it must be done by the creditors at their own expense and at their own risk, and, even so, if they do it in such a way that eventually the insolvent is damaged, I should think the insolvent might have some cause of complaint. In this particular case expenditure has been incurred, and I do not think such expenditure ought to be fairly brought up in the account as part of the administration costs of this estate. That being my feeling, the only difficulty I had at the beginning of the case, was as to whether or not the insolvent had a right to come here and object to the account, but on the whole I have come to the conclusion that it would be an injustice not to allow her to appear to show that a very much larger liability in her estate would be shown upon the account than would be the case if the liabilities were taken at the date she was forced into insolvency. Roughly speaking, she owed £3,000. If this account were allowed to pass, her liabilities would be increased to £3,700, or something like that. It is said that all this will go back to the estate by the enhanced price which will be obtained upon the sale of the property. I do not think that that necessarily follows. There may be a further fall in the property market, and even with this expenditure a lower price than the one which the trustee could have got a year ago might be realised. It is not right to encourage trustees to incur expenditure upon a sort of speculative hope that they will get higher prices for the thing they are about to sell. If all the creditors come together in solemn conclave and undertake to spend money so that the property may have a better prospect at a sale, they may do so, but even so, I do not think they have any right to increase the liabilities of the estate by the amount they may spend. The principle adopted by the trustee is one of which I cannot, as at present advised, approve. I think it would be unfair not to allow a person in the position of the insolvent to come and point out this state of affairs, and to ask the Court not to allow the account and plan to go through and be confirmed, and become a judgment of this Court without protest. If I were ruling finally upon this point, I should strike that item out by cutting it out of the account, but there has been a sort of consent leading to a course of conduct which I think will facilitate the course of the liquidation of this estate, and which will be in the interests of all parties, so that I do not feel disposed in view of such consent to make a final order in regard to those items. Mr. Brunt has consented, through his counsel, to take the direction of the Court as to how he should proceed with this estate, and I think that, in accordance with previous rulings of this Court, I should direct that he do not further delay and speculate as to the rises and possible good prices and good offers that he might procure. They may never come. The Court has held more than once that it is the duty of trustees to realise promptly even if they have to do it at such prices as seem ruinous at the time; if the creditors chose to wait they may wait but only a reasonable time. In this case considerable time has elapsed, and I think that the direction of the Court, which I should be willing to give, and which the trustee says he is willing to abide by, is that he proceed to sell this property within the next two months. I say nothing about these disputed items at the present moment as a final judgment. They ought to be cut out of this account. They may be brought up again in the final account, but I think it would be wise on the part of the trustee not to include them. The costs of this application will stand over until the final account is filed. If the respondent leaves out the items altogether, then I think he should pay the costs of this application. The order of the Court will be that, by consent the respondent undertakes to realise the house Glendore Villa within two months, the disputed items are to be expunged from the present account, and may, if respondent is so advised, be raised in the final account, costs to stand over to abide the ruling of the Court on such final account. If, however, the items are abandoned as against the insolvent estate by the respondent, then the respondent pay the costs de bonis propriis.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

Ex parte GARLICK AND { 1907.
OTHERS. { July 17th.

Dr. Greer moved, as a matter of urgency, for the appointment of Gother Mann (general manager and secretary of the South African Association) as provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of J. and A. Rae, trading in Strand-street, Cape Town, pending the appointment of a trustee or trustees, with leave to the provisional trustee to carry on the business.

[Hopley, J.: This is a very skimpy petition. The insolvents are hardware merchants, and this is not a case in which the assets might be destroyed if a provisional trustee were not appointed. One of the creditors asks for the appointment of a manager of an estate association to carry on a business which the insolvents themselves who may be presumed to understand their business, have been unable to carry on at a profit.]

Dr. Greer pointed out that the petition was presented by John Garlick and others. He took it that there were other creditors, [Hopley, J.: I do not see any other creditor mentioned in the petition. It is a petition by Mr. Garlick's manager, Mr. Morton.]

Dr. Greer: It would be to the interests of the creditors to carry on the business as a going concern.

Hopley, J., said that he was by no means satisfied on that point. It was quite possible that it would be the best thing for the creditors that the business should be closed for the present.

Dr. Greer: The creditors, apparently, do not think so.

[Hopley, J.: One of them does not.]

Dr. Greer asked his lordship if he would be prepared to allow the matter to stand over for further particulars?

Hopley, J.: I should like to know the amount of the liabilities, the number of creditors, who are joining with the petitioner, and whether the vast bulk of the creditors are in favour of this risky proceeding. I cannot grant anything on the present petition.

CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL V. BOOSÉ.

This was an application to make final a provisional order granted on the 3rd July for the sequestration of the defendant's estate.

Petitioners alleged that defendant was indebted to them in the sum of £111 15s. 5d., being the amount of a promissory note for Municipal rates for 1905, with interest, and taxed costs of certain proceedings in the Magistrate's Court. There were also rates due for 1906 and 1907, and water charges. Petitioners held no security for the claim or any part thereof. The only asset which the defendant had been found to be possessed of was landed property in Roeland-street, Cape Town. Petitioners believed defendant was possessed of certain shares or mining rights. The market value of the property in Roeland-street could only be taken at £2,750, and it was mortgaged in two sums of £5,500 and £4,500. The former bond was held by the Church of the Province of South Africa.

Defendant denied that he was insolvent or that it would be for the benefit of his creditors that his estate should be placed under sequestration. He had now pending an action in this Court in which he claimed £16,000, which action he was prepared to carry to a legitimate conclusion. But for this action, the present proceedings would not have been commenced. Defendant also said that he had paid £10 on account of the rates. He added that he had been in good expectation that the provisional order would be superseded.

Petitioners, in replying affidavits, said that the negotiations carried on with a view of having the provisional order superseded failed because defendant had not provided security. They denied that they had obtained the provisional order because of the action commenced by defendant against a third party. As to the payment of £10 by defendant, portion had been applied to payment of water charges on property at Sea Point, and the rest was put to his credit in the books.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for applicant; Mr. Rowson was for respondent.

Mr. Rowson, with the indulgence of the Court, read a further affidavit by defendant, in which he said that he had an interest in the Kensington Estate, Maitland. He appended a balance-sheet and claimed that he was not insolvent. Counsel argued that, in estimating the value of the defendant's assets, the applicants were not justified in taking the price that the property would fetch at a forced sale.

[Hopley, J.: Then what should we value property on?]

Mr. Rowson: On what it would fetch in normal times.

[Hopley, J.: But what are normal times, and when? Some people think that property will go still lower, and others are hoping that it will improve. How are we to know that normal values are not prevailing to-day?]

Mr. Rowson said that they could not take present values as normal.

Hopley, J., said that he was by no means sure whether people would not be ready to take property at a gift if the values continued to fall so much, and the rates continued to rise to such an extent.

Mr. Rowson said that he would like to get hold of some property on those terms.

Hopley, J., said he did not say that it had taken place, or that it would take place, but he could quite imagine that such a state of things might happen, say, in regard to a cottage at Maitland.

Mr. Rowson urged that the defendant had put reasonable valuations on his assets, and that the balance-sheet disclosed assets at £16,036, showing a balance in favour of defendant of £621 5s. 6d. Counsel went on to argue that the applicants had agreed to accept the South African Association, representing the first bond-holders, as debtors for the rates, the association having taken over the collection of the rents. The association had not shown that they did not take over the liability to pay the rates when they took over the fructus of the property. Mr. Rowson submitted that the applicants had not satisfied the requirements of section 3 of Act 38, 1884, by setting out the grounds on which they believed it would be for the benefit of the creditors that defendant's estate should be sequestrated. He contended that Mr. Boose should be allowed an opportunity of fighting out his claim against the Muizenberg Syndicate.

Without calling upon Mr. Buchanan.

Hopley, J.: This is an application under Act 38, 1884, and it sets forth clearly enough in the petition that the petitioner considers that respondent is insolvent, and asserts that it would be for the benefit of his creditors that this estate should be sequestrated. At the time of the original petition he set forth that the respondent had certain property in Roeland-street, the present value of which was something under £3,000, or, at all events, the municipal value was less than £3,000. The actual value may be taken as somewhat higher; but there are two bonds against the property, which, irrespective of interest, amount to £10,000. On that asset alone there is hopeless insolvency disclosed. Petitioners also said that they believed that the respondent had something in the way of mining shares, but that they were not aware that he had any other property. One of his complaints is that they did not at that stage search the registers of the Colony to find out whether he had any more property. As far as I can see, what he says is that, had they searched in the Deeds Registry, they would have found that there was a thing called the Kensington Estate, Maitland, in which it is said that defendant has one-twelfth interest, but I don't know how anybody, even by minute searching, would have found that his name was mixed up with the Kensington Estate, Maitland. It seems to me that the onus lies upon the person attacked, the respondent, when it is alleged that he cannot pay his debts, of pointing out assets which would change the balance from one of insolvency to one of solvency. Defendant now puts in a statement of his affairs, in which he attempts to show assets larger than the liabilities which he admits. He admits liabilities amounting to £15,414, but he says that he has assets exceeding that amount, and he brings up his interests in the Kensington Estate at £9,920. I cannot possibly in these times take that as being anything like a proper valuation of that holding. There is nothing in the world here to show that that £9,920 is not an absolutely fantastic valuation at the present time. I cannot look upon values which prevailed at times of greater prosperity, when there was active speculation in land going on, as being the proper criterion. I cannot make a creditor wait for what defendant's counsel calls "normal times," and I cannot hold as a matter of common-sense that, because a few plots at Maitland have been sold for £28, the whole would work out at that figure, so that the price they would get would be something like £9,000 or £10,000. It seems to me that that is not a fair valuation, it is not business-like, it is not practical, and it is not common-sense. As to the other items in the balance-sheet, I do not see how I can accept them at all. If I take the value of the land alone at present land prices, it seems to me that there is no ignoring the fact that defendant is absolutely and hopelessly insolvent at the present time. The Town Council have offered to withdraw proceedings if the defendant pays the costs or provides security for the costs, but even that the defendant has not been able to do. It is said that he has a large claim against a body called the Muizenberg syndicate. It is impossible for me to consider things of that sort. It may be a claim that will succeed wholly or partly, or it may be a claim which is utterly hopeless, and then again it may be against people who are substantial or who are wholly unsubstantial. I do not know what the nature of the claim is, and all I can say is that I do not think I can take it into consideration. If it is a substantial claim founded upon good legal grounds against a company that is substantial and worth going against, then if his estate is made insolvent the trustee may take up the claim. I cannot help feeling that the defendant, as a matter of fact, is in a hopeless state of insolvency at the present moment, and that a final order of sequestration should be granted. Final order granted, with costs, including costs of yesterday's postponement.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Fairbridge, Arderne and Lawton. Respondent's Attorney: E. J. Sydney.]

BLUMENFELD V. FIELD AND CO.

This was an application brought by Sophy Blumenfeld upon notice to Louis Klaas and George Wallis, carrying on business at Oudtshoorn as L. Field and Co., to show cause why Louis Leopold Leonard Nel should not be appointed provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Isaac Klaas, with full power to administer and liquidate the estate. In a cross-application, respondents asked the Court to appoint J. A. Foster and J. R. King as joint provisional trustees.

From the affidavits, it appeared that the applicant, who is the insolvent's wife, and who was proceeding in her maiden name, claimed against the estate for the amount of a settlement made to her by insolvent under the antenuptial contract. She said that she represented the majority of the creditors in value. Respondents said that they represented the majority of the creditors in number. Hence the deadlock. In the course of the affidavits, questions were raised as to the bona fides of certain claims which had been filed, and it appeared that the trustee or trustees would have some rather delicate problems to solve. The insolvent also filed an affidavit in which he denied that his estate was insolvent.

Mr. Upington was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for respondents.

Hopley, J., suggested that the parties should agree to the appointment of Mr. Foster as sole trustee.

Mr. Upington thought the best course would be to appoint some outsider altogether.

[Hopley, J.: Very well; I think so, too, if you can only suggest a name.]

Mr. Upington said that he was unable to name anyone, and that his attorneys were not in court.

Hopley, J., said that they ought to have been.

The matter was allowed to stand over until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and his lordship suggested that in the meantime the parties should endeavour to come to some arrangement.

[The Court did not sit on July 18th.]

KRAMER V. INSOLVENT ESTATE KOPELOWITZ AND CO.

This was an application brought by R. Kramer upon notice to the trustees in the respondent estate to show cause why applicant should not be given leave to purge default in an action instituted by the respondents against him, why the filing of plea should not be allowed to stand over pending Mr. Kramer's return from England, and why respondents should not pay costs of this application.

From the affidavits, it appeared that Mr. Kramer had in May last been ordered to Carlsbad for treatment, and that he was expected to return to this colony during August. It was impossible to draw the plea without instructions from the applicant. Respondents desired that the case should be heard during the August term. The estate, they said, would be prejudiced by the action being hung indefinitely up.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor, K.C.), was for applicant; Dr. Greer was for respondents.

Mr. Schreiner said that in February an action was commenced by the trustees to have Mr. Kramer declared a partner in the firm of Kopelowitz and Co. That action, however, was withdrawn, and subsequently a fresh summons was issued on the very day Mr. Kramer left by the mail steamer, viz., the 22nd May. The summons was vague, and later a declaration of an elaborate nature was issued, and it was impossible to answer that declaration in the absence of the defendant, who was expected to arrive in the Colony on the 20th August.

Dr. Greer said that the trustees were acting in a fiduciary capacity, and they desired the case to be heard at the earliest possible date. They had barred the defendant, and had come to the Court so as to get terms imposed upon the defendant. Counsel urged that the defendant should be put to terms to plead within a certain period after his return.

Mr. Schreiner submitted that the respondents should be ordered to pay the costs. Large costs had been unnecessarily incurred by reason of respondents' attorneys' unreasonable attitude.

Hopley, J.: In this case I think there must be leave granted to purge default and to plead. I think the plea should be served before the 31st August, if possible, unless the defendant comes with a request for further time upon good cause shown. The matter that troubles me most is the question of costs. In one respect, of course, the plaintiffs have the right to use the rules of Court so as to bring on litigation promptly, and even perhaps keeping within the rules laid down, to force the other side to come to terms. On the other hand, I personally do not like to encourage anything like an unnecessary putting into force, an almost tyrannical putting into force, of the rules of Court. Each case has to be considered on its merits, and in this case there is a great deal to be said for the point of view that the rules were not made to deal with a case like this where a person is not wilfully in default, but is forced to go away by reasons of health on the advice of his medical advisers. In such cases the rules of Court ought to be enforced with some sort of discretion, and if they are not, I would, as a rule, feel inclined to inflict the costs on the party so using them in a too stringent way. On the other hand, when a party who is in default craves leave to purge default, he is generally the person who has to pay costs. In the present case I think the party so craving the indulgence of the Court has very little blame to be attached to him on account of the state of his health, and on account of the way in which the pleadings were served. Still, I think that the respondents have not behaved in such a way as necessarily to make them liable to pay the wasted costs, and I think the wiser course would be to make the party that is unsuccessful in the long run pay these costs. The order will be that costs be costs in the cause.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LUNTZ BROS. V. HOVELMEIER.

Mr. Watermeyer moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent. Amended service by registered letter had been made as directed by the Court.

Order granted.

THESEN AND CO, LTD. AND OTHERS V. STEYN AND KOTZE.

Mr. Gutsche moved for the final adjudication of the partnership estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

STOFFBERG V. MARAIS.

Mr. Louwrens moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,014 6s. 7d., due by reason of notice having been given, and for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. Bissot opposed the application on behalf of defendant, who resides at Rooikopdam, Fraserburg. In an affidavit, defendant said that she considered she owed plaintiff £706 10s., less £200 paid on her behalf by Mr. Botes. She denied that she had received notice from plaintiff calling up the bond, or that he was entitled to claim £1,014. The farm, she said, was worth considerably more than the amount of the bond. From a letter sent by plaintiff to defendant, it transpired that the parties are brother and sister. Counsel also read affidavits by Attorney A. J. Botes and Attorney Jacobsen.

Mr. Louwrens read a replying affidavit by plaintiff, who entered at some length into the transactions he had had with defendant, and said that she had met her indebtedness to him by a payment of £200 cash through Mr. Botes (her attorney), and by passing a mortgage bond for £1,014 6s. 7d. on the farm Rooikopsdam. At the time the bond was passed, defendant was truly indebted to him in the sum of £1,014 6s. 7d. The farm, if put up to auction, would not realise the amount of the bond and arrear interest.

Mr. Bisset read a further affidavit by defendant, in which she denied any knowledge of certain transactions alleged by plaintiff to have taken place between himself and defendant and her late husband. Counsel, in argument, contended (1) that no clear and unequivocal three months' notice had been given by plaintiff calling up the bond; (2) that, even if such notice had been given, it was waived by the subsequent conduct of the parties; (3) that in any event there was a complete novation of the debt on the bond and interest, inasmuch as plaintiff stated that he had purchased the farm, and (4) that the widow was not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £1,014, the amount of the bond. Plaintiff, he submitted, ought to be ordered to go into the principal case. A sum of £300 had been brought up twice over against the widow.

Mr. Louwrens contended that the letter in Dutch sent by plaintiff to defendant could only bear the interpretation that he gave her notice that he was calling up the bond. He gave her three months' time in which to raise the capital, and said that if she did not raise the capital he would take over the farm for the amount of the bond. Counsel submitted that there had been no waiver, and that it was clear defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the amount of the bond.

Hopley, J.: In this case, if the matter had been merely as to the amount that was due, the point that had taken up most of the time of the Court, I should have had no difficulty in granting provisional sentence, because it seems to me that when a person comes with a liquid document of this sort, which acknowledges clearly that a certain sum of money is due, it wants very much stronger and clearer evidence than has been set up for the defence here to convince the Court that provisional sentence should not be given for the amount sued for on the liquid document. But there are other defences raised here, and one is that there was no clear notice that this bond was to be called up, and if there were a clear notice there was an entirely new set of affairs set up by a novated contract of a different nature from the one arising under the document. With regard to the waiver and the novation, I think they may be taken together. I do not think I should have refused provisional sentence on the ground of either of them, because it hardly lies in the mouth of the defendant to come here and say there was no sale and no arrangement that I should recognise, and yet because there was such sale and such arrangement argue that there was a novation or a waiver. I do not think I should have been impressed with those arguments, and the only thing that has given me any trouble is the form of the alleged notice in the present case. It is a condition of this bond that it shall be payable on three months' notice being given that it must be paid. Now, the plaintiff comes into court in the present case and says that he has given this three months' notice and that, therefore, he is entitled to judgment. Without such three months' notice he cannot claim that he is entitled to judgment. Therefore, we have to find whether he has at any time given a clear and unequivocal notice to the defendant to pay him this money. The bond was passed in October, 1903, and on the 4th January, 1907, there was a certain amount of interest overdue, an outstanding amount, and also the current year's interest, in all about £100, and on that date, the 4th January, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, who is his sister-in-law, in the Dutch language, a letter which it seems to me has been fairly translated by the translator, in which he says: "I must remind you that on the 1st April the interest must be paid." He says "remind you," but I suppose he means, "I must lay down this condition to you." He goes on: "One year is in arrears and this year, that makes £100. Pay me the £100 and further the interest every year, I shall not call up the bond." That is clear. It is in the future tense in the original: "Betaal my de honderd pond en verder elke jaar de rente ik zal u de verband niet vragen." Then he goes on: "Maar als u my de rente do eerste April niet betaal dan zeg ik u de verband op en geef de verband aan Botes over en ik laat u dag vaar." He says: "But if you do not pay me the interest on the 1st April I shall call up the bond and give over the bond to Botes and have you summoned." Now, the two latter things, at all events, must be in the future tense. "If you do not pay me on the 1st April, then I shall hand over the bond to Botes, and I shall have you summoned." Now, those two tenses are used in exactly the same way as the verb in that portion of the sentence relating to calling up the bond. If the words quoted mean "then I shall hand over the bond to Botes, and then I shall have you summoned," then also the words which give the notice calling up the bond, as alleged, must mean

"then I shall call in the bond." If that is so, then if she does not pay by the 1st April he will have the bond called in, and he has never done so. It seems to me he has never said to her, as he might have done on the 1st April, "I now call in the bond." If he had done so he must still have waited three months before summoning her. Or he might have worded his letter differently, saying: "This is a notice that I do call up this bond, but I give you this opportunity, in which case I will let this notice lapse if you pay the interest on the 1st April." It seems to me he has never gone further, and that he has not brought the defendant properly before the Court in terms of the bond, and that provisional sentence must be refused, and, as he has not taken the proper steps, it must be refused with costs, including costs of postponement.

KING V. ESTATE JACOBS.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £425, with interest at 9 per cent. on £205 9s. 9d. from 29th March, 1906, and on the balance from the 3rd August, 1906; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

CAPE TIMES, LTD. V. CRANE.

Mr. Bisset moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £451 5s. 6d., with interest and £7 4s. 1d. taxed costs.

Defendant did not appear.

Decree granted, with costs.

WICHT V. BIRCH.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,000, with interest from the 25th February, 1905, less £12 paid, and for £7 premiums of insurance, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable and rents attached.

Order granted.

GRAAFF V. SHATZKY.

Mr. Watermeyer moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £3,600, with interest from the 1st July, 1906, and for £7 premiums of insurance; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable and rents attached.

Defendant admitted that the bond had become due. He said that he was without money, and that the property was unlet. He handed in a statement, from which it appeared that he had no objection to the sale. He ascribed his position to the depression.

Order granted.

BURMEISTER V. EXECUTORS ESTATE VAN RENSBURG.

Mr. W. J. van Zyl moved for an order upon the executors to forthwith frame and lodge with the Master of the Supreme Court a full and true account. Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that the action was really brought under Rule 329d, although it appeared as a provisional case.

Hopley, J., said that the wrong procedure had apparently been adopted. Plaintiff was not suing on a liquid document. When defendants were in default, plaintiff could have the case set down under Rule 329d.

The matter was ordered to stand over to enable plaintiffs' attorneys to look into the question of procedure.

PRICE BROS. V. DE KLERK.

Mr. Bisset moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for payment of £76 6s. 3d., less £40 paid on account, for gravel supplied off plaintiff's farm Silverhurst, Constantia, during 1906, and for cancellation of a certain written authority to defendant to excavate and remove gravel from portion of the said farm, with interest and costs.

Hopley, J., said that he did not see how he could grant an order for cancellation on this application.

Mr. Upington said that defendant had had full notice that the cancellation was asked for, on the ground that the authority had become void by reason of his non-payment of the moneys due.

Order granted as prayed.

CAPE TIMES, LTD. V. FITZGERALD.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £37 9s. 4d., for goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

BLUMENFELD V. FIELD AND CO.

This was an application brought by Sophy Blumenfeld upon notice to Louk Klaas and George Wallis, carrying on business at Oudshoorn as L. Field and Co., to show cause why Louis Leopold Leonard Nel should not be appointed provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Isaac Klaas, with full power to administer and liquidate the estate. In a cross-application, respondents asked the Court to appoint J. A. Foster and J. R. King as joint provisional trustees.

Mr. Upington was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for respondents.

The matter had previously been before the Court, and was standing over for the nomination of an independent person to be agreed upon by the parties.

Mr. Benjamin now said that he was instructed to press for the appointment of Messrs. Foster and King, or Mr. Timothy Smith.

Mr. Upington said that he was instructed to press for the appointment of Mr. Nel or Mr. Timothy Smith.

Hopley, J.: I think that Messrs. Foster and King on the one side, and Mr. Nel on the other, are both open to objection, and that a party has been found who will meet all the requirements of the case. I, therefore, direct that Mr. Timothy Smith be appointed provisional trustee in this estate, with power to liquidate it, costs of both parties to come out of the estate.

Ex parte LINDSAY.

Mr. Marais moved, on behalf of the petitioner, for leave to sue her husband by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, and for a declaration that a certain power of attorney is irrevocable. Petitioner alleged that while she was living with respondent at Ceres, in July, 1905, he left for America, and deserted her, and she was informed that he was now teaching at an academy in Boston, U.S.A.

Leave granted to sue by edict for restitution of conjugal rights and other relief, as prayed, citation, interdict, and notice of trial to be served together, personal service, citation returnable on the 24th October.

Appeal to Full Court—Interlocutory order.

A divisional Court of the Supreme Court can allow an appeal to the Full Court on an interlocutory order.

This was an application for leave to appeal to a full Court from a judgment of Mr. Justice Maasdorp, delivered on the 19th June last.

It appeared that the Registrar, or his deputy, had declined to accept notice of appeal on the ground that this was an interlocutory matter, and that it was not competent, by section 27, Act 35, 1896, to accept the notice except by an order of the Court.

Mr. McGregor, K.C., was for applicants, the Distributing Syndicate; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton, K.C.), was for respondents, the Imperial Co.

Mr. Schreiner said his submission was that the procedure by which the referee placed a case before the Court for decision on certain points, and the Court made an order thereon, was interlocutory, and it was never contemplated by the parties that the matter would be protracted to a further stage by appeal. The respondents desired to have a decision from the Court as to whether this was an interlocutory order.

Maasdorp, J., said that he did not see what was to be gained by refusing leave to appeal to the applicants, and, furthermore, he was inclined to the opinion that the order was final.

Mr. Schreiner pointed out that large sums were involved, and if this matter went from the Divisional Court to the full Court, and then to the Privy Council, it meant that it would be hung up for a considerable period.

Maasdorp, J., said it would still be open to the respondents to raise the question as to whether it was an interlocutory matter when it came before the Court of Appeal.

Mr. McGregor submitted that this was not an interlocutory matter and, even if it were, the Court had full discretion to give leave to the applicants to go to the Appeal Court.

Maasdorp, J.: Whatever the result of the argument might be, I would grant leave upon an interlocutory order. Leave will be granted to appeal, costs to be costs in the cause.

JANSEN V. VAN DER MERWE.

This was an application upon notice to respondent to show cause why an order should not be granted authorising the Taxing Officer to tax and allow as costs between party and party an amount of £24 4s. paid by applicant to one J. P. MacMillan, an engineer, who had sworn certain affidavits.

The matter arose out of an application on motion brought by applicant for an interdict against respondent, restraining him from proceeding with certain works in the Sunday's River, New Bethesda. The Taxing Officer only allowed £2 2s., as far as MacMillan was concerned, as a fair and reasonable charge for preparing plan. He declined however, to allow the witness's qualifying expenses. No objection was made at the time the Court made its order for the qualifying expenses of the engineer.

Mr. Burton, K.C., was for applicant; Mr. McGregor, K.C., was for respondent.

Mr. Burton, in argument, referred to Wynberg Municipality v. Clayton (3 C.T.R., 200).

Mr. McGregor cited O'Shea's case (12 S.C., 146), and Kennedy v. Port Elizabeth Harbour Board (5 E.D.C., 337).

Maasdorp, J.: I do not think that the decision of the matter in which this case arose depended at all upon any expert or technical evidence. The Court did not there decide between the respective merits of two sets of works that were in competition. Any sketch or picture of the ground made by an intelligent person would have served the purposes of the Court. It was suggested at the time that for future purposes it might be necessary to have the assistance of skilled people, in order to help the parties in such works as they might find it necessary to construct, but the whole of the case went off upon the ground that the respondent had entered upon the land of the applicant, and was constructing large works without having given notice to the applicant, or without having obtained his consent, and that the Court would not allow such large works to proceed. It was said at the time that in all probability the works might be mischievous and damaging to the plaintiff, but that did not depend upon information that the Court received from any skilled engineer in the matter. I have no doubt that the evidence of this particular witness was very useful to the Court, but no more so than that of the other gentlemen of experience who put in their affidavits in the matter. There are no such special circumstances in this case as would induce the Court to allow the qualifying costs of this witness, and the application must be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

MOTLHABANE V. MATOLO. { 1907.
July 25th

This was an application brought by Kgantlapane Motlhabane, Chief of the Batlapins, in British Bechuanaland, upon notice to Solomon Matolo to show cause why he should not be ejected from certain premises at Manthe and interdicted from using a certain church and house there situate.

Applicant, in his petition, set out the grounds on which he claimed to exercise criminal and civil jurisdiction at Manthe under the findings of the Land Commission presided over by Sir Sidney Shippard. He drew attention to paragraph 43 of the Land Commission's report. About 16 years ago deponent entered into negotiations with the respondent to become minister, Matolo representing that he was a minister of the London Missionary Society. Deponent gave him permission to occupy a dwelling house and church. Matolo, however, gradually began to arrogate to himself certain authority never contemplated. Deponent had had to reprimand him for his conduct. About three years ago he had to warn Matolo for publicly questioning certain of his decisions and rulings. Thereafter Matolo, by secret and underhand methods, attempted to undermine his authority. Deponent had lately learnt that Matolo had no connection with the London Missionary Society, and he was not responsible to any body whatsoever. He had lately succeeded in undermining petitioner's authority to a large extent, and had succeeded in alienating his brother-in-law and his (petitioner's) young son. Petitioner had given him verbal notice to quit, but this Matolo had ignored. Instead of forcibly removing him and thus perhaps causing a disturbance, deponent preferred to seek the aid of the Court, and he prayed for an order for the ejection of respondent and an interdict restraining him from using the said church and from entering Manthe or its precincts without petitioner's permission.

Respondent, in a replying affidavit, denied that petitioner held in trust for his people all the land at Manthe aforesaid. He denied that he had represented himself as being a duly authorised representative of the London Missionary Society. Petitioner informed him that a large section of the people were antagonistic to the society, and that he personally was also against the society. Deponent was an ordained minister of the Independent or Congregational Church. The house was the property of deponent, and the congregation owned the church. He denied that petitioner had any right to order his removal, and said that that right was held only by his congregation. Respondent went on to say that petitioner had shown malice towards him, and to deny that he had done more than give friendly advice as a counsellor to the petitioner. The church he conducted had over 300 adherents. There was a feud amongst the members of the petitioner's family, but deponent had no part in this. He had not received verbal notice to quit. The consequences of his removal might be extremely serious.

An affidavit by petitioner's attorney, Mr. De Beer (Messrs. Rosenblatt and De Beer, of Vryburg) was also read, from which it appeared that it had been agreed that in case an ejectment were granted any sums of money disbursed by respondent or property occupied by him should be repaid to him, and that the amount payable should be determined by arbitration before the Resident Magistrate of Vryburg.

Mr. Howes was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for respondent.

Hopley, J., raised the question of whether the Court could on motion dispose of this matter.

Mr. Howes submitted that the matter was one that could be dealt with on affidavit.

Mr. Benjamin said his submission was that the matter could not be decided on motion, and that applicant should be ordered to proceed by action.

[Hopley, J.: It seems to me that it is impossible to judge of the rights of the parties upon a procedure of this kind. It may be that the chief is the fractious man and not the missionary. It may be that the chief has a perfectly good cause. He may not be the first ruler or the first king that has taken a priest on his shoulders and cannot get rid of him.]

Mr. Benjamin said that the chief held the land in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants, but he was not entitled to drive away any of the inhabitants solely upon the exercise of his despotic will. There was nothing to show that the chief had the right to eject the respondent from the house or restrain him from using the church. Petitioner had not even made out a prima facie case in support of his application.

Mr. Howes submitted that the affidavits would show that there was not the slightest doubt as to the property in the house and church. Respondent was an Ethiopian.

Hopley, J.: Without going deeply into the merits, and without deciding as to the admissibility of the affidavits on both sides, which are objected to by the respective counsel, it seems to me there is quite enough disclosed on the first two affidavits that have been read to show me that this is not a case in which the Court should proceed to an order of ejectment merely on a motion of this sort. In this case we have the chief of a native tribe in Bechuanaland, living on land which he holds under a decision of the Land Commission, as trustee over the members of his section or tribe, asking the Court to eject from that land a native minister of the Gospel, whom he himself introduced to that land, and established there some 16 years ago. Respondent has been labouring there, and seems to be, as far as the affidavits show, a most successful religious leader there. It is clear that if the respondent did come there some 16 years ago, he must have come there on some sort of contract. One of the things that would have to be discovered, and which cannot possibly be discovered on motion, is whether this contract has been clearly and properly carried out by the respondent. The application will be refused, applicant to proceed by action, costs to be costs in the cause. If no action is brought within three months, applicant must pay the costs of these proceedings.

COLLISON V. VAILE.

This was an application upon notice calling on the attorneys of the plaintiff to show cause why an order should not be granted postponing the action indefinitely until the matters pending between H. C. Collison and the defendant in England have been decided, or why a commission de bene esse should not issue to take the evidence of the defendant in London. The action was for an amount of £4,440, which the plaintiff company claimed on an account from the defendant, who up till recently was vice-chairman of the company, and was still a shareholder of the company. The moneys were alleged to be due by him to the company, which they said were illegally withdrawn from the company for his own private purposes in Johannesburg. The defendant said that Harry C. Collison was really to all intents and purposes Collison, Limited. As soon as Vaile went to England, which he did by arrangement with the company, Collison served a writ against him for the £7,500, being an amount of money which Collison said he had to pay on behalf of Collison, Limited, which the defendant indemnified. There was a further action by Vaile against H. Collison in London, and he wished a stay of proceedings at the Cape until the actions were decided in England. The affidavits of the applicant set out that he had a complete defence to the action on the merits. The action, although brought in the name of the company, had been instituted by one Harry Collison, who controlled a bare majority in the voting power over the defendant and his friends. As soon as he arrived in England he was served with a writ for £7,550 paid by H. Collison to the Standard Bank, with a guarantee given by him in respect of an overdraft by the plaintiff company, which sum Collison alleged the defendant was liable to indemnify. The defendant's presence in England was necessary until the pleadings of the case were closed. Unless there was a postponement he would be seriously embarrassed in the conduct of his defence.

The replying affidavit of Mr. W. T. Buissinne, whose firm was acting for the plaintiff, stated that summons in the case had been issued on the 18th December, 1906, and the writ filed on the same day. On the 1st February, 1907, the defendant entered an appearance, and filed his plea on the 12th February, 1907. On the 7th March, 1907, the application was filed, and the case set down for the 7th May. The defendant's attorneys requested further time, and the notice setting down the case for 7th May was withdrawn, and the case was then set down by consent for the 11th July. The defendant's attorneys applied for a further postponement, and deponent's firm wrote a letter drawing attention to the fact that the application for a commission might have been applied for long before, and in the subsequent communication deponent suggested that the case should be heard on Thursday, August 15, 1907. The deponents' clients had the strongest objection to go to trial without the personal attendance of the defendant, and they had the strongest objection to a further postponement. It would appear that it was quite possible for Vaile to attend the trial here during the month of August, and be back in England by the end of September. If the defendant left England on the 27th July he could be here on August 13, leave again on August 21, and be in England on September 7. There was a cable from H. C. Collison to the effect that Vaile would not be required in England before the middle of October, as the action was fixed for hearing in London on November 1, 1907. An affidavit by Mr. J. E. P. Close set out that along with Mr. G. W. Steytler he was acting as inspector of the business of H. C. Collison, Ltd., by virtue of an arrangement between the company and its creditors. The defendant had no defence whatever, as would be proved by documentary evidence. The action against the defendant was decided on at a general meeting of shareholders on November 26, 1906. Vaile had received 15,000 shares in the company from Harry Collison, 14,900 of which were a free gift, and 100 by payment in cash to qualify him as a director of H. Collison and Co., Ltd. On the 26th November, matters had reached a crisis in the company, entirely through Vaile's mismanagement. At a second meeting of creditors held on 2nd December, 1906, the creditors made it a condition precedent that Mr. Vaile should resign his position as vice-chairman of the company, which he there and then did, signing a letter drawn up by the company's solicitors. When Vaile left for England, he had no connection with the company at all, having resigned in deference to the expressed wish of the creditors. The action in England was instituted by Harry Collison in his private capacity to recover from the defendant £7,500, which, through the defendant's inability to carry out his agreement, H. Collison was called upon to pay. Explicit instructions had been given to avoid any clashing of the lawsuits, and it had been the endeavour of the company's representative in London to have the litigation brought on as quickly as possible. The defendant had ample opportunity to appear in the present suit in person.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, K.C., for the applicant (Vaile); Mr. Upington for respondents.

Mr. Buchanan having been heard in argument,

Hopley, J.: In this case I do not see any reason to interfere with the ordinary course of matters. It appears that Mr. Vaile has become involved in lawsuits with two parties. Shortly after he left this country he had an action instituted against him for £4,000 by the firm or company of Collison, Ltd. That matter has been standing over for a considerable time, and pleadings have been closed, and the case set down for hearing on the 15th of next month. On his arrival in England early in this year, Mr. Vaile was almost immediately served with a writ, and an action was instituted against him for a large sum of money there, at the suit of Mr. Henry Collison, who is the chief owner of the shares and debentures of the firm of Collison, Ltd., but the cause of action is not the same as that with which this Court is concerned, but it is a separate transaction and a separate undertaking, representing a sum of £7,500. In England Mr. Vaile is defending his action, and he is also bringing a counter-claim. So that there is important litigation, involving large sums of money, in both countries, and it now appears that the English cases, which are very likely indeed to be consolidated, will be heard on the 1st November, and Mr. Vaile says he cannot in justice to himself come out here to defend the action, because something detrimental to him may, in his absence, happen in England. Now, with two cases going against the same person, more or less, it is alleged by the same persons, at a distance of 6,000 miles apart, there is necessarily considerable inconvenience. I can quite see it is most inconvenient for Mr. Vaile to have to defend himself in both countries, but it seems to me that the best solution of the difficulty is that one of the cases at one of the ends should be finished off as soon as possible, so as to leave him undisturbed to devote his energies and attention to the other, and that Mr. Vaile should come out here, face the action, and have done with it. The documents, some of them it is said in this country, will be wanted for the English case. Therefore, they will be all the more available when this Court has done with them. It has been suggested that an unfair advantage might be taken of Mr. Vaile in his absence. It seems that is hardly necessary to be considered very seriously, because, although he will be away, the well-known firm of solicitors in England that are representing him, and the able counsel, apparently, representing him, will be able to take care of him and his interests if anything is attempted behind his back, and while he is away on this necessary business in another country. It seems to me that no good cause has been shown for interfering with the ordinary course of events. The application will be refused, with costs, and to give applicant an opportunity of giving the necessary instructions and making the necessary arrangements after his arrival here, the case will be set down for the 29th August.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte ESTATE DU PLESSIS. } 1907.
July 25th.

Mr. Upington moved on the petition of Johanna Cathrina du Plessis for leave to sell a certain erf and buildings in her mother's estate, situate in the town of Aberdeen. From the petition, it appeared that the property was bequeathed to petitioner and her sister on condition that in case one of them married it should go to the other, but in case the other married also it should be sold within six weeks and the proceeds divided between the two sisters or their descendants. Petitioner's sister had married, but petitioner was unmarried and had no intention to marry. The property was tenantless and had for some time past been bringing in no income to petitioner. She asked leave to sell the property and to invest the proceeds on mortgage of landed property. Petitioner's married sister consented. The Master said that he could not recommend any departure from the terms of the will, but in case the Court sanctioned the petition he suggested that the proceeds should be deposited with a trust company for investment. Counsel urged that nobody would be prejudiced by the application.

Hopley, J.: An order will be granted as prayed, with leave to the executor of the estate to sell this erf and buildings and deposit the moneys received from such sale in the hands of the Midland Agency and Trust Co., Graaff-Reinet, to be invested on security of landed property, the moneys issuing from such investment to be treated exactly as the rents from the property would have been treated.

Ex parte ZWART.

Dr. Greer moved, on behalf of the petitioner, sole heir in the estate, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to his mother, who was now in her 87th year and was absolutely incapable of managing her own affairs. Recently she had had a stroke, and was rendered practically speechless. The Rev. Alex. Stewart, of the Congregational Church, was suggested as a fit and proper person to act as curator ad litem, but it had also been suggested that the Resident Magistrate of Gordonia would be more accessible to the Court.

Mr. May, Resident Magistrate of Gordonia, appointed curator ad litem for the purpose of inquiring as to the mental capacity of the respondent, summons returnable October 15. The curator may report in writing, and proof may be by affidavit. The Rev. Alex. Stewart to be curator bonis until a final order is made by the Court.

Ex parte HUMPHREYS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved on behalf of the petitioner, Harold Francis Humphreys, a dentist practising in the division of Uitenhage and Humanedorp, for leave to sue his wife by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, custody of three minor children, and forfeiture of any benefits under the marriage. The parties were married at Bromley, Kent, in 1899, and the petitioner came out to South Africa with the Imperial Yeomanry and served during the war. He had duly maintained his wife in England. He had continually asked his wife to join him, but this she refused to do, although the passage money had been sent to her. She never answered any of his letters.

Leave granted to sue by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights and other relief as prayed, the citation, interdict, and notice of trial to be served together, personal service, returnable September 25.

Ex parte HOPKINSON.

Mr. Upington moved, on behalf of petitioner, who resides at Gloucester, England, for an order as to service of certain summons in an action petitioner desired to institute against one James Carter, now residing at Morecambe, Lancashire. Petitioner said that he was the legal holder of a mortgage bond for £1,500 passed by Carter upon certain property situate at Salt River. The interest from the 1st January to the 30th June, 1907, had not been paid, and the bond had consequently become due and payable. The rents from the property had been collected by respondent's agents in Cape Town, Messrs. Herold and Gie. Messrs. Herold and Gie were not, however, prepared to accept service in respondent's behalf. The only course, it seemed to him, was to proceed by way of edict, otherwise he did not know what complications might arise.

Ordered that the property and the rents in the hands of Messrs. Herold and Gie and the rents subsequently to be collected by them be attached ad fundum jurisdictionem, and leave granted to sue by edict, citation returnable on the 24th September, personal service to be effected.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte COOMBER. { 1907
July 26th.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., moved for an order authorising the Master to pay out to petitioner certain money. From the petition, it appeared that in August, 1903, the Court granted petitioner a decree of separation from her husband, Harry Coomber, and declared her entitled to the custody of the two minor children of the marriage, and ordered half the amount of a certain inheritance coming from petitioner's grandparents to be paid out to her, and the other half to be paid to the Master, and directed the interest on the amount to be paid to the petitioner for the maintenance of herself and the children. Petitioner entered into details as to her position, and prayed for an order authorising the Master to pay out of the funds in his hands a sum of £5 for the education of two minor sons at the Pretoria High School. From her present means she was unable to pay for the education that she desired to give to the two boys. The Master, in his report, said he thought the spirit of the Act 7, 1895, would seem to support the application. It transpired that petitioner was married in community, and that she had been unable to discover her husband's whereabouts.

Order granted authorising the Master to pay out to the petitioner, in addition to the sums he is already paying out to her, a sum of £6 per month for the education of the minors Coomber, on proof from time to time that the money is being expended beneficially on the two minors mentioned, costs to be paid from the fund.

Ex parte ESTATE CONNOR AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Long moved for an amendment of an order granted by the Court on the 5th June last, authorising a mortgage to be raised on certain quitrent land in the division of Somerset East (17 C.T.R., 480). In the original petition no mention was made of another piece of land forming part of the estate, and an amendment of the order was now asked for to enable the bond to be passed over both pieces of ground.

Amendment granted as prayed.

Ex parte FULTON.

Dr. Greer moved for an order authorising the petitioner to raise a sum of £200 upon mortgage of certain property, situate in Napier-street and Somerset-road, Cape Town, in the estate of the late Margaret Tracey. Petitioner was the nephew and adopted son of the testatrix, and the property was bequeathed to him on condition that transfer should not be passed to him until he attained the age of 26 years, that he should take over the existing mortgage, and that he should not mortgage or transfer any part of the property. Applicant had now attained the age of 26 years. The executors had charges amounting to £157 5s. against the estate, but applicant was unable to pay these charges and to take transfer of the property, as he was out of work, had no trade or profession, and was without means. There was a bond of £700 against the property at present. Applicant asked for leave to raise a further sum of £200 on mortgage to enable him to pay the executors' charges, costs of the present application, and costs of raising the loan.

Hopley, J.: It is true that in this case there is a prohibition against the applicant mortgaging or selling the property. At the same time, the will says that he is to take over this property, and it makes no provision for any funds to him wherewith he may pay such charges as the executors have now formulated against him. It would, seem, in the special circumstances of this case, that the whole of this bequest would have to lapse or become futile if some relief were not given whereby it might become possible for the legatee to receive his legacy. Certain funds are needed for the purpose of obtaining transfer of the property into the name of the applicant, and it appears that a further encumbrance of the property is the only means of obtaining the necessary funds for this purpose, whereby the wishes of the testator may be carried out. In the special circumstances of this case the Court will authorise the sum of £200 to be raised upon this property by way of mortgage for the purpose of getting transfer into the name of the applicant, and meeting the necessary costs and charges to be incurred, including the costs of this application.

An order will be granted as prayed, or, in the alternative, that a sum of £900 be raised for the purpose of paying off the existing bond and for the purposes mentioned in the petition.

Ex parte SOUTH AFRICAN NEWSPAPER CO., LTD.

Dr. Greer moved for an order approving of a minute under section 41 of the Companies Act, dealing with the reduction of the company's capital from £60,000 to £30,000. The Court had already confirmed the reduction of the capital, but by an oversight the form of the minute required by the 41st section was not presented to the Court for approval at the time. Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that he did not think it was necessary to order publication of the minute.

Hopley, J., said that the matter appeared to be purely formal, and the Court would approve of the minute as prayed.

In re THE EAST LONDON DAILY NEWS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO., LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION).

Dr. Greer moved for confirmation of the third report of the official liquidators of the East London Daily News Printing and Publishing Co., Ltd., Counsel said that the report was brief. In the second report reference was made to a large claim which had been made against the company by the landlord for breaking the lease of the premises occupied by the company. The liquidators, while disputing the claim, retained in their hands sufficient funds, after paying out a dividend, to pay the claim in full. They offered to the landlord (Mr. J. Ries) a compromise of £500. and this had been accepted by the landlord, and a large sum consequently remained in the liquidators' hands for distribution. In their third report they stated that there was now a surplus of £1,039, from which they proposed to pay a further dividend of 3s. 6d. in the £, leaving a balance of £462 16s. The liquidators also reported that they had collected a number of small debts amounting to £155, and they applied for sanction to commission being paid to them at the rate of 5 per cent. Counsel read affidavits by two of the liquidators (Mr. Pope, of East London, and Mr. Close of Cape Town), stating that the report had duly lain for inspection, and that no objection had been lodged.

Report confirmed as prayed.

MCKINNON V. MCKINNON.

This was an application brought by John H. McKinnon, of Woodstock, upon notice to his wife, Elizabeth G. McKinnon, to show cause why applicant should not be granted proper and reasonable access to his minor daughters, why they should not be handed over to his custody, and why respondent should not pay the costs of this application.

From the affidavits, it appeared that on the 25th June last Mr. Justice Buchanan granted a judicial separation to the present respondent, and gave her custody of the minor daughters of the marriage, and custody of the boys to their father, with right of access to the respective parties. (17 C.T.R., 562.) Applicant now alleged that the children had not been properly looked after by the respondent, who had taken an appointment as a nurse on Robben Island. The children were at first left in the care of a lady in Cape Town, and when applicant went to see them trouble took place, and blows were apparently exchanged. Mrs. McKinnon had since removed the children to Robben Island, and the applicant now complained that he was not given reasonable access. Respondent said the object of the application was to harass and annoy her.

Hopley, J., remarked that he was placed in a difficulty in this case, because he was asked to alter an order given by another Judge.

Applicant appeared in person; Dr. Greer was for respondent.

Applicant said he hoped the Court would now deal with the matter. He had already lost about five days' work in consequence of the case.

In the course of his statements, applicant remarked: Judge Buchanan ought to have to live with her for six months, and then try the case again.

Hopley, J.: Do not be impertinent. You must try and restrain yourself. From every word you say, it seems you are a person not to be trusted with these girls at all. You have a hasty temper. You may get nothing at all, except, perhaps, the gaol. The only thing I am trying to do is to see whether I can make some arrangement by which you and your wife may meet the respective children.

Applicant: Supposing she sends her children twice in a month, I will meet them at the boat. If she wants the boys at Robben Island I will send the boys to Robben Island.

[Hopley, J.: She agrees to bring the children to your house once a month.]

Applicant: If she does when I am at work, what good is that?

[Hopley, J.: The only thing I can think of is that you meet your attorney, and see whether you can make an arrangement that will work. If not, come before Mr. Justice Buchanan next week. I think he will probably be sitting, and see whether you can make an arrangement. He knows the parties in this suit. It is better to carry out what he intended than to have my order. Both sides must be reasonable. It does not follow that she has got to drag the girls about. The matter will stand over for the present. Meanwhile, try and arrange it in an amicable fashion, so that there will be no necessity to come here on Monday at all.

Applicant: I tried, but —

Mr. Justice Hopley: Try again; it may come off next time.

Applicant: I thank your lordship very much indeed, from all my heart.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

DONNELLIAN V. KOHNE. { 1907.
July 30th.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £400, with interest from the 1st January, 1907, less £16 paid on account since issue of summons, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

THOMPSON V. BUSSE.

Mr. Swift moved for provisional sentence for £205 8s. 6d., being unsatisfied balance of a judgment of Resident Magistrate's Court, King William's Town, for 12s. 6d., costs of certain writ, and for defendant's half-share of certain property in the borough of King William's Town to be declared executable.

Order granted.

CORDER V. UPTON.

Mr. Bisset moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £209 18s. 2d., being taxed costs of a certain action brought by respondent against applicant.

Defendant said that he had paid away over £350 in connection with the costs of the case. He had paid £150 into court as security for costs. He had had to get the money advanced in order to carry on the action. He was unable to satisfy this debt. Witness put in a statement of his earnings.

Cross-examined: Witness held certain shares, but at present they were of very little value.

By the Court: Witness thought he would be able to pay £4 a quarter towards the discharge of this debt.

Defendant urged that the costs of the present application should be paid by the plaintiff.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant in this case has been unsuccessful in the action which he brought against the present plaintiff, and he is liable for the costs. There has been a return of nulla bona, and in strictness the plaintiff would now be entitled to have a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant, but I do not see that he will gain much by imprisoning the man. He is unable at present to pay, and the only chance of his being able to pay is by his being able to continue his ordinary business. That he can only do by being allowed to be free. As to the costs which he asks the Court not to give against him, I am afraid I shall have to give the costs, because there had been no definite offer of £5 a quarter, and some definite offer ought to have been made to the plaintiff. The Court will grant a decree of civil imprisonment, with costs, to be suspended pending payment of £5 per quarter, until the debt and costs have been paid, first payment to be made on the 1st October next, with leave to the plaintiff to apply for an increased order, on clear proof that the defendant is able to pay more.

In re SOUTH AFRICAN WIDOWS' FUND (IN LIQUIDATION).

Dr. Rainsford moved for confirmation of the first and final report and liquidation and distribution account. Counsel said that the liquidator asked for leave to pay the sum of £68 into the Guardians' Fund, as the widow entitled to it could not be found, for payment of the dividends awarded, and payment of liquidator's expenses (£30).

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court will generally confirm the report and authorise the liquidator to act under it.

In re EAST LONDON DAILY NEWS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO., LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION).

This was an application by certain parties, whom the liquidators had recommended in their second report should be placed on the list of contributories of the company.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., appeared for the receivers of Henry Ries and Co., and the partners in the firm; Dr. Greer appeared for the liquidators of the Daily News Co.

Mr. Buchanan said that in the second report of the liquidators, paragraphs 6 to 24 dealt with the proposal and intention to ask the Court to put the firm of Henry Ries and Co. and the individual partners upon the list of contributories of this company. The report came before the Court for confirmation in due course, and it was confirmed except as to paragraphs 6 to 24, and this section was ordered to stand over pending further proceedings to be taken by the liquidators or the firm of Henry Ries and Co., or the partners therein. The matter stood over from time to time, but on the 24th July the liquidators intimated to the receivers of Ries and Co. that they did not intend to proceed further, and they offered to pay taxed costs incurred by the present applicants. The object of the present application was to obtain judgment, with costs, refusing the application contained in the second report. The liquidators were willing to pay costs, but they did not seem to regard this application as necessary. At present the report stood filed in the Master's Office without record of the withdrawal of any portion thereof. In the 24th paragraph the liquidators said that under the circumstances they would ask the Court to place the firm of H. Ries and Co. and the partners thereof in terms of section 157 of the Companies' Act on the list of contributories for the amount for which the company had suffered loss, viz., £900, that was £1,000, less £100 paid to the company by E. K. Fletcher (the promoter). The applicants now desired that judgment be entered in the matter refusing the application for an order placing the present applicants on the list of contributories, and directing the present respondents to remove their name from the share register, the allotment list, or any other place in which it might appear in the company's books.

Dr. Greer said the liquidators' position was that they had decided not to press these particular paragraphs of the report, and they had intimated their intention not to do so on the 24th inst. They confirmed that by letter, in which they said they withdrew these paragraphs of the report altogether, and offered to pay taxed costs. The liquidators took up the position that they were entitled to withdraw any portion of the report, of course, at the same time admitting their liability for any costs which parties might have been put to by reason of their names appearing in the report.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But did it not go beyond mere appearing in the report? Did it not become an application to the Court? Was there not some discussion in the Court?]

Dr. Greer said that there was some discussion, but he submitted that at that stage it was purely an interlocutory matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would there be anything to prevent you, supposing no order were made, from at any time repeating the application?]

Dr. Greer said that he did not think so, but at the same time it was most improbable, in face of this withdrawal and offer to pay costs, that such an application would be repeated. The paragraphs in question had been withdrawn by the liquidators, and were no longer before the Court, and it seemed an altogether unnecessary piling up of expenses for the applicants to come to Court in this way. There was really nothing before the Court at present.

Mr. Buchanan, in reply, submitted that this was not an interlocutory matter. All that the respondents had done was to write a letter to his clients' attorneys stating that they did not intend to proceed further in the matter. They had not withdrawn paragraphs 6 to 24. The logical result was, he submitted, that judgment should be given refusing the application of the liquidators to place the Ries on the list of contributories.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In what respect are you in a better position after the judgment of the Court?]

Mr. Buchanan said that his clients would then be absolved, whereas under section 86 of the Act the liquidators might, unless such judgment were given, again come upon the Ries. Counsel added that the receivers of the partnership were wishful to liquidate the partnership. The liquidators of the "Daily News" had apparently gone into the matter; they had come to the conclusion evidently that the present applicants' name should not be settled upon the list of contributories, and they had withdrawn the proceedings, but they had not withdrawn the report.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has there been a notice to the Registrar of the withdrawal?]

Mr. Buchanan said that there had not been such a notice.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think, on the whole, this is a fair claim on the part of Messrs. Ries and Co. that the Court should decide now their position. The liquidators have informed the respondents of their intention to withdraw, but in form they have not withdrawn the application as well before the Court, which has stood over for further affidavits. The respondents are now entitled to have some judgment on the application and the only judgment that, under the circumstances, can be given is that the application to place Henry Ries and Co. on the list of contributories be refused, and that the liquidators be ordered to pay costs.

Mr. Buchanan asked whether the Court would not be prepared to order the removal of the respondents' name from the share register or other books of the company.

De Villiers, C.J.: All I can do is to refuse the application to place them on the list of contributories. There is no substantive motion beyond that.

LAW SOCIETY V. CELLIERS.

This was an application upon notice of motion calling upon the respondent, who is an attorney and notary, to show cause why his name should not be removed from the roll of attorneys and notaries of the Court, why he should not be suspended for such period as the Court might direct from practising the profession of attorney and notary, and why he should not be dealt with in such other manner as the Court might think fit by reason of his having entered into unlawful agreements with one J. J. de Beer, an enrolled law agent, and others, to charge and to allow them to charge in matters heard in the Court of the Resident Magistrate, Somerset West, a fee higher than the amount that would be allowed on taxation between party and party for attendance in the Resident Magistrate's Court in cases in which he and they appeared for the contending parties, without previously advising his clients.

The affidavit of Robert Bruce Sander-son, secretary of the Incorporated Law Society, which annexed extracts of the evidence obtained from the official shorthand writer of the Supreme Court, given on oath by J. P. Celliers, H. A. Fagan, N. Nochamowitz, J. J. de Beer, and C. F. Markotter, in the case of Celliers v. Fagan (17 C.T.R., 482), heard on the 6th, 7th, and 8th June, set out that it would appear from the evidence given on oath that the respondent, without previously arranging and informing his clients, agreed, in cases conducted in the Resident Magistrate's Court, to charge and allow the opposite party's legal representative to charge a fee for such appearance in the Resident Magistrate's Court, over and above the fixed fee of 10s. 6d. allowed on taxation between party and party.

The affidavit of the respondent set out that he was an attorney and notary public. He was admitted to practise his profession on the 30th December, 1901, since which time he had carried on business at Somerset West. He considered that his lordship, when giving judgment in the suit, intended to at once and finally deal with, and did then and finally deal with, the subject matter of the present application. After the judgment he made every endeavour to trace all instances in which a sum had been paid beyond the tariff amount, and he had made good to the clients concerned the excess payment. He did so apart from any request on the part of the clients concerned. It was a matter of profound regret to him that he should have brought upon himself the strictures which his lordship saw fit to pass upon his action in and about the matter of the said fees, and in view of the great injury which the slanderous statements upon which he based his claims in the suit caused him, the withholding from him by the Court—consequent on the matter of the fees—of the substantial damages which would otherwise have been adjudged him had been a severe punishment. Indeed, the passing of the strictures themselves was and is keenly felt by him. He had invariably endeavoured to practise his calling in an honourable manner, and he ventured to think that it was because of his constant and anxious endeavours so to do that he had secured and retained the confidence and respect of a wide circle of friends and clients. The arrangement, if it might be so called, concerning the fees was entered into by him without due thought in the early part of his career, and he regretted it. He was, however, able to say that it was in no sense a secret arrangement, and that no secret was made of it.

Mr. Upington was for the applicants and Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for the respondent.

Mr. Upington said the Law Society felt it their duty to move in the matter, and to take action, notwithstanding Celliers' repudiation. It was not an application, however, he was asked to press very severely. At the same time, it was not a matter which the society could pass over. The society would have been to blame if they had not taken any action in the matter. The circumstances of the trial were well within his lordship's recollection, and counsel would leave the matter in his lordship's hands.

De Villiers, C.J.: I quite agree that the Law Society was quite justified in taking notice of this matter, and bringing it to the attention of the Court. I felt it my duty at the trial to comment in severe terms upon the conduct of the plaintiff in the case. Naturally the damages would have been greater if it had not appeared that there was this secret agreement between the plaintiff and De Beer. I consider that it is not a case now for further punishment. I consider that the respondent has already been severely punished in not only having the damages greatly reduced in that case, but by the strictures which the Court felt in duty bound to make on that occasion. The respondent now says what he did was in the early part of his career, and it was done without much thought, and that there were very few cases in which that arrangement was acted upon. I accept that statement as correct. Under all the circumstances I think there should be no order on this application, but, at all events, the costs of the application should be paid by the respondent. It was the duty of the society to bring the matter to the notice of the Court, and it is only right that the society should be freed from any costs in making this application. It was a wholly improper arrangement on the part of the respondent, and I trust what has now taken place will be a warning to him for the future, and to others to avoid making secret arrangements of this kind. There will be no order upon this application, and the respondent will be ordered to pay the costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

BAGNALL V. THE COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { July 30th.
Aug. 5th.

Popularis actio—Statutory duty—
Illegal remission of customs duty—Declaration of rights —Interdict—Damage—Exception to declaration.

The plaintiff, after alleging in his declaration that he was a tax-payer, secretary to the manufacturers' association and interested in the due observance of the Customs Act, 1906, and that the defendant, as Treasurer of the Colony, was permitting to be imported into the Colony printed catalogues, in parcels, under a certain weight without payment of the duty by the said Act provided, prayed for a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to give such permission, and for an interdict restraining him from granting such permission.

Held, that in the absence of any averment of special damage or of breach of duty owing to the plaintiff or of infringement of any right belonging to the plaintiff, the declaration disclosed no cause of action at the suit of the plaintiff.

This was an argument on an exception taken by defendant to the plaintiff's declaration.

Plaintiff (Thomas Bagnall), in his declaration, said that he resided in Cape Town, and was a Parliamentary voter, a taxpayer, and the secretary of the South African Manufacturers' Association, and interested in the enforcement of the provisions of Act No. 1, 1906. The defendant was Edgar H. Walton, in his capacity as Treasurer of the Colony. Class II. of the schedule (b), under the heading, "Mixed rates," item 43, provided inter alia: "Printed matter: (a) advertising, including catalogues, price lists, almanacks, calendars, labels, posters, and show cards per £100, £25, or 2d. per lb., whichever shall be the greater." Plaintiff went on to say that it was defendant's duty to enforce this provision, but that, in breach of his duty, and acting wrongfully and in violation of the aforesaid provisions of the Act and schedule, defendant had in and since October, 1906, failed and neglected to cause the aforesaid duty to be raised, levied, collected, and paid in respect of large numbers of ordinary printed catalogues imported through the post, and weighing less than 8 oz., and had wrongfully and unlawfully issued instructions to the officers of the Post Office that such ordinary catalogues as aforesaid should be admitted free of duty, save in the case of South African firms sending large quantities of catalogues or advertisements through the post. Plaintiff had protested, but defendant maintained the said wrongful and unlawful instructions. Plaintiff prayed for a declaration that defendant was not entitled to continue this practice, and for an interdict restraining defendant from causing or permitting such catalogues to be admitted without payment of the duty by law provided.

Defendant excepted to the declaration, on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action by the plaintiff against the defendant in his capacity as a Minister of the Colonial Government, or against the said Government.

Mr. Howel Jones, K.C., was for excipient (defendant in the action); Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Douglas Buchanan), was for respondent (plaintiff in the action).

Mr. Jones said that this was an action of a novel character, so far as this Court was concerned, in which plaintiff claimed a declaration that the Colonial Government was not entitled to admit certain articles into the Colony without payment of the duty imposed by the Customs Amendment Act, 1906. He asked for a declaration to that effect, and an interdict also against allowing this article, viz., catalogues, to be imported without payment of duty. Plaintiff applied to the Court for what was practically a mandamus upon the Government, and he thought it was without precedent that a gentleman who called himself a taxpayer should apply to the Court for an order that practically more taxes should be imposed upon the subject than were really, as he said, imposed. The excipient's first ground of objection was that the declaration nowhere set out that the plaintiff had suffered any injury or damage, or that he was likely to, or apprehended, any damage or injury whatsoever. Plaintiff said that he was a Parliamentary voter, a taxpayer, and secretary of the S.A. Manufacturers' Association, but none of those capacities entitled him to complain about what the Treasurer was doing in this matter. Plaintiff had only shown that he had an academic interest in the collection of this duty. In the Colonial Government v. Stephan Bros. (10 C.T.R., 68), it was held that a plaintiff must show that his rights had been infringed by the defendant. Plaintiff in the present case did not really claim a declaration of rights. He asked for a declaration merely that the defendant as Treasurer should perform his statutory duty. If such actions as this were allowed, the Government would be constantly harassed. Then plaintiff asked for an interdict, but he had not alleged any of the three grounds on which an interdict would be granted by the Court. Counsel referred to Act 37, 1888, and cited Maxwell on Statutes (3rd Ed., pp. 575 and 578), Liquidator, Cape Central Railways v. Nothing (8 Juta, 25), Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks (2 Exch. Div., 441), Clegg, Parkinson and Co. v. Earby Gas Co. (1896, Q.B.D., vol. 1, p. 592), Kerr on Injunctions (3 Ed., p. 120), Hardcastle on Statutory Law (p. 239), King v. Lords, Commissioners of the Treasury (4 A. and E., 286). In Re Nathan (12 Q.B.D., 461), and Queen v. Secretary of State for War (1891, Q.B.D., 326). He submitted that the Customs Act was not specially for the benefit of the plaintiff or the association he represented. The article in question was not introduced for the benefit of manufacturers generally. The tax was put on for the benefit of Colonial printers, and plaintiff did not allege that he had any interest in the printing industry. Again, a mandamus was asked for against a Minister of the Crown, who was only responsible to Parliament and the Crown. He submitted that the declaration ought to be quashed.

Mr. Schreiner said his learned friend had put forward the alarming doctrine that a Minister of the Crown was absolutely free from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in regard to the breach of a statutory duty imposed upon him. The decisions which had been quoted dealt with cases where Parliament had provided a remedy. In this case they had a public statute. Was it to be allowed that such legislation as this should be absolutely at the whim of the Minister? After protest, the Treasurer still maintained that he could continue to suspend the law.

[De Villiers, C.J.: To my mind, the real difficulty is what locus standi has your client?]

Mr. Schreiner: On the declaration, he has a locus standi which is not denied, that he is interested in the due performance. It is enough to say that he is a taxpayer.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What you should say, and what you should prove is that the particular action of the defendant has caused damage, or will cause damage, to the plaintiff.]

Mr. Schreiner: I submit that that makes it beyond measure clear, but the law requires no special proof. It would be impossible to prove damages except by evidence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose there is not one inhabitant of this country who is not interested in the Government properly levying its duties, so that any inhabitant here could bring this action.]

Mr. Schreiner: I submit that is so, but plaintiff says he has a particular interest, because he is secretary of the Manufacturers' Association.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What breach of duty towards the plaintiff has the defendant committed?]

Mr. Schreiner: With great submission it is not necessary that a duty should be specially towards the plaintiff. When there is a duty towards the whole community, there is a duty towards each member of the community. Otherwise the popularis actio would never be necessary. Counsel went on to contend that the charter gave jurisdiction to the Court over the highest person in the land, who did not perform the duty imposed upon him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Ought you not to allege that there is injury or contemplated injury of a pecuniary character?]

Mr. Schreiner contended that it was not necessary that the plaintiff must show some direct monetary damage.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In Nothing's case the Court said there should be special damages.]

Mr. Schreiner: That was a case in which a penalty was provided.

Proceeding, Mr. Schreiner said that, on the face of the declaration, there had been a clear breach of duty. The Treasurer-General was in no better position in law than any subordinate officer, or other servant of the Crown. The Court had absolutely got jurisdiction, and upon the interest which the plaintiff said he had he was entitled to come to the proofs of such interest he actually had in the case, and to show the substantial and real interest he had in the remedy sought against the Crown. The plaintiff was entitled to have the law applied under the Charter of Justice, and see that the law was carried out. It was not attempted to deny that item 43 was not being carried out. It was for the public good that the Government should perform its duties which the law imposed, and every member of the public by the popular action could approach the highest Court in the land, which had jurisdiction to determine that the Government should not do wrong. Counsel cited Collector of Customs v. Cape Central Railways (6, Juta, 402), Broom's Maxims (3rd Ed., p. 183), Voet (44, 7, 8), Sigrau v. the King (12, S.C., 256), In Re Willem Kok and Balie (1879, Buch., 45), Bowers v. Miller and Hartley (3, Searle, 195), Hunter's Roman Law (1st Ed., 854), and Fraser v. Sivewright (3, Juta, 55).

Mr. Jones, in reply, said his learned friend had quoted a number of cases which were not apropos to this case. No remedy was given unless a wrong were shown. The plaintiff must show how he was interested. It did not follow because he was a taxpayer he was necessarily losing money. Counsel submitted that the declaration did not show that the plaintiff was entitled to any remedy at all, and he cited, although he admitted it was not exactly to the point, the case of the Bishop of Cape Town (Foord, 26).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 5th).

De Villiers, C.J.: The question raised in this case is whether the plaintiff is entitled, by reason of his being a taxpayer, secretary to the Manufacturers' Association, and interested as such in the due observance and enforcement of the Customs Act, 1906, to obtain a declaration that the Treasurer-General is not entitled to permit to be imported into this colony any printed catalogues without payment of the duty by law provided, and an interdict restraining him from permitting such catalogues to be so imported. It is not alleged that the plaintiff has sustained any damage or will sustain any damage by reason of the matters complained of, but his counsel has boldly contended that if the Treasurer has illegally failed to collect Customs duty in respect of printed catalogues imported through the post and weighing less than eight ounces, any taxpayer is entitled to the interposition of the Court to compel the Treasurer to do his duty, or at all events to interdict him from failing to do his duty. In support of this contention, Mr. Schreiner quoted a passage from Voet (44, 7, 8), in which the actiones populares of the Roman law are included among the actions proper, but the references made by Voet himself show that he was treating, not of the Dutch but of the Roman law practice. Under the Roman law, no doubt, an action could be brought by a private individual for the people (pro populo), and in the Digest (47, 23, 1) the definition of the popularis actio, as given by Paulus, is said to be quae sum jus populi tue-tur. The Digest then proceeds to lay down the conditions on which the action could be brought, one of them being (sec. 5), that while the defendant could appear by attorney the plaintiff could only appear in person, a rule which, if operative here, would have deprived the Court of the benefit of Mr. Schreiner's able and ingenious argument. The truth, however, is that the popularis actio became wholly obsolete in the Dutch practice. Groenewegen, in his comment on the title of the Digest just cited, says: "This title is nowhere observed, for no private person prosecutes popular actions so far as the public interest is concerned. For his own interest, however, it is permitted to every one to bring an action either by himself or by attorney." Voet also, in his commentary on the same title (47, 23), after stating that the popular action could be brought by any one ex populo, who had the right to proceed by action, added that in his time a private person could not bring the popular action, but could only proceed for his own private interest. As to our own law, I am not aware that any South African Court has ever recognised the right of any individual to vindicate the rights of the public where he himself has not sustained any direct injury or damage from a breach of the law. The nearest approach to such a recognition that I can find is in the case of Dell v. Town Council of Cape Town (9 Buch., 2), where it was held that the plaintiff as one of the public who had suffered from a nuisance, created by the defendants, was entitled to take proceedings for the abatement of the nuisance. The plaintiff was the General Manager of Railways, whose daily duties would, of course, require his presence at the railway station, and he, moreover, appeared as the representative of the railway employees. For the Town Council it was strenuously argued that the application should not have been made by any private person, but by the Attorney-General in his official capacity, but the Court held that the plaintiff had a sufficient locus standi. It is clear, however, from the judgment that if the plaintiff had not, as one of the public, suffered material injury from the nuisance, he would not have been allowed to intervene. Even, therefore, if the actio popularis had not been obsolete in Voet's time, I would have been prepared to hold that, seeing that such an action is wholly unheard of in any South African Court, and that, so far as criminal cases are concerned, it would be wholly inconsistent with the practice of our Courts, the plaintiff is not entitled to relief as the champion of the public, and not of his own benefit.

It is, in my opinion, a fatal defect in the plaintiff's declaration that it neither states that the Government has failed in any duty which it owes him, nor does it state that he has suffered, or is likely to suffer, any damage by reason of the Treasurer's alleged illegal conduct. Under our law an action can only be brought by or on behalf of a person to whom a debt is owing, or who has sustained damage, or is likely to sustain damage, by reason of an injury done to him or breach of duty owing to him, or whose rights have been otherwise infringed or threatened to be infringed. Where an enactment is for the benefit of the public, it was said by the Court in Central Railways Company v. Nothing (8 S.C.R., 23) that, in the absence of an indication to the contrary in the Statute, a person injured in his person or property, by failure to comply with an enactment for the public benefit, has a remedy in damages against the person upon whom the statutory duty is cast. Nothing was said in that case to justify the inference that without proof of damage or of breach of duty, owing to him specially, any one of the public may take up the cause of the public, and apply for an interdict or declaration of rights against the person who fails to perform his statutory duties towards the public. Much reliance was placed upon the maxim that where there is a right, there must be a remedy, but the maxim only applies where the right belongs to the person by or on whose behalf the remedy is sought. In the case of Ashby v. White (1 Smith's L.C., 216), it was held by the House of Lords that a man who has a right to vote at an election for members of Parliament may maintain an action against the returning officer for refusing to admit his vote, even though the person for whom he offered to vote were elected. The ground of the judgment was that the plaintiff had a particular right vested in him to vote, and that it was a wrong and an injury to that right to refuse to receive his vote. But what particular right of the plaintiff in the present case has been withheld or infringed by the Treasurer? It is said in the declaration that the plaintiff is interested in the due observance and enforcement of the Customs Act, 1906, but so is everyone else who takes an intelligent interest in the public affairs of the country. It may well be that if the Treasurer has been guilty of remitting duties illegally, the Collector of Customs may at some future time, on the principles laid down in Collector of Customs v. Central Railways (6 S.C.R., 402), be entitled to recover the amount from the persons thus illegally benefited, but that would be because the Collector is the official legally authorised to enforce the duty. The plaintiff has no such interest in the due observance of the Act as to give him a locus standi to proceed either against the Treasurer or against those who have benefited by the Treasurer's alleged illegality. It is quite consistent with the averments of the declaration that the action of the Treasurer in not charging a duty on printed catalogues in parcels weighing less than 8 ounces may be productive of a saving, instead of a loss of revenue. At all events, the declaration does not allege that the plaintiff, in his capacity as a taxpayer, or in any other capacity, has sustained damage by reason of the Treasurer's alleged illegality. Without now deciding that such an allegation would have cured the defects of the declaration, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed upon the declaration as it stands. The exception to the declaration must therefore be allowed, with costs.

Buchanan, J.: I was quite in accord with Mr. Schreiner's preliminary hypothesis as to the power of the Court to enforce the performance of the duty imposed upon any officer of the Government or upon any other individual. The only difficulty I had in this case was with reference to the actio popularis, and I wished to ascertain what this action really was before giving judgment. As His Lordship the Chief Justice has pointed out, this action no longer exists, and has become obsolete in Holland, and consequently in this colony, and therefore the only question remaining open was as to the locus standi of the plaintiff in this case. I need not add anything to what his lordship has said, for he has clearly pointed out the necessity for some interest in the individual who seeks redress in the Court. I fully concur in the judgment given that this exception to the declaration must be sustained, with costs.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan (for respondent): Would your lordships grant leave to amend the declaration if so advised, in order that the proceedings need not be started de novo?

The Chief Justice: I think you may have leave to amend the declaration. Of course, we do not know what the amendment will be. Then leave would be given, of course, to defendant to except to the amended declaration too.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

BERMAN V. CASTLE WINE & BRANDY CO., LTD. { 1907.
Aug. 1st.

This was an action brought by Benjamin Berman, a general dealer, of Simon's Town, against the Castle Wine and Brandy Co., Ltd., for the recovery of £60, being wages alleged to be due for supervising a bottle store at Waterford-road, Simon's Town, and £15, being a month's wages in lieu of notice. The plea set forth that there were certain negotiations between plaintiff and the defendant company in reference to the bottle-store, which negotiations had fallen through. An allowance of £20 had been made to the plaintiff for services rendered, and defendants tendered a further sum of £10. Defendants denied that they were liable for a month's salary in lieu of notice.

Mr. Toms was for the plaintiff; Dr. Greer was for the defendant company.

The plaintiff gave evidence relating to his engagement as manager of the store by Mr. R. L. Kramer. In the first instance, the bottle-store was carried on by a firm in which witness's brother was a partner, which firm became insolvent. The defendant company were the first bondholders. Witness was engaged to look after the place at a salary of £15 a month. He was there from February 1 until May 24, when Mr. Kramer said he no longer required witness's services.

In cross-examination, the witness said that after the engagement by Kramer he bought a grocery store at Simon's Town, and looked after it during the whole of this time. His brother worked in connection with the bottle-store, and witness paid him £5 a month extra. There was another man working in the bottle-store as a clerk, who was paid by defendants. Witness's brother travelled for both the bottle-store and witness's shop. He got £15 a month, of which £5 was for the bottle-store work. In proceedings in the Magistrate's Court drunkenness on the 25th May was admitted. Thereupon the Magistrate sentenced him to two months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Under the Act 27, 1882 (section 9), in case of a first conviction the sentence is a penalty of £2, and in default of payment imprisonment with hard labour for 14 days. In case of a second or subsequent conviction, the penalty is £5, or in default of payment, imprisonment for a period not exceeding 30 days, so that under this Act the utmost the Magistrate could do was to inflict a penalty of £5, or in default of payment, 30 days' imprisonment, with hard labour. Then by the Act 25, 1891 (section 28), the Magistrate has power to inflict a punishment of 12 months' imprisonment for drunkenness, but only in case of four convictions during the 12 months preceding. In the present case there was only one conviction within the 12 months, and therefore the utmost the Magistrate could have done was to inflict a penalty of £5, or, in default of payment, 30 days' imprisonment, with hard labour, so that the sentence of two months' imprisonment with hard labour will be changed into one of a £5 penalty, or in default, imprisonment for 30 days, with hard labour.

Postea (August 2nd).

De Villiers, C.J.: In regard to the case of Rex v. Jacob Jantjes from the Resident Magistrate's Court at George, the Magistrate has telegraphed that there is some inaccuracy in the record, and that the previous conviction had been under the Master and Servants' Act, and not for drunkenness under Act 22, 1882. There really, therefore, was no previous conviction by virtue of which there could be any aggravated punishment, and in lieu, therefore, of the sentence which the Court imposed yesterday of a fine of £5, or in default 30 days' imprisonment, there will be a fine of £2, or 14 days' imprisonment.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

POTGIETER V. POTGIETER.

Mr. Howes moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

MARSH AND SONS V. GROSS.

Mr. Inchbold moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

Mr. Inchbold afterwards moved for the appointment of Alfred Newton Foot as provisional trustee in the estate, with power to carry on the business.

Order granted accordingly.

SERLIGER V. HERBERT AND OTHERS

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence against the defendants jointly on a mortgage bond for £1,780 odd, being three-quarters the amount due on the bond, with interest; counsel also applied for the defendants' three-quarter shares in the property hypothecated to be declared executable. Plaintiff had been a party to the bond, but had taken cession of it from the bank, in whose favour the bond was originally passed, plaintiff having paid up the capital amount.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is a question whether it would not be in the defendants' interest that the whole of the property should be sold instead of three-quarters merely. I will declare the property executable, but not the three-quarters merely.

Provisional sentence granted for three-quarters of the amount due on the bond, and the property declared executable.

BURMEISTER V. EXECUTORS ESTATE VAN RENSBERG.

Mr. W. J. van Zyl moved for an order directing the defendants to file an account in the estate.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

GAUSS V. HARVEY.

Mr. Bisset moved for judgment under Rule 319 in default of plea for £97 6s. 4d., medicines supplied, medical attendance, and cash lent and advanced between September, 1904, and January, 1906, with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit. Defendant was sued edictally.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

HOSKING V. HOSKING. { 1907. { Aug. 1st.

Mr. Rowson moved for a decree of divorce in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Decree granted.

ANDREWS V. ANDREWS.

Mr. Gutsche moved for a decree of divorce in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights. The rule called upon defendant to show cause why a decree should not be granted, why he should not be ordered to pay plaintiff £500 in terms of an ante-nuptial contract, and cede an insurance policy of £1,000 in terms of the contract, why he should not deliver certain wedding presents, why plaintiff should not be declared entitled to custody of the child, and why defendant should not pay a certain sum for maintenance of the child. Counsel stated that in a letter of the 1st July, 1907, defendant offered in lieu of £500 to pay a sum of £8 per month until the child was married or attained the age of 21 years. This offer the plaintiff's attorney had accepted, defendant agreeing that the amount to be paid should be not less than £500.

Rule absolute, the amount of maintenance to be fixed at £8 per month, until the child attain the age of 21, or shall marry, with interest from date of contract, the amount so paid to be not less than £500, and to be in lieu of the payment of £500 directed by the rule, defendant to have access to the child at all reasonable times and places maintenance to be paid from date of order.

Ex parte WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, CLARKERBURY.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte PETRUSVILLE PROSPECTING SYNDICATE, LTD.

Mr. Wallach moved for the provisional order for the winding up of the company to be made absolute, and for power to the liquidator to appoint S. J. Mostert and Son, of Cape Town, as his attorneys, to assist in the winding up, and D. J. Wege, of Petrusville, as his law agent. Counsel explained that there was no attorney in Petrusville.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he could not appoint both.

Mr. Wallach said that he would ask the Court to appoint Messrs. Mostert as attorneys.

Rule absolute, liquidator authorised to appoint Messrs. S. J. Mostert and Son, of Cape Town, as his attorneys.

Ex parte INSOLVENT ESTATE MEYERS

Mr. Bisset moved for a certain rule nisi to be made absolute for recognition in this colony of the appointment of petitioner as trustee by order of the Transvaal Supreme Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Unfortunately, the Bill has not quite passed in both Houses which would facilitate these matters. Probably it will be passed before this estate is liquidated.]

Rule absolute.

STANDARD BANK V. PHILLIPS.

Mr. Watermeyer moved for a certain rule nisi to be made absolute calling upon respondent to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay costs of a certain action instituted against him by applicants on the 12th June, 1907.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte ESTATE SNODGRASS.

Mr. Watermeyer moved, on the petition of Mary Blanche Snodgrass, as executrix testamentary of the estate of the late David William Snodgrass, and natural guardian of her minor son, Herbert William Snodgrass, for leave to exchange a certain erf in the township of Elliot for certain two cows and one riding horse. It appeared that a major son had built upon the minor's erf, that the minor was not prepared to buy the building, and that the exchange was an equitable one. The value of the building was estimated at £250, and of the erf at £35.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ESTATE NEL AND ANOTHER.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for an order authorising registration of a certain transfer of property in the division of Aliwal North.

Order granted.

Ex parte BROWN AND WIFE.

Mr. Joubert moved, on the petition of husband and wife, for registration of a certain notarial contract, excluding community of property between the spouses. It appeared that the first-named petitioner was born in the Colony, and that he went to England in 1902, and was married to the second-named petitioner at Croydon on the 25th September. It was the intention of the parties to keep their estates separate, and before the marriage advice was taken from a solicitor in England, who said that the wife's estate would be protected. They had, however, since discovered that by the law of the Colony they were married in community of property.

Order granted as prayed.

PALMER AND ANOTHER V. LIQUIDATOR, GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS, LTD.

This was an application upon notice to the liquidator of the respondent company to show cause why an order should not be granted directing amendment of the liquidation account,

The petition of George Morrison Palmer, of Cranmere, Pearson, and his wife, Francis Susanna Palmer, stated that a copy of the order of the Court of the 9th April last, in connection with the third report of the official liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, had been served upon petitioners. The first-named petitioner was the holder of three debenture bonds of the face value of £300 in the company, forming part of the legal issue of 1707 debentures referred to in the liquidators' third report. In March, 1902, he was seized with a paralytic stroke, and continued to be ill until November of that year. He took a voyage as soon as the state of his health permitted, and travelled about for some twelve months. He returned to England about the end of 1903, having heard nothing of the liquidation of the Grand Junction Railways or the appointment of receivers of the partnership estate, nor did he learn anything relating thereto until some time subsequent to the acquisition by him of the debentures. During December, 1903, or January, 1904, Mr. John Walker, sen., approached him, and offered to sell him the debentures. Mr. Walker said he required the money, and as petitioner was glad to oblige him, and at the same time was satisfied that the purchase would be a good investment, he agreed and paid the cash within a few days. Petitioner had never recovered his health, and was still seriously ailing. With regard to the claim on the detached coupons, which the liquidator had brought up in his account as disputed, the second-named petitioner said these were delivered to the first-named petitioner on her account in part payment of the balance due to her in respect of an undertaking by John Walker, sen., to give her £15,000 debentures shares, and 10,000 ordinary shares in the Grand Junction Railways, in consideration of valuable services rendered by first-named petitioner to the said Walker in connection with the working of the company. Subsequent to first-named petitioner's return to England at the end of 1903, he approached John Walker, sen., for delivery of the scrip, or, rather, the balance to be delivered after allowance made for the payment of £2,000 by the said Walker some time previously. Walker, having no debentures or share at the time, said he would send first-named petitioner a parcel of coupons worth about £8,000 in reduction of his liability to second-named petitioner. This was in February, 1904, within a day or two of petitioners sailing for the Cape. The said Walker sent the coupons in question by the following mail. Until petitioners arrived at the Cape, they knew nothing of the liquidation of the company, and the coupons were taken in all good faith. Petitioners prayed for an amendment of the liquidator's account, admitting and including first-named petitioner as a creditor entitled to prove concurrently with the other creditors upon the debentures, and bringing up second-named petitioner as a creditor entitled to rank likewise in respect of the coupons brought up in the annexure to the third report as disputed of the face value of £8,097 1s. 11d.

Gerald E. D'Arcy Orpen, in a replying affidavit, said he was the general agent of Edward R. Syfret, the official liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, and had been concerned in the liquidation of the company. He drew the Court's attention to the fact that the petition was not signed by the second-named petitioner, nor did she make any verification of the allegations contained in the petition. The first-named petitioner was one of the persons associated with John Walker in founding the joint stock company, styled the Grand Junction Railways, Ltd. He was one of the directors from the inception, and had always been, jointly with the said Walker, trustee for the holders of the debentures issued by the company. The said Palmer must have been fully cognisant of the cession of the 20th July, 1898, from the company to the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Co. He also said that when he purchased the debentures he had no knowledge of the liquidation of the company, but in a letter addressed by him to the liquidator on the 21st September, 1905, he stated that the first intimation he had as to what was going on in connection with the company was when he saw the liquidator's notice calling for claims late in 1903, or early in 1904. In reference to the claim by the second-named petitioner upon the coupons, deponent called attention to a discrepancy between the allegations in the petition, and a letter addressed by the first-named applicant to the liquidator on the 10th December, 1904. Having regard to the intimate relations between the first-named applicant and John Walker, to the fact that the debentures in question were obtained by the applicant from John Walker, who would not be entitled to claim upon them, to the further fact that the said John Walker was attempting to claim upon them, to the further fact that the said John Walker was attempting to claim through third parties upon other debentures, and to the unsatisfactory nature of the explanation offered by the applicants of the circumstances under which they became possessed of the debentures and coupons, the liquidator strongly urged that the applicants should not be permitted to proceed on motion, but should be compelled to institute an action in order that he may be afforded an opportunity of thoroughly investigating their claim.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., for applicants; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that as regards the debentures, the Court might well dispose of this matter on motion. It was perfectly immaterial whether Mr. Palmer did or did not know at the time of purchasing the debentures whether the company was in liquidation. He purchased the debentures at par, and in ignorance of the fact that the company was in liquidation. In the case of the African Banking Corporation v. Liquidator, Grand Junction Railways (17 C.T.R. 377), it was held that the documents were negotiable securities. The liquidator had already obtained judgment against the receiver in respect of these three debentures. As to the coupons, Mr. Benjamin admitted that he could not press for judgment on motion.

Mr. Schreiner said that the claim was of a vague and uncertain character. This was a case in which it was absolutely necessary that the rights of the parties should be determined by action. The transaction was in itself of so suspicious a nature that the parties should be before the Court, so that the Court could determine whether this was or was not a bona fide transaction. These debentures had been put on the disputed list since 1903, and now for the first time a claim was put forward in respect of three of them.

Mr. Benjamin, having been heard in reply,

De Villiers, C.J.: The debentures stand on a different footing from the coupons, but it is quite clear that as to the coupons it would be quite impossible for the Court to give judgment in favour of the petitioner. Seeing that the coupons would have to be decided upon by action, I think it would be better also to postpone any decision in regard to these debentures. I think there is further information required as to the circumstances under which the sale from Walker to Palmer took place, and as to the knowledge of all the circumstances then existing and of the disputes which had arisen between Walker and the liquidator. I do not wish to say more than that at present. I do not wish to prejudge the case, but I consider that, on the whole, it would be better if both claims should stand over, and that the petitioner should bring his action in respect of both. The Court will, therefore, order that the petitioner proceed by action, to be brought to trial before the 14th November next, petition to stand in lieu of summons, costs of this application to be costs in the cause.

[Applicant's attorney: G. Trollip.
Respondent's: W. E. Moore and Son.]

MASTER, SUPREME COURT V. TRUSTEE, INSOLVENT ESTATE TUCKER.

Mr. Howel Jones, K.C., moved for an order upon respondent, Wm. Hope Simpson, in his capacity as trustee of the insolvent estate of William Tucker, to file a liquidation account and plan of distribution, and pay costs of this application.

Usual order granted.

Ex parte OFFICIAL LIQUIDATORS,
BUFFALO SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE
CO., LTD.

Mr. Burton, K.C., moved, on the petition of Messrs. Fleming and Powell, as liquidators of the Buffalo Supply and Cold Storage Co., Ltd., for a period of six weeks to be fixed within which claims must be filed against the company. Petitioners also applied for payment to them from the funds of a sum of not less than £500, on account of remuneration and disbursements. The liquidators also presented two reports on the liquidation. Counsel said that the liquidation had now been proceeding for a period of about two and a half years, and the liquidators had received no payment whatever. They had got in about £33,000, and the expenditure was about £22,000, leaving over £11,000 in the bank.

De Villiers, C.J.: An order will be granted in terms of the petition, and the Court will make the usual order as to publication of notice in regard to the filing of the reports.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

ESTATE STEPHAN V. ESTATE { 1907.
STEPHAN. Aug. 2nd.
" 9th.

Will—Interpretation—Distribution of estate—Assets realized after the death of the testator's surviving partner.

J. C. S. carried on business with his brother H. R. S. By his last will, J. C. S., after leaving sundry legacies to relations (the present defendants), instituted as heirs these relatives and H. R. S. H. R. S. was to receive $\frac{1}{4}$ and the other heirs, each an equal share of $\frac{3}{4}$ of the residue of the estate. Should H. R. S. continue to carry on the business for his own profit (or at his own loss) he was to remain in full possession of the entire residue of the estate so long as he should continue to carry on the business. In the event of his ceasing to do so either of his own free will or on account of his death, the other heirs could at once claim their inheritance of $\frac{3}{4}$ of the estate. Should, however, H. R. S. sell any of the immovable property or receive payment of any outstanding bonds; if such property or bonds belonged to the partnership estate, H. R. S. was at once to pay over to the other heirs $\frac{1}{4}$ of the amount received; if the said property, &c., belonged to the private estate of the testator, H. R. S. was to pay over $\frac{3}{4}$ of the amount received. H. R. S. continued to carry on the business until his death. There was other property in the estate in addition to immovables and mortgage bonds. Subsequent to the death of H. R. S., a bond due to the partnership estate for £2,000 had been paid off. Plaintiffs contended that the estate of the late H. R. S. was entitled to $\frac{3}{4}$ of this £2,000, and the other heirs to $\frac{1}{4}$. Defendants contended that the estate of H. R. S. was entitled to only $\frac{1}{2}$ of the £2,000 in virtue of the partnership, together with $\frac{1}{4}$ of the remaining half under the will.

The Court gave judgment in accordance with the defendants' contention.

This was a special case stated in the following terms:

The plaintiffs are Henry John Charles Stephan in his capacity as executor testamentary and James Cecil Bateman representing Graaff's Trust, Limited, in his capacity as assumed executor in the estate of the late Hendrik Rudolph Stephan.

The defendants are: (1) Johan Henoch Neethling Roos, in his capacity as secretary for the time being of the Board of Executors, Cape Town, who is sued in his capacity as the surviving executor testamentary in the estate of the late Johan Carel Stephan, otherwise known as Johan Carel Jacobus Stephan herein-after called the testator. (2) Casper Hendrik van Zyl, William Templer Buissinne, Gideon Brand van Zyl, and John Bennie Keyser, practising in co-partnership under the style of Van Zyl and Buissinne, in their capacity as representing by power of attorney for the purposes of this suit, the following, being the heirs or representatives of heirs of the testator, namely: (a) The secretary of the Board of Executors, Cape Town, together with Lachlan Charles McLachlan, in their capacity as the surviving executors of the estate of the late Johan Hendrik Lawrence Stephan, generally styled Lawrence Stephan; (b) William James Stephan, of Berg River Mouth; (c) the secretary of the Colonial Orphan Chamber and Trust Company, as the surviving executor testamentary of the estate of the late Dorothea Florentina Susannah Hinsbeeck (born Stephan), and, together with Johan Carel Hinsbeeck, the executors testamentary of the estate of the late Francois Jan Hinsbeeck, married in community of property to her; (d) the secretary of the Colonial Orphan Chamber and Trust Company, as the surviving executor of the estate of the late Elizabeth Johanna Novella; and (e) the secretary of the Board of Executors, Cape Town, being the curator nominate, and Elizabeth Petersen (born van Geems), now married in community of property to August Petersen, and by him assisted as far as need be, being the mother of the minors; (f) John Daniel van Geems (alias Van Gerns); (g) Abraham Benjamin van Geems (alias Van Gerns); and (h) William Charles van Geems (alias Van Gerns). (3) The said secretary of the Board of Executors, Cape Town, as curator ad litem of the said minors, John Daniel van Geems (alias Van Gerns), Abraham Benjamin van Geems (alias Van Gerns), and William Charles van Geems (alias Van Gerns), appointed by this Honourable Court. All the parties interested in the testator's will are before this Honourable Court. On or about November 9, 1898, the testator executed his last will and testament, and on January 17, 1899, he executed a codicil thereto. On February 6, 1900, he died leaving the said will and codicil of full force and effect. The said H. R. Stephan and the testator, for many years prior to the death of the testator and up to the date of his death carried on business together in partnership under the style or firm of Stephan Brothers, each having a half share in the said business and after the testator's death the said H. R. Stephan continued to carry on the said business as provided in paragraph 21 of the said will, and did so carry it on under the terms of the said will until the time of his death, to wit on the 4th July, 1906; and whilst carrying on the said business the said H. R. Stephan did not liquidate the business of Stephan Brothers or discontinue the same or take a partner into the firm of Stephan Brothers or float the same into a company or otherwise change the personnel or status of the firm. In paragraph 19 of the said will the testator instituted as his heirs the said H. R. Stephan and certain other eight persons named therein, subject to the conditions set forth in paragraphs 20 to 23 and by the codicil he revoked the institution in so far as one of the said persons, Samuel Novella, who predeceased him was concerned. In paragraph 20 of the said will the testator bequeathed one-fourth of the residue of his estate after payment and satisfaction of his liabilities and of certain legacies and charges none of which are necessary to specify to the said H. R. Stephan, and the other three fourths to the other said heirs in equal shares. The said legacies and charges have been duly paid, but none of them were paid out of the partnership assets. In paragraph 21 he directed that being desirous and anxious not in any way to put any obstacle in the way of nor to embarrass the present business carried on in co-partnership by him and the said H. R. Stephan, that the said H. R. Stephan would be entitled to remain in full free and unencumbered possession of the residue of his (the testator's) estate during his (the said H. R. Stephan's) lifetime, and to carry on the partnership business for his own account and profit during such lifetime. In paragraph 22 he directed that, if the said H. R. Stephan whilst so carrying on the said business should sell immovable property or receive payment of mortgage bonds belonging to the said partnership business, or to the testator personally and privately he should, if the property was a partnership property, pay over to the other heirs one-fourth of the proceeds of such sale or receipt, he (the said H. R. Stephan) being entitled to one-fourth as testator's heir and one-half as testator's partner in the said firm of Stephan Brothers, and that if the property belonged to the testator personally and privately the said H. R. Stephan should, as heir of the testator, be entitled to retain one-fourth of the proceeds and pay over the remaining three-fourths to the testator's other heirs, and the said H. R. Stephan while carrying on the said business did in terms of the said will sell certain land, part of the immovable property belonging to the said business and the amount of the valuation thereof according to the inventory in paragraph 10 of this case mentioned was in accordance with the judgment of this Honourable Court, dated 12th March, 1902, divided between the said H. R. Stephan and the said other heirs in the proportion of three-fourths and one-fourth respectively, and after the date of the aforementioned sale the said H. R. Stephan did dispose of other assets of the said business in terms of the said will, and the amount received therefor was divided in like manner between him and the said other heirs. In paragraph 23 he directed that in order to avoid all disputes and differences a full and true inventory both of his private estate and of the partnership business should be taken no longer than six months after his death, and that his said other heirs should be paid out their three-fourths share in his private estate and one-fourth share of the firm of Stephan Bros. on the valuations and accounts in the said inventory whenever such payments should in terms of the said will be made to them. On or about July 27, 1900, the defendant and the said H. R. Stephan (in his capacity as joint executor testamentary in the testator's estate) in accordance with the terms of the said will, framed the said inventory and valuation and the same has been accepted by the said heirs who are majors, and acted upon by the first defendants. The testator left at his death property belonging to the said business and also property in his private estate which did not belong to the said business. The parties are all willing to accept the inventory values as representing the basis upon which the defendant heirs shall be paid out in terms of clause 23 of the said will. The parties are desirous of having it determined upon what basis the testator's estate should be distributed as between the estate of the late H. R. Stephan and the other heirs of the estate. Among the assets in the partnership estate at the date of the death of the said H. R. Stephan was a bond passed by one Barnes in favour of the partnership for the sum of £2,000 which said Bond is valued in the inventory at the sum of £2,000, and has been paid off in the full amount since the death of H. R. Stephan. The plaintiffs contend: That the estate of the late H. R. Stephan is entitled to one half of the testator's share in the value of the said bond, that is to say, that the said estate is entitled in all to £1,500 of the said sum of £2,000, the other heirs being entitled to £500. The defendants contend: That out of the said sum of £2,000, the plaintiffs are entitled only to the sum of £1,250, and they, the defendants, to the sum of £750. Wherefore, the parties pray for judgment in terms of their respective contentions, and for an order regarding costs.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Mr. Van Zyl), for the plaintiffs. Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the Board of Executors. Mr. Benjamin, K.C., for the major heirs; Mr. Louwrens for the curator ad litem of the minors.

Mr. Burton referred to the case of H. K. Stephan v. Estate J. C. Stephan (12 C.T., 242), where the same facts were set forth. His Lordship there held that clause 22 was too clear to be got over, and it was clear the testator intended to draw a distinction between his partnership and his private property. If clause 22 was too clear to get over, then clause 23 was clearer still. In order to encourage his brother to continue the business, the testator made provisions very much in his favour. Counsel submitted that the three-fourths mentioned in clause 21 were three-fourths of the private estate. The words left it open but upon reading clauses 22 and 23, it was clear they were private assets. If they were not, the testator would have been removing the inducement from H. R. Stephan to carry on the business. There was another case, that of Stephan v. Colonial Government (13 C.T., 852, and S.C.R., 533), in which the will to some extent came under discussion, and there the Chief Justice referred to the clear distinction the testator intended to draw between his partnership property and the rest of his assets. The burden, he submitted, rested upon his learned friends to show where the distinction came in.

Mr. Schreiner said his learned friend's argument was that the words in clause 20: "The residue of the appearer's estate then remaining over," must be confined to the residue of the appearer's private estate. If he was sound in that argument, his contention should prevail. If he was unsound, his contention must fail. Now, was there any justification for the contention that in clauses 20 and 21, the words which repeatedly appear: "the residue of the appearer's estate," were to be treated exclusively as the residue of the private estate? There was no distinction whatever between the private estate and that share of the partnership estate which upon the moment of death and the dissolution of the partnership became just as much portion of the estate of the deceased as any of his private assets. If the words: "and one-fourth share of the estate of the firm of Stephan Brothers" had not been in clause 23, his learned friend could not have put forward the contention that he then put forward. The contention for the plaintiff had been based on the somewhat general language of the Chief Justice in the previous case, but his lordship had not indicated such an astounding contention that the whole of the earlier clause 20 was to be construed so as to refer only to the private estate, and the three-fourths of the residue which it was specifically stated was to go to certain heirs, was not to go to these heirs.

Mr. Benjamin said the 22nd clause of the will made a particular provision dealing with a particular contingency. If the 23rd clause had not been added the plaintiff would have had no argument at all. The previous case simply touched upon what the estate realised, while the business was carried on by H. R. Stephan. The plaintiffs, to support their case, were forced to read into the will that the 20th and 21st clauses applied solely to property belonging to the private estate. In order to make their contention good, they had to read private estate into these express clauses. There was no reference to private estate. In these provisions how could words like that be read into the will. If the contention was correct that these refer to private estate and private estate only, then they were driven to this: that there was no provision made for the distribution of the partnership of the estate in certain contingencies. That matter was really not touched upon in the previous case. The previous case only touched upon assets realised during the lifetime. He submitted that the true construction of the will was the contention set up by the defendants.

Mr. Burton, in reply, contended that even if the Court held that clauses 20 and 21 did refer to the whole estate, then his contention was a perfectly sound one. In the 20th clause, there was provision for payment of legacies and bequests, and the parties were agreed that these legacies and bequests were to be paid out of the private estate.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 9th).

Buchanan, J.: The late Johan Carel Stephan for many years prior to his death carried on business in partnership with Henry Stephan, under the style or firm of Stephan Brothers. Johan Carel Stephan died on February 6, 1900, leaving a will, by which he bequeathed in the first place sundry substantial legacies to relatives and others, represented in this case by the defendants. After giving directions as to these legacies, and making other gifts, the testator, in paragraph 19 of his will, instituted as his heirs his brother Henry Stephan, and the aforesaid legatees, subject to the conditions contained in paragraphs 20 to 23 of the will. Henry Stephan has now died, and the plaintiffs represent his estate. The conditions, subject to which the heirs were instituted, are comprised under three heads. The first of these is contained in paragraph 20, and provides that after the payment of the legacies and other charges, the residue of the testator's estate shall devolve one-fourth upon his brother Henry Stephan, and the other three-fourths upon the other heirs, share and share alike. The second of the conditions is contained in paragraphs 21 and 22 of the will. In paragraph 21 the testator states it to be his desire that his brother Henry should have every opportunity afforded him to continue the business of Stephan Brothers as heretofore, for Henry's own account and profit and loss during his lifetime; and being desirous and anxious not to put any obstacle in the way, or to embarrass the said business, the testator entitled and allowed Henry Stephan to remain in free and unencumbered possession of the residue of the estate, the claims of the other heirs to their shares therein being postponed until after the death of Henry Stephan. Then came two alternatives, the one in paragraph 21 and the other in paragraph 22. The first alternative was to the effect that should Henry Stephan liquidate the business, or discontinue it, or change the personnel or status of the firm, then in such event the other heirs should be entitled to claim "their three-fourths of the testator's estate accruing to them as aforesaid." These words in quotation marks can only have reference to the proportions provided for in paragraph 20. The second alternative is to be found in paragraph 22, and provides for the contingency should Henry Stephan decide to continue the business of Stephan Brothers. In such event it was provided that if, whilst so carrying on the business, Henry Stephan should sell any of the immovable property, or receive payment of any outstanding mortgage bonds, then, if the property sold or bond paid off belonged to the partnership business, he was required to pay over at once to the heirs one-fourth of the amount received, he being entitled "to one-fourth as heir of the testator and one-half as partner in the firm," but in case the property realised belonged to the testator's private estate, then he was to be entitled to retain one-fourth and pay over the remaining three-fourths to the other heirs. The paragraph also provided that should Henry Stephan alienate all the landed property belonging to the firm, he was to be considered as having discontinued the business, and the heirs would in that event be entitled to their inheritance. As a fact, Henry did elect to continue the partnership business. Whilst so doing he sold a portion of the landed property belonging to the firm, and the distribution of the money received therefor gave rise to a suit between the parties, which was heard in this court in March, 1902 (Stephan v. Executors of Stephan, 12 C.T. Rep., 242). In that action Henry Stephan claimed to be entitled to three-fourths of the proceeds of this landed property under the provisions of paragraph 22, while the other heirs contended that he was entitled to one-half as partner, one-eighth as heir, and another one-eighth as usufructuary, which latter one-eighth would have to be accounted for at the termination of his life interest therein, and that the remaining one-quarter should at once be distributed among the other heirs. The Court sustained the claim of Henry Stephan as to three-fourths being his absolute property under the terms of this 22nd paragraph. No appeal was taken against that decision, and it must be held still to bind the parties. It is important to note, however, that paragraph 22 does not apply to the whole of the estate which the testator had in the partnership assets, but only to such parts of it as were represented by immovable property or outstanding mortgage bonds. It appears from the report of the previous action, though it is not so expressly stated in the special case now under decision, that there were assets of the partnership besides land and mortgage bonds, and the distribution of such other assets was not dealt with by the former judgment of the Court. Moreover, the concluding part of paragraph 22, which directs that, should Henry Stephan alienate all the landed property belonging to the firm, he shall be considered to have discontinued the business, seems to imply that in such event the testator intended the heirs to be entitled to their inheritances of three-fourths of the testator's estate in the same way as they would have been entitled to such a share if Henry Stephan voluntarily discontinued the business, or it was discontinued from any other cause specified in this condition. Since the death of Henry Stephan a mortgage bond for £2,000, which had formed part of the partnership assets, has been paid off, and this action is instituted to determine the rights of the parties to these proceeds, though by consent of parties duly entered on the record, it is agreed that this should be considered a test case, and that the decision thereof should regulate the distribution of the remaining assets found in the partnership estate belonging to the testator. The plaintiffs contend that of the £2,000 which has been so realised, three-fourths, or £1,500 of the amount, should be awarded to the estate of Henry Stephan, and one-fourth to the other heirs. The defendants' contention, on the other hand, is that Henry Stephan's estate is entitled to only £1,250 of the amount, that is, to one-half of the £2,000, by virtue of his right as partner, and one-fourth of the remainder as heir under the will. The previous judgment of the Court settled how the proceeds of partnership land, which had been realised during the lifetime of Henry Stephan, and whilst he was carrying on the business of the firm, were to be distributed; and the question now is, whether or not the proceeds of bonds realised after the death of Henry Stephan, and after the business of the firm had been discontinued, are to be distributed in the same proportions, or whether they come under the earlier provisions of the will. The third condition contained in paragraph 23 must, however, be considered before a decision on this point can be given. The testator therein states his desire to avoid all disputes and differences, but the paragraph has the effect of obscuring the testator's intention rather than to make it more clear. In this third condition the testator "declares it to be his will and desire that not longer than six months after his death a full and true inventory and account shall be taken of appearer's private estate, and also that of Stephan Brothers, and that appearer's other heirs shall be paid out their three-fourths' share in his private estate, and one-fourth share of the firm on the valuations and accounts, as set forth and contained in the said inventory, whenever such payment may be made to them, and they shall not be entitled to claim any profits or gains made by the said Henry Rudolph Stephan should he continue and carry on the business, nor, on the other hand, shall such heirs be responsible for any losses." The plaintiffs rely strongly on this condition as limiting the rights of the defendants to take only one-fourth of the partnership assets "whenever such payment may be made to them." Such a construction is directly in conflict with the first condition in paragraph 20, and also with the second condition contained in paragraph 21, which provides for a distribution in the proportion of one-fourth and three-fourths, should the business be discontinued by Henry Stephan. It may, however, be construed consistently with these clauses if this third condition be read in connection with and applied to the circumstances dealt with in section 22, which immediately precedes it; and if it be considered as referring to any payments which might be made by Henry Stephan during his lifetime, whilst carrying on the business of the firm. The inventory and the account which the testator here directed to be made, is evidently something more than the inventory which the law, under ordinary circumstances, requires every executor to make for the purpose of specifying the assets of the estate. The object of the testator here is, to ascertain by this inventory and account the true value of the estate at the time. The necessity for determining the value by inventory of the testator's estate after his death would only arise if Henry Stephan was to remain in possession of the residue and carry on the partnership business. If he did not carry on the business the assets would be at once distributed, and there would be no object in taking the inventory and account provided for in this 23rd paragraph of the will. If the business was continued for the benefit of Henry Stephan, the value of the partnership estate would in all probability alter between the date of the inventory and the date of the subsequent liquidation, and it was, I think, the testator's desire by this clause to avoid any dispute arising from such probable alteration in value. The testator had already stipulated that any profits made or losses suffered by Henry Stephan in carrying on the business were to be for his benefit or at his risk. The Court should construe the will as a whole, and should accept a construction which would give effect to every part of the testator's expressed intention rather than adopt a construction which would make one part of the will conflict with another part. The one-fourth share in the assets of the partnership property mentioned in section 23, was, therefore, I think, intended by the testator to refer to the one-fourth mentioned in section 22. If this be correct, I think all the provisions of the will can be construed so as to make a consistent whole. In the first place, we have the testator instituting Henry Stephan in one-fourth and the other heirs in three-fourths of his estate, left after the payment of the legacies. Then the testator gave his brother Henry Stephan the option of continuing the partnership business during his life, and to enable him to do so he left the residuary estate in his hands whilst he so carried on the business. Next, we have the provision that if Henry Stephan decided to continue the partnership then out of the proceeds of any landed property sold by him or mortgage bonds paid to him, whilst so continuing the business, which were assets of the firm, a proportion of one-half instead of one quarter of the testator's share was to be retained by Henry Stephan. Lastly, that should Henry Stephan discontinue the business, his interest in the residue was to cease, and the assets belonging to the testator were to be distributed in the proportion of one-fourth and three-fourths. The partnership business was not discontinued by Henry Stephan during his life, but it has now come to a stop through his death, which event has also terminated his life interest in the residue. In the absence of any direction to the contrary as to what is to be done under these circumstances, it appears to me to follow that the institution of heirs in the proportion of one-fourth and three-fourths is the only direction of the will which it remains for the executors to observe. If this be so, then judgment must be given in favour of the contention of the defendants. As the executors were justified in coming to the Court owing to the obscurity of the will, costs of suit will, as usual in such cases, be paid out of the estate of the testator.

Hopley, J.: During his lifetime Johan Carel Stephan and his brother Hendrik Rudolph Stephan carried on a large and flourishing business under the style of "Stephan Brothers." In such businesses were involved assets of two kinds, viz., those belonging to the business, which I shall call partnership assets, and others which were the personal property of Johan Carel Stephan, which I shall call the private assets. In November, 1898, Johan Carel Stephan made a will, and he is hereinafter called the testator. He died in February, 1900, and his brother, H. R. Stephan, carried on the business of Stephan Brothers, in accordance with the testator's testamentary wishes and intentions, until July 4, 1906, when he died. While so carrying on the said business, H. R. Stephan realised certain of the partnership assets, and the proceeds were distributed in terms of the will, after an interpretation thereof had on that point been obtained by a case stated to the Supreme Court. An asset of a similar nature has since H. R. Stephan's death been realised by his executors, and the object of this action is to obtain a decision of the Court as to the proper distribution of the proceeds thereof, and of similar assets to be realised in the future. The will is set forth in full as an annexure to the case, cut up into sections 1 to 26 for convenience of reference, such numbering not appearing in the original document, and it appears to me to have been a mistake to separate the clauses now numbered 21 and 22, since in the original will they together form condition II., subject to which the institution of heirs was made. I shall presently consider them together as the constituent portions of the said condition, and as to the rest, I, for convenience, adopt the numbering of the paragraphs, which have been agreed upon by the parties. By the first 18 clauses of the will a number of legacies and bequests were made, and then section 19 proceeds to the institution of the testator's heirs, of whom he appointed nine in all; to wit, his brother, Hendrik Rudolph Stephan and eight others, subject to conditions immediately following in the original will numbered I., II., III., and in the annexure numbered section 20 (which is condition I.), sections 21 and 22 (which together are condition II.), and section 23 (which is condition III.). Section 19, which must be looked upon as the governing or disposing clause of the will, is, in so far as the mention of the property is concerned, in the widest terms, the heirs being instituted as such to all the testator's estate of whatever kind the same may be, and whether in possession, reversion remainder of expectancy. The first condition to be observed (sec. 20) is that after payment and satisfaction of all testator's liabilities and of all legacies and gifts, payments and charges under the will, one-fourth of the residue of testator's estate then remaining over shall devolve upon and go to Henry Rudolph Stephan, and the other three-quarters of such residue to the other heirs. This seems clearly to embrace all the assets of the estate, both the private effects of the testator and his share of the partnership assets. The next condition, however (sections 21 and 22), proceeds to make provision for the continuance of the business of Stephan Bros. by Rudolph Stephan during his life time, to give him usufructuary rights over the assets, both the personal assets of the testator and the partnership assets of the testator, and to lay down a mode of division between the heirs of such assets if realised by the said H. R. Stephan. Henry Rudolph Stephan was to have the right to remain in full, free, and unencumbered possession of the testator's estate (such as remained after payment of liabilities and bequests) during his lifetime, and the other heirs were not to have any of their rights as heirs until after his death, the object being to enable Henry R. Stephan to carry on the business of Stephan Bros. for his own account and profit and loss during his lifetime. But if Henry Rudolph Stephan were to liquidate or discontinue the business, or take a partner therein, or float it into a company, or otherwise change its status or personnel, then the other heirs were to be entitled forthwith to claim their three-quarters of the testator's entire estate. Nothing of that sort happened, and H. R. Stephan did carry on the said business unchanged as to status or personnel, during the remainder of his lifetime. We accordingly come to the further provisions of this, the second, condition, which are set forth in section 22 of the will, as annexed. In that paragraph the words, "Should none of the contingencies happen as set forth in this clause, and the clause preceding this," occur.

(One of the contingencies seems to be the death of Henry R. Stephan, but that may be passed over, as it is clear that the whole of the section refers to acts to be done by the said Henry R. Stephan whilst carrying on the said business. The clause, therefore, may be taken to mean that, should Henry Stephan not liquidate the said business, or discontinue it, or take a partner in it, or float it into a company, or otherwise change its personnel or status, or sell or alienate all the landed property belonging to the firm, and should he decide to carry it on for his own account, then if he should realise any of the immovable property of the business, or receive payment of mortgage bonds belonging to the said business, or if he should realise any immovable property, or receive payment of any mortgages belonging to testator's private estate, the proceeds are to be divided in different ways according to the nature of the asset whence such proceeds are derived. If the asset were immovable property or mortgages belonging to the partnership, then Henry Stephan was to pay over one-fourth of such proceeds at once to the other heirs, and retain three-fourths for himself, viz., one-half as his own by right as partner, and one-fourth as heir thereof by direction of the testator. But if the property producing such proceeds were the personal asset of the testator, then Henry R. Stephan should retain one-fourth as testator's heir, and hand over three-fourths of such proceeds to the other heirs. It is perfectly clear that the testator meant the partnership assets to be distributed in a different way from the private assets during Henry Stephan's lifetime, and his object may have been to give Henry Stephan every inducement to manage the partnership assets prudently, and to realise them to the best advantage. Without however speculating as to the testator's motives, it is clear that of the proceeds of testator's personal assets, Henry Stephan was to get only a quarter, whereas of testator's assets in the business he was entitled to one-half upon their realisation. Did such a state of things as regards the partnership assets last beyond the lifetime of Henry Stephan? It was argued that Condition III. (section 23) had the effect of protracting the basis of division beyond the lifetime of Henry Stephan, because of the words "whenever such payment may be made to them." I am, however, of opinion that that condition should be read as having immediate reference to the preceding one, and to mean that while Henry Stephan was alive and carrying on the business the other heirs were not to be entitled to claim more, nor need they receive, less than their proportion of the values, according to the inventory, at whatever price Henry Stephan may have realised them, whether above or below the prices fixed in such inventory. If this meaning be given to the paragraph there is nothing obscure or contradictory in the will, and it seems to me to be the only natural way of construing it; for it can hardly have been the intention of the testator to extend the benefits which he meant for Henry Stephan, on account of his keeping the business going, to a period beyond the lifetime of the mind and hand to which he was ready to entrust the interests of his estate after his death. My view, then, of the present question before the Court is that, during Henry Stephan's lifetime, and while he was managing the business, special terms and privileges were accorded to him as to the partnership assets under his control, but that upon his death there was a severance of the common interests belonging to the respective estates of the testator and himself, and that all of such partnership assets as were then unsold were to be equally divided between his estate and that of the testator, that the testator's half share then fell into his private estate, and that the division was to be made as of the rest of his private assets. I am of opinion, therefore, that the contention of the defendants should be upheld, and that costs should come out of the estate of the testator.

Order granted.

ENSLIN AND DUVEEN V. LOUW.

Mr. Wallach moved for judgment for costs. Defendant, he said, was sued for return of a promissory note for £15 10s., signed by one Mostert, or the amount thereof, and costs. The note had been returned by defendant a considerable time after service of summons, but he had not paid the costs.

Order granted for costs.

WOLSTENHOLME V. WOL- } 1907.
STENHOLME. { Aug. 2nd.

This was an action brought by Maria Petronella Wolstenholme, of Cape Town, against her husband, Edward Wolstenholme, described as of Springbokfontein, Namaqualand, for a decree of divorce and custody of the child, or, in the alternative, a judicial separation.

At the outset a question was raised as to whether there had been proper notice to defendant of set-down of the case.

The Chief Justice said that he would hear the evidence.

The declaration set out that the parties were married at O'okiep on February 14, 1894. Plaintiff alleged that, owing to defendant's misconduct, she had had communicated to her a certain disease. She prayed for a decree of divorce on the ground of the defendant's adultery with some person or persons unknown; or, in the alternative, a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty.

Mr. Rowson was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

Wm. T. Birch, clerk in charge of the marriage register, Colonial Secretary's Office, gave formal evidence of registration of the marriage.

Maria Petronella Wolstenholme (the plaintiff) gave evidence, from which it appeared that she had been shamefully abused by the defendant while they were residing in Namaqualand. He had made most improper overtures, and when she refused he assaulted her.

By the Court: Her husband had been a miner under the Cape Copper Co. He knew that this case would be heard to-day. Mr. Shaw had told her that he had sent a summons to defendant.

Dr. McMullen also gave evidence as to having prescribed both for the plaintiff and defendant.

W. B. Shaw, jun., a clerk in the employ of his father, said that in 1905 defendant called at his father's office, and admitted having committed adultery.

De Villiers, C.J.: The chief evidence in this case is the evidence of Mr. Shaw as to the confession made by the defendant. That, taken in connection with the other evidence given in this case, I think justifies the Court in coming to the conclusion that there has been adultery. But there is not satisfactory proof that the defendant had notice of this case being set down for trial to-day, and the Court will grant a decree of divorce, with costs, and a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to the custody of the child, subject to the Registrar of the Court being satisfied that due notice has been given to the defendant of the case being set down for to-day. If it cannot be shown that notice was given there will be no decree.

Ex parte VAN DER WESTHUIZEN.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order restraining the Sheriff, or his deputy, from parting with, or paying over, the proceeds of a certain sale. Petitioner said that Jacob Levin, of Moorreesburg, Malmesbury division, was indebted to him in the sum of £50, balance of a bond. On June 28 last Levin gave notice in the "Gazette" of his intention to surrender his estate as insolvent. That notice was not acted upon, and the creditors accepted a compromise of 5s. in the £. Respondent's goods had since been attached under a writ of execution, and these goods had been advertised for sale by public auction this (Friday) morning. A fresh notice of intention to surrender appeared in the "Gazette." Unless the proceeds were interdicted, the judgment creditors, Messrs. Zeederburg and Duncan, would be preferred over the general body of creditors.

Order granted as prayed, with leave to telegraph same.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte DIVISIONAL COURT } 1907.
CIL OF MOSSEL BAY. { Aug. 2nd.

Mr. Toms moved for a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte BREGENZER.

Dr. Greer moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband, Ernest Raymond Bregenzer, in forma pauperis and by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Respondent was now believed to be residing at Livingstone, Rhodesia. Counsel said he was prepared to certify probabilis causa.

Petitioner appeared in person, and, in answer to the Court, said that she was without means with which to institute an action.

Rule nisi granted, calling upon respondent to show cause why petitioner should not be admitted to sue him in forma pauperis, and leave granted to sue by edict, rule and citation to be returnable on the 17th September, personal service to be effected.

Ex parte COX.

Mr. Sutton moved for leave to petitioner to sue her husband in forma pauperis for a judicial separation.

Subject to counsel's certificate, a rule was granted, returnable on the 9th August.

WILKINSON V. WILKINSON.

Mr. Sutton moved, on the petition of Catrina Hendrina Wilkinson, of the farm Engelwood, district Maclear, East Griqualand, for an order against her husband, Petrus Wilhelm Josephus Wilkinson, of the farm Stonedale, district Maclear, for payment of funds to enable her to institute an action against defendant for divorce, on the ground of his alleged adultery, and for alimony pending the action.

De Villiers, C.J. asked if notice had been given respondent of this application?

Mr. Sutton said that notice had not been given, and that he should have to apply for a rule.

Rule granted, calling upon defendant to show cause on the last day of term why a sum of £50 should not be paid by him to plaintiff's Cape Town attorneys, for the purpose of enabling her to institute an action against him.

Ex parte ABRAHAMSE.

Restitution of conjugal rights—
Insane spouse—Curator ad litem—Divorce.

On an application for the appointment of a curator ad litem to an insane woman, kept in confinement at a lunatic asylum, in an action instituted against her for restitution of conjugal rights and failing compliance for divorce on the ground of malicious desertion.

Held, that as her conduct under the circumstances could not be held to be wilful or malicious, the appointment of a curator ad litem was uncalled for.

Mr. Toms moved, on behalf of petitioner, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent his wife, who is a patient at the Valkenberg Asylum, in an action petitioner proposes to institute against her for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce and forfeiture of her half-share of the joint estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is that a ground for divorce?]

Mr. Toms: It is not a ground in our law at present.

[Well, the Legislature should be appealed to.]

Mr. Toms said that the petition was of a tentative character.

De Villiers, C.J.: I am clearly of opinion that this is not a mode of obtaining a divorce. The petitioner now desires to sue his wife for restitution of conjugal rights by reason of her permanent and total insanity, and, failing her compliance, then for a divorce. But, if the woman is insane, how can she be expected to comply with an order of Court? How can the Court make an order upon an insane woman to return to her husband, and how can it be held that there is malicious desertion on the part of the wife if she refuses to return? If the woman is insane there can be no malice. In the present case, so far from her desertion being intentional or malicious, she is detained, without her own consent at a lunatic asylum. Of course, another and wider question may be raised as to whether insanity is a ground of divorce, but it should not be by the roundabout process of a restitution of conjugal rights. It has never yet been decided that insanity is a ground of divorce, but if the applicant wishes to raise that point, he can do so by directly suing her for divorce on the ground of insanity, but that is not asked for in the petition.

Mr. Toms asked if the Court would allow the matter to be mentioned again on an application for a divorce on the ground of insanity.

De Villiers, C.J.: If you wish to have a curator ad litem appointed for the purpose of a direct action for divorce, then there must be a fresh petition. That is not the present petition, but I do not wish to hold out hopes that such a petition would be successful.

Ex parte McBEAN.

Mr. Sutton moved for leave to presume the death of Robert Moncton McBean, formerly of the B.S.A. Police, who was supposed to have met with his death through starvation, or to have been killed by wild animals while on his way to Tuli in October, 1899. Mr. R. M. McBean had insured his life for £250, and had ceded the policy to petitioner.

Rule granted calling upon all persons concerned to show cause on the last day of term why the death of the said McBean should not be presumed, rule to be published once in a Kimberley newspaper.

CHASE AND ANOTHER V. RIGGE.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs sought to have Lucy Mary Rigge, widow, of Cape Town, at present a patient at the Valkenberg Asylum, declared of unsound mind, and a curator appointed of her property.

Mr. Bisset was for plaintiffs; Mr. Sutton appeared as curator ad litem of the alleged lunatic.

Mr. Sutton informed the Court that he had interviewed the defendant on four occasions, and was unable to satisfy himself that she was of unsound mind. The defendant had come from the asylum, and was in the precincts of the Court.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the defendant had better come into the Court while the question of her state of mind was inquired into.

Mrs. Rigge, a well-dressed lady, then came into Court, and sat behind her curator during the hearing of the case, in which she manifested the keenest interest.

Mr. Sutton said that Mrs. Rigge had property of the value of about £15,000, and she seemed to have a good knowledge of her own affairs.

Mr. Bisset led evidence in support of the application.

Dr. J. B. Lester said that he practised in Cape Town, and had been attending Mrs. Rigge since December, 1905. He had had occasion to observe her conduct closely, and along with Dr. Thompson he signed the certificate upon which she was removed to Valkenberg. He came to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary that she should be placed under control. Mrs. Rigge was in an excited state. She kept her carriage horses and servants up at all hours of the day and night, and generally behaved like a person of unsound mind. Witness used to attend Mrs. Rigge's late husband, and found that he had considerable anxiety about the state of her mind. She recently visited Johannesburg, and on the way down she invited people who were absolute strangers to come and stay with her. Nurses were appointed to look after her, but she treated them in such a manner that they would not stay. Mrs. Rigge went away to Hankey, and while she was in Port Elizabeth she sent witness an invitation to a dance that she was to hold at the Town Hall, Cape Town. He discovered that about 25 invitations were sent out, amongst others to the Governor and Lady Hely-Hutchinson. Mrs. Rigge discussed the arrangements with witness for the dance, and at 8 o'clock on the very evening when the dance was to be held, she was still discussing the arrangements, but had made no actual arrangements. At 9 o'clock, she settled down again, and dismissed the subject from her mind. Just before she left for Hankey, she was preparing pickled fish and jams instead of making ready for the journey. Mrs. Rigge had frequently sent for him at all hours of the day and night without any apparent reason. On one occasion she took a hot bath about half-past three in the morning, and remained in the bath for about three or four hours, shouting and yelling.

By the Court: Witness considered that Mrs. Rigge was of unsound mind. He last saw her about four weeks ago, when he accompanied her to the asylum.

Witness, in further evidence, said that Mrs. Rigge had spent money extravagantly.

By Mr. Sutton: Witness was aware that Mrs. Rigge during the past 18 months had lost her husband, and some time previously she lost her only daughter. He had heard that Mrs. Rigge had taken a certain water treatment upon advice given her in Johannesburg. Mrs. Rigge was not suffering from delusions. She had a clear memory. She went for drives in her own carriage.

Mr. Sutton: I put it to you that this is not more than eccentricity?

Witness: I think it is more.

How do you draw the line?—It is very difficult to draw the line.

Witness, in answer to further questions, said that he thought Mrs. Rigge ought to be under restraint. He did not think it proper that Mrs. Rigge should go to her own house and be placed under observation. Mrs. Rigge had not been lonely when she was at her own home. Her house was always swarming with relatives. Witness had had the ordinary medical practitioner's experience of lunacy cases.

Dr. E. Thomson said that he practised in Cape Town, and had seen Mrs. Rigge on two occasions. On these occasions he came to the conclusion that she was of unsound mind. He formed this opinion upon the history of the case, conversation with Mrs. Rigge, and her general appearance.

By Mr. Sutton: Witness was of opinion that Mrs. Rigge should have been treated in a home or a private asylum, rather than a public asylum.

Dr. A. Cowper, of the Valkenberg Asylum, said that he had been in charge of the asylum since Mrs. Rigge was admitted. He was of opinion that Mrs. Rigge had been and was still passing through an attack of mania. He thought it was still necessary that she should be kept under control and supervision. He considered that it was much more desirable that she should be in a private asylum. As an experiment, he thought that she could be put in her own house under the care of nurses, but he was not very sanguine of the success of the experiment.

By Mr. Sutton: The case was just on the border line. He thought the experiment of putting Mrs. Rigge into her own house, under the charge of nurses, might be tried. Mrs. Rigge attended the Hollins's organ recital under the care of two nurses, and he believed she was anxious to hear Mark Hambourg's recitals. Mrs. Rigge's mental faculties were probably more acute now than when she was well. She was continually excited.

By the Court: She was continually excitable and talkative. She was always busy, and did nothing. She had at times what he would call acute emotional storms. On Sunday morning last she said that she wanted to make her will, and if not allowed, said she would cut her throat. She dressed in the most grotesque fashion. The attire in which she now appeared was her own.

De Villiers, C.J.: She is not at all grotesquely dressed to-day. She is very well dressed.

Mrs. Margaret M. Hutton (sister of Mrs. Rigge) said that Mrs. Rigge and her husband came out to the Colony in 1905 for the benefit of Mr. Rigge's health. He, however, died. Mrs. Rigge inherited his property, to the value of about £15,000. Before her daughter's death Mrs. Rigge suffered from melancholia, and had to be removed to a home in England. Mrs. Rigge recently went to England for about six months, and spent about £2,000 on the trip. She was generous to the point of recklessness.

Mr. Sutton said that Mrs. Rigge was accompanied by other relatives on the trip.

Witness, in further evidence, said that if anyone admired anything in Mrs. Rigge's presence she insisted on giving it to them.

By Mr. Sutton: Mrs. Rigge had a very nice little property in the Gardens called Bolingbroke. For many years Mr. and Mrs. Rigge had only about £200 a year to live on. Then Mr. Rigge inherited about £19,000. On the recent trip to England Mrs. Rigge was accompanied by three relatives, whom she was treating. Witness had been a little troubled about the ball Mrs. Rigge proposed to give. They were very much opposed to the ball. It was nine years since Mrs. Rigge was confined in a lunatic asylum at Northampton.

Horace W. D. Hutton (nephew of Mrs. Rigge) said that on her recent trip to Port Elizabeth respondent caused a good deal of trouble on board. Witness accompanied Mrs. Rigge. She was constantly shopping. She took £50, cashed a cheque for £30, and borrowed £18. At her home Mrs. Rigge used to keep a gramophone going until late at night, and to start it again at 5 o'clock in the morning. Mrs. Rigge kept the servants in the house constantly on the move. She was always sending for the doctor.

By Mr. Sutton: Witness was Mrs. Rigge's godson. Mrs. Rigge liked to have people at her beck and call, and make them feel that she was "somebody."

Wm. T. Dowsing, Mrs. Rigge's coachman, also gave evidence, stating that on one occasion Mrs. Rigge was in her bath in the early morning, and called out to witness and the milkman to help her out.

By Mr. Sutton: Witness was aware that Mrs. Rigge was subject to fainting fits. He understood that she was in a fainting fit when she was calling out from the bath.

Tom A. Smith, who is married to respondent's niece, also spoke of certain things which he had observed in regard to Mrs. Rigge's conduct while he had been living at her house.

A nurse at the asylum said that Mrs. Rigge's moods varied a good deal. At times she was quite reasonable. She was very excitable, but not violent. Mrs. Rigge often read magazines. She complained about being kept in the asylum. Witness had previously attended the insane, and Mrs. Rigge's general conduct was such that she considered her to be of unsound mind.

This concluded the evidence for plaintiffs.

Lucy Mary Rigge (the respondent) then gave evidence. She said that she objected to being declared of unsound mind. She did not like being at Valkenberg. The sights depressed her. Witness bought Bolingbroke in June, 1906, for £2,200, and had spent £1,400 on alterations. She had been expecting that her mother and sister would share the house with her. Her husband died about 12 months ago, leaving her about £19,000 or £20,000. She had her husband's remains removed to England, so as to be interred in the family grave. Witness had not given riotous bridge parties. As to the dance, she was carrying out a promise by her husband to her niece, Miss Hutton. Witness's mother resided near Port Elizabeth, and was 79 years of age. Witness was in St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton, about nine years ago. She remained there about four months. She had then got very depressed through having been frightened in a lunatic asylum. Witness went on to complain that she had been treated with indifference by the night staff at the asylum, and that she had been kicked when she had been writhing in pain. Witness's property was being looked after by Mr. Coulter. She was quite satisfied with his work. As to the incident of the bath, she cried out because she was in a fainting fit. She had no intention of committing suicide when she made the threat at the asylum.

Mr. Bisset mentioned that the relatives of the respondent had nothing to do with the removal of Mrs. Rigge to the asylum, but that she was sent there on the certificate of the doctors.

De Villiers, C.J.: I am not prepared to make an order that the defendant is actually insane, because that would be a permanent order, and it would have a permanent effect. But, at the same time, I am not prepared to order her discharge from the asylum. She has been committed to the asylum under the Act, and under the Act, as soon as the superintendent of the asylum is satisfied that she has regained her reason, he will do his duty at once by discharging her.

Respondent requested that she should be examined by a private practitioner, and suggested Sir Edmond Stevenson.

Mr. Sutton (in answer to the Court) said that no private asylums had been opened under the Act.

De Villiers, C.J.: Before giving a final order upon this application, I should like to have a report from another doctor, and I think from Sir Edmond Stevenson, as she wishes it herself. The Court will appoint Sir Edmond Stevenson to examine into the mental condition of the defendant, and to report to the Court as to the advisability of removing her to a private house in case she should be found to be insane, and in the meantime the Court will appoint Mr. Charles W. A. Coulter as curator bonis for the temporary care of the defendant, with power to receive rents and other income on her behalf, and to pay for the maintenance of the defendant at the asylum, the costs of this application, and such other costs as may have to be paid.

Dr. Cowper (at the request of the Court) then came forward.

De Villiers, C.J.: I take it that if she is left at the asylum, as soon as you are satisfied that she may safely be discharged, you will release her?

Dr. Cowper: Certainly.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

FITZGERALD V. ARGUS } 1907.
PRINTING AND PUBLISH- } Aug. 5th.
ING CO., LTD. } „ 12th.

Surety — Guarantee — Principal debtor—Benefit of excussion — Denial by surety of suretyship.

One Flynn having ordered some goods from the plaintiff, requested delivery, but the plaintiff refused to deliver without payment; whereupon the defendant telegraphed to the plaintiff as follows: "Kindly forward Flynn's goods. Will hold myself responsible his paying your account within fortnight."

Held, reversing the judgment of the Eastern Districts Court, that the defendant was a surety for the payment by Flynn of the price within the fortnight, that he was not liable as principal debtor, and that as he had, before pleading, claimed the benefit of excussion by way of exception to the summons, the exception ought to have been allowed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Justices Sheil and Graham, sitting in appeal in the Eastern Districts Court, from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Aliwal North.

It appeared from the record that one T. D. Flynn, of Queen's Town, had placed a printing order with the Argus Co., in Cape Town, for 500 plans, but that the company had refused to deliver same without first receiving payment. Flynn appears afterwards to have gone to Aliwal North, and on the 25th January, 1906, Patrick Michael Fitzgerald, an attorney practising there, despatched a telegram to the plaintiffs in the following terms: "From Attorney Fitzgerald, to Argus, Cape Town.—Kindly forward Flynn's maps; will hold myself responsible his paying your account within fortnight. Reply." Thereafter the maps were forwarded, but the account was not paid, and the Argus Co. sued Fitzgerald in the Magistrate's Court, Aliwal North, for the amount of their account, viz., £21 10s., reduced to £20 so as to bring the claim within the Court's jurisdiction. Defendant raised two exceptions: (1) that the summons disclosed no cause of action against him, and (2) that, if anything, it merely disclosed a suretyship by defendant for Flynn, and that plaintiffs had not alleged non-payment by Flynn to them, and defendant claimed the benefit of excussion. Otherwise, he pleaded that it was arranged between plaintiffs and defendant and Flynn that the plans should be sent by plaintiffs to defendant to enable him to collect certain moneys due by various parties for advertisements on the plans, and that the said plans were wrongly sent to Flynn's address, whereby defendant was unable to protect himself. The Magistrate overruled the exceptions, and found for plaintiff. The case was then carried on appeal to Eastern Districts Court, and Justices Sheil and Graham upheld the Magistrate's judgment, and dismissed the appeal with costs.

Mr. Bisset was for appellant, Fitzgerald; Mr. Upington was for respondent, the Argus Co.

Mr. Bisset quoted Pothier on Obligations, 1, section 372, and Klopper v. Van Staaden (11 S.C., 94). He submitted that the exception that the principal debtor had not been excused should have been sustained in the Court below. He urged that there never was such delivery, as the parties contracted for, and as the parties contemplated, and that that being so, Fitzgerald, at all events, could not be held liable, because he only came into this obligation on the implied understanding in the contract that the maps were to be forwarded to him at Aliwal North.

Mr. Upington said that the first question for decision was, what was the nature of the contract, if any, between plaintiff and defendant? It was perfectly clear, from the admissions made by defendant himself in the correspondence, that he regarded himself as liable.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, assuming that the plans were sent to him.]

Mr. Upington submitted that defendant could not then logically say that, because the plans were not sent to him, he was only liable as surety. The respondents were justified in looking upon this telegram in the light of an undertaking by Fitzgerald to be liable for this account, at any rate as a co-principal debtor. It was clear that he had regarded himself as a principal debtor.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I quite agree that the defence is not a sound one, but then the exception remains.]

Mr. Upington said that, seeing that defendant had throughout taken up the position that he was not liable because the plans were not sent to him, was he now entitled to claim the benefit of excussion? He cited Klopper v. Van Staaden (11 S.C., 98), and Hurley v. Marais (2 Juta, 156). Defendant could not, by his conduct, mislead his creditor into the belief that he contended that he was a principal debtor, and then afterwards avail himself of the benefit of excussion as a surety. Counsel submitted that defendant was now estopped from setting up the exception, for that he had waived the benefit of excussion.

[De Villiers, C.J.: My impression is that there is authority for saying that, even after denying the suretyship, the defendant is entitled to avail himself of the exception. If he has pleaded as against the plaintiff's claim, then he is debarred from raising it.]

Mr. Upington: That would seem to be a little inequitable.

Mr. Bisset, in reply, submitted that there was no inconsistency between the two defences. The fact that Fitzgerald said that the maps were to be sent to him at Aliwal North, so as to secure himself, in no way made him a principal debtor or the purchaser of the goods. Defendant had throughout taken up the position that he was a surety. There was no due delivery in terms of the contract in this case. The delivery was prejudicial to the surety, and he was entitled to take the exception.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (August 12).

De Villiers, C.J.: The questions arising on the appeal are whether the defendant, in sending a certain telegram to the plaintiff company, incurred the liability of a surety for one Flynn, and, if so, whether, on being sued as such surety, he was entitled to claim the benefit of excussion. The action was originally brought in the Resident Magistrate's Court of Aliwal North. It appeared from the evidence there given that Flynn had ordered certain plans of Aliwal North from the plaintiff company, for which payment had to be made before delivery. When the plans were ready, Flynn, by telegram, endeavoured to obtain delivery without immediate payment, but the plaintiff insisted upon the terms originally arranged. Ultimately the defendant sent the following telegram to the plaintiff company (Aliwal North, January 25, 1906): "Kindly forward Flynn's maps. Will hold myself responsible for paying your account within fortnight. Reply." Thereupon the plaintiff company forwarded the plans to the address of Flynn at Queen's Town, and on March 2, through the Standard Bank, drew upon the defendant for the amount of the account. The defendant refused to honour the draft, with the result that he was sued by the plaintiff for the amount, less £1 10s., in order to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrate's Court. The Magistrate held that as Flynn had failed to pay within the fortnight, the defendant became liable, not as a surety, but as principal debtor. On appeal to the Eastern Districts Court this view was upheld. It was held by Sheil and Graham, J.J., that the telegram was neither a guarantee nor a suretyship, strictly speaking, but an unconditional undertaking to pay the company's account if it were not settled within a fortnight. They further held that, even if the telegram did amount to a guarantee or suretyship, the defendant was in the position of a surety who had been accepted by the creditor as principal debtor, and therefore not entitled to the ordinary benefit of excussion.

I regret to say that this Court is unable to agree with the learned Judges in the Court below from either point of view. The essential requisites of the contract of suretyship are that the surety should incur only an accessory obligation, whilst the principal obligation of the debtor remains in full force (see inter alia, Cens. For., 1, 4, 17, 3), and both these requisites are present in this case. The obligation incurred by the defendant by means of his telegram was purely accessory or collateral to the principal obligation of Flynn, which remained intact, notwithstanding the telegram. The defendant undertook to be responsible for Flynn's paying the company's account within a fortnight, and there was no contract of any kind by which Flynn was released from his liability as the debtor principally liable. If, by agreement between the parties, the defendant had been accepted by the plaintiff company as its debtor in lieu of Flynn, it would have been a case of novation, and the defendant would have become the only principal debtor. But the defendant only undertook responsibility for Flynn's paying within a fortnight. The Judges in the E.D. Court held that there was an unconditional undertaking on the defendant's part to pay the company's account if it were not settled by Flynn within a fortnight, but they did not say that Flynn's liability ceased at the end of the fortnight. If Flynn's liability continued after the fortnight, as it certainly did, then it is the ordinary case of a suretyship for a debt payable within a definite time. It is not alleged in the present case that Flynn was insolvent or absent from the Colony, or that any other special circumstance existed, independently of waiver, which deprived the defendant of the right to claim an excussion of the principal debtor before he could be compelled to pay. At the trial he took the exception before pleading to the summons, and if he was entitled to the benefit of excussion the exception ought to have been allowed. The learned Judges, however, held that the defendant was in the same position as if he had undertaken by his contract to be principal debtor as well as surety. The passage cited by them from Van Leeuwen's Censura Forensis (1, 4, 17, 23) makes it clear that a surety may renounce the benefit of excussion, and that where a person binds himself as principal debtor as well as surety, he is understood to have undertaken payment of the debt as if it were his own, and as though he were the principal debtor. The reason given by Van Leeuwen, Voet, Pothier, and others for this rule is that unless the words whereby the surety binds himself as principal debtor are held to import a renunciation of the benefits they would be wholly meaningless. If, therefore, the defendant had said in his telegram that he would hold himself responsible as principal debtor (or had used words of like effect), for Flynn's paying the account, no fault could have been found with the Magistrate's decision. But there is nothing in the telegram or, indeed, in any part of the correspondence from which it can be inferred that the defendant took upon himself the liability of a principal debtor or which would be inconsistent with his being only a surety. The Judges say that the defendant practically admitted that he had undertaken unconditionally to pay the account in his evidence, where he said that if the plans had been forwarded to him he considered he would have been liable. This admission, subsequently made, cannot affect the meaning of the telegram, but it is clear that what he meant by his evidence was that if the plans had been forwarded to him at Aliwal, in accordance with what he understood to be the agreement, he would have been in the position of a surety who had obtained a counter security from the principal debtor. Such an admission does not imply that the defendant intended by his telegram to undertake the responsibility of a principal debtor even if the goods were never delivered to him. The requirement that the goods should be delivered to him would be quite consistent with his being a mere surety. The evidence on this point was given by the defendant in support of the defence pleaded by him in the event of his exception's being allowed, and his defence is perfectly intelligible. He says that the correspondence had led him to the conclusion that the plans would be forwarded to him at Aliwal North, instead of which they were forwarded to Flynn at Queen's Town. Some of the telegrams produced in evidence lend some colour to the defendant's plea. For instance, Flynn's telegram of 24th January, which was sent before the guarantee was given, requested the company to send the plans to the defendant, and after the guarantee had been given the company telegraphed to him as follows: "Will forward Flynn's sheets to your order, Tuesday." The company's manager said, in his evidence, that the word "order" should have been "guarantee," but the defendant was justified in construing the telegram according to the terms actually employed by the sender. It is unnecessary, however, for the Court to decide upon the validity of the plea. It was not pleaded until after the exception had been taken, and as the exception ought to have been allowed in the Magistrate's Court, no decision could properly be given upon the validity of the plea.

The question was raised in this Court whether the defendant, after having wholly denied his liability, was entitled to claim the benefit of excussion. In the Roman law, it was laid down by Ulpian (Dig. 46, 1, 10, sec. 1), that the benefit of excussion should not be allowed to a surety who has falsely denied his suretyship, but Voet (46, 1, 18) says, in regard to this passage, that it can hardly hold good under the modern practice whereby legal penalties depriving people of their rights had been abrogated. But even if the rule of the Civil law still obtained in this country, it could not be held that the defendant had falsely denied his suretyship. He admitted the telegram, but, rightly or wrongly, he construed it to mean that on the goods being forwarded to him he would be responsible for Flynn's paying for them within a definite time. The goods were not forwarded to him, and his opinion as to his responsibility in case they had been so forwarded cannot affect his legal position in the event which has actually happened. In his letter of 29th May, 1906, he admitted that he had guaranteed payment of the account provided the plans were sent to him, and when the case came to trial, so far from denying his suretyship, he took the exception in initio litis that he was a surety, and that the principal debtor should be first excused. His previous extra-judicial denial of liability cannot, therefore, deprive him of the benefits conferred by law on sureties. In the opinion of the Court, the defendant was merely a surety for the prompt payment of the debt by Flynn within a fortnight after the date of the telegram, and, as the defendant neither expressly nor tacitly renounced the benefit of excussion, he was entitled to claim that Flynn, the principal debtor, should first be excused. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed, with costs in this court and in the courts below, and the judgment amended by allowing the second exception.

Mr. Bisset (for appellant) asked whether the costs would include costs of the application made by Fitzgerald, for leave to appeal rendered necessary by the delay in forwarding the record from the Eastern Districts Court?

The Chief Justice: Your client might have saved those costs if the appeal had been in time. In any case, respondent should not suffer. There will be no order as to costs of the application.

Maasdorp and Hopley, J.J., concurred.

VAN RHYN V. BURGER. { 1907.
Aug. 5th.

Owner of land—Destruction of vermin by poison—Negligence.

It was agreed between two owners of land that each should occupy his garden as his own property, that each should properly fence in his garden and that in case of trespass by cattle he should not impound them or claim damages for such trespass. The defendant placed some poisoned wheat in his garden for the purpose of killing baboons, which were in the habit of doing damage there; and some of the plaintiff's goats broke through the fence erected by the defendant, which was somewhat faulty, ate some of the poisoned wheat and died from the effects. It was proved that the plaintiff had notice of the placing of the poison, and that with ordinary care he could have prevented the goats from trespassing in the garden.

Held, that the defendant was not liable in damages at the suit of the plaintiff, who was lessee of one of the co-owners.

This was an appeal from a decision of the R.M. of Clanwilliam, in a suit brought by the plaintiff, Daniel van Rhyn, for breach of contract, or alternatively for £6 damages, for loss sustained through the careless handling of certain goats by the defendant, Petrus Lusias Burgher. The judgment of the Magistrate was absolution from the instance. The plaintiff was the lessee of one Van Zyl, with whom the defendant was a partner in the farm Duikersfontein, and while the goats were in the garden it was alleged they were poisoned through the negligence of the defendant.

Exceptions were taken in the Court below to the summons by the attorney for the defendant on the grounds of vagueness, and of no law preventing the laying of poison in a garden, and that therefore no action for damages could arise. Both exceptions were overruled.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said the plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for breach of contract, or, alternatively, for loss sustained by careless handling of goats while being impounded. The amount of the damage claimed was arrived at by calculating the value of the goats lost by being poisoned. The farm Duikersfontein was owned by Van Zyl and Burgher, and the plaintiff was lessee of Van Zyl. One Du Plessis alleged that he was troubled by baboons, and so he laid poison down on certain portions of the garden. Some goats strayed into the garden, and the plaintiff alleged that the defendant did not keep the written agreement, which made it necessary to enclose the garden with four wires. The loss resulted from the delay in chasing out the goats. For the defendant it was admitted three wires were put round the garden, but if four wires had been used, the goats could have got through easily; in fact, in one witness's opinion, if the terms of the agreement had been carried out the goats could not be kept out. With regard to the contract between Burgher and Van Zyl, the Magistrate believed in the insufficiency of the four wire fence to keep out the goats. It was a reasonable contention by the defendant's witnesses that goats could climb up and get in where other animals could not pass. As to the allegation that the goats were not driven out quickly enough in the first instance, there was a want of care on the plaintiff's part. It was his duty, knowing there was poison, to safeguard the goats. He did not think the poisoning of the goats was a wilful act on the part of Du Plessis. There was no spite, malice, or other feeling of any kind proved. The damage could have been prevented by ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff. He was negligent in January and March. The judgment would be absolution from the instance.

Mr. H. S. van Zyl was for the appellant; Dr. Greer was for respondent.

Mr. Van Zyl said that the Magistrate did not quite correctly state the plaintiff's case. The general complaint against the defendant was that the plaintiff had suffered damage through the negligence and default, and at the instance of defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: On what ground do you put it that defendant is liable?]

Mr. Van Zyl said that the defendant put poison in a garden of which he had but limited ownership or limited use, and, through the garden not being properly fenced in, the plaintiff's goats got in, and, in consequence, were poisoned, and died.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What duty do you say he owed to plaintiff?]

Mr. Van Zyl said that defendant's duty to plaintiff was either that he should put no poison there at all, or that he should fence the garden in, so that the goats could not easily get in.

De Villiers, C.J., said it was a recognised thing that jackals were to be exterminated by poisoning. Supposing a man's dog went on to land where poison was set, and trespassed there, could the owner of the dog say that the owner of the land was liable if the dog were poisoned?

Mr. Van Zyl submitted that the cases were not parallel. The garden which defendant in this case had was not altogether his own property under the contract. This was joint property, of which under the contract portions had been set apart for gardens. The rest of the ground remained in common use. Counsel cited Bird v. Holbrook (4 Bingham, 628), Pollock (6th Ed., pp., 174 and 468), Rylands v. Fletcher (1 L.R., 1 Ex., p. 278), Eastern and South African Telegraph Co. v. Cape Town Tramways (17 S.C., 95), Digest (9, 2, 39), and Pharmacy Act, No. 34, 1891 (section 49).

Dr. Greer referred to section 54 of the Pharmacy Act. Burgher, he contended, had a right to use poison on his land, provided it were properly laid in such a manner that persons making proper use of his farm were not injured by it. In the case of Bird v. Holbrook, notice had not been given of the fact that a spring-gun had been set. Defendant in this case had given notice that he had set the poison. The Magistrate found that there was contributory negligence. From the terms of the contract, it was clear that Burgher had not a limited ownership in the garden. He was given a right to have the ground as his own. He had a right to lay his poison on the land, and he took all reasonable precautions, so that the poison should not be deleterious to the animals of other persons. Defendant had exercised all reasonable precautions. Counsel cited Clingen v. Ross (16 S.C., 152), Doig v. Forbes (7 S.C., 119), and Clark and Lindsell on Torts (4th Ed., pp. 15 and 154).

The Chief Justice mentioned Drummond v. Scarle (1897, Buchanan).

Mr. Greer said that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff in this case, or his agent, which directly led to the loss that he had sustained.

Mr. Van Zyl, in reply, submitted that the goats were not unlawfully upon the property where they were poisoned. Defendant had actually contracted himself out of the rights which he otherwise would have had to a claim for trespass.

The Chief Justice asked why, if Du Plessis laid the poison, the action was brought against Burgher?

Mr. Van Zyl said that Burgher permitted the poison to be placed on his land.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff in this case claims, as being the sub-lessee under Van Zyl, and as having all the rights which Van Zyl had under his contract with Burger, the defendant. I am quite prepared to treat this case as if it were an action between Van Zyl and Burger, and as if this contract were binding upon both of them. What happened was this. The defendant, who is tenant of Burger, being anxious to kill baboons, which did mischief in his garden, placed some poisoned wheat in his garden, and the plaintiff's goats, having broken through the fence which had been put up by the defendant, ate some of this wheat, and died in consequence. The clause in the contract upon which plaintiff relies is to this effect: Van Zyl and Burgher were each to retain the rights of ownership over the respective gardens occupied by them, but they were obliged within three months to fence in their respective gardens, and it was further provided that neither of them should have the right to impound the cattle of the other or to claim damages in respect of trespass. To that extent no doubt there was a limitation upon their rights, but because there was such a limitation the Court would not be justified in finding that there was a further limitation, and that neither of them would be entitled to use his garden in the way in which any lawful owner of land might use it, and to protect himself, for instance, against the ravages of vermin. It may well be that if the plaintiff had not had notice that the poison had been placed there, he might have had an action for damages against the defendant for not giving due notice to those whose cattle might accidentally trespass upon the land. This question, however, does not arise, for the plaintiff had due notice of the placing of the poison in the defendant's garden. The plaintiff after such notice should have taken special care to prevent his cattle from breaking through the defendant's fence, faulty though it was. The Magistrate has found—and I think the evidence supports the finding—that there was considerable negligence on the part of plaintiff's servants in not keeping out the goats from this garden. It is said that the servant of plaintiff had been prohibited by Du Plessis from entering upon this garden. If, in consequence of that prohibition, the goats had eaten the poisoned wheat, that might have been a good argument; but that was not the occasion when the poisoned wheat was eaten, it was on another occasion, whether before or after does not appear. It was not in consequence of the prohibition that the poisoned wheat was eaten. It appears to me that the plaintiff had notice that this poison was placed on the defendant's land, and had himself been careless in the tending of his goats, and preventing them from entering upon the defendant's land, and from eating the poison, and that the Magistrate properly held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

VAN VUREN V. VAN VUREN. { 1907.
Aug. 6th.

This was an action brought by Maria Caroline van Vuren (born De Wet), of De Doorns, against her husband, Henry Lourens de Wet, for a decree of judicial separation on the ground of his habitual cruelty.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on November 1, 1904, at Worcester, in community of property. After the marriage the parties lived together in Middelbunt, in the district of Vryheid, in the Colony of Natal, until November, 1905, when they returned to De Doorns and took up their permanent abode. There were two children of the marriage, aged two years and eight months respectively. Defendant had, during the continuance of the marriage, habitually ill-treated the plaintiff, and used cruelty towards her, and in particular did about February or March, 1905, June or July, 1905, July, 1906, and December, 1906, assault and strike the plaintiff; and on the first occasion he turned the plaintiff out of his house at night into the rain. By reason of the premises, continued living together with the defendant had become insupportable to the plaintiff, and she claimed: (a) A decree of separation from bed, board, and community of property; (b) division of the joint estate of the plaintiff and defendant; (c) custody of the two minor children of the marriage; and (d) maintenance for the said children at the rate of £6 per month, and costs of suit.

The defendant, before pleading to the declaration, took exception to the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground that he is, and has been since the marriage, domiciled at Vryheid, in the Colony of Natal, outside the jurisdiction of the Court; and that he is not, and has not, since the marriage been domiciled within the jurisdiction of this Court. For a plea, in case the exception be overruled, he admitted the first paragraph of the declaration, save that he did not live at De Doorns, and that he was not domiciled in this colony. He lived, and was domiciled, at Vryheid, in Natal. He admitted that the parties lived together at Middel-punt, in the division of Vryheid, Natal, until the month of November, 1905, and in that month, by reason of the disturbances in Natal, they came to reside with plaintiff's father at De Doorns, but such residence was only intended to be temporary, and in April, 1907, it was arranged between plaintiff and defendant that they should return to Natal. Thereafter plaintiff refused to accompany defendant back to Natal, though requested by him to do so. The ill-treatment set forth in the declaration was denied, and he prayed that the plaintiff's claim be dismissed, with costs. For a claim in reconvention, he said the plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully refused to return or cohabit with him, and he prayed for an order compelling the plaintiff to restore to him his conjugal rights, with costs of suit.

For a plea and exception to defendant's exception, the plaintiff said as to the defendant's exception to the jurisdiction of the Court, she excepted to the exception as being bad in law and embarrassing, in that the said exception set forth matters as of fact in contradiction of the allegation in the declaration contained. Wherefore she prayed that the exception be quashed, with costs. And in case the exception to defendant's exception was overruled, but not otherwise, plaintiff denied the allegation of fact in the exception, and said that for the past 18 months both plaintiff and defendant had resided in the district of Worcester as a permanent abode, and did still continue to reside there. For a replication to defendant's plea, plaintiff said that, save for admissions, she denied the allegations of fact and conclusions of law therein obtained, joined issue thereon, and prayed for judgment in terms of her declaration.

For a plea to the claim in reconvention, plaintiff admitted that she refused to return to or cohabit with defendant, but denied that such refusal was wrongful or unlawful, and said she was justified in so refusing by reason of the facts in the declaration and replication.

The defendant was barred from rejoinder.

Mr. Bisset for plaintiff; defendant in person.

Maria Caroline van Vuren, the plaintiff, stated she met her husband in the district of Vryheid, in Natal. On November 1 she was married in community of property to the defendant at Worcester by special licence. She was under age at the time, but her parents consented to the marriage. She went with her husband to Natal, and resided there for about a year. In November, 1905, she returned with her husband to De Doorns. At the time of the marriage, it was agreed they should live at De Doorns. The farm in Natal was near the border, and was in the neighbourhood of the disturbance. She thought if they returned to De Doorns they would live more happily. The defendant, before leaving Natal, made over his share in the farm to one of his brothers. When they left Natal they had definitely made up their minds to settle at De Doorns. Almost since the commencement of the marriage she had been unhappy. The defendant's ill-treatment, which commenced about a fortnight after the marriage, consisted of "strikes, blows, curses, and swears." About a month before the birth of her first child he turned her out in the rain. The commencement of the trouble was that the defendant charged her with unfaithfulness, for which there was no ground. The defendant, without any reason, was very jealous. Several times before the birth of her second child the defendant ill-treated her. While she was living in her father's house, the defendant again charged witness with unfaithfulness, and alleged she had flirted with friends who were staying in the house. The only cause she could assign for the defendant's conduct was that he was extremely jealous. Ultimately, about May this year her father refused to allow the defendant to remain in the house any longer. In Natal the defendant had on several occasions been intoxicated, but she had not noticed him under the influence of drink at De Doorns. It was impossible for her to live with the defendant any longer. During the whole time she had been at De Doorns she had been supported by her parents. For the first year of the marriage she had supported, by teaching, the defendant and herself. While she was suffering from fever, the defendant used to curse and swear at her.

Sophia de Wet, sister of the plaintiff, who resided with her father at De Doorns, gave corroborative evidence of the unhappy relations that existed between the plaintiff and defendant.

The mother of the plaintiff also gave evidence of the ill-treatment.

Cornelius de Wet, father of the plaintiff, said he went to Natal, and advised the plaintiff and the defendant to come to the Colony, in view of the possibility of a Kafir rising in Natal. It was settled in Natal that the parties should definitely reside in the Cape Colony. The defendant was to live with witness until there was a chance of purchasing a piece of land at Worcester, but he was not used to the farming operations here, and as a result of ill-treatment witness decided not to purchase the ground for the defendant. The defendant was desirous of the change to Cape Colony, as he dreaded an attack by the Kafirs. He would be glad to see the defendant back in Natal, and his daughter in her own home.

Mr. Bisset closed his case.

The defendant, in his evidence, said that on account of the trouble with the Kafirs he came to live in the Cape Colony. The understanding was that if his father-in-law procured land for him he was to remain, but as the property was not secured he made a plan to return to Natal. The plaintiff refused to accompany him, and gave as a reason that she was afraid of the Kafirs. The plaintiff finally admitted that she had never loved him, and did not wish to accompany him to Natal. He admitted that he had ill-treated her, but he promised her it would not occur again.

Maasdorp, J.: Upon the evidence that has been given in this case, it seems to me quite clear that the defendant and his wife left Natal only upon the understanding that they should fix their domicile in this colony. He seemed to have next to no property in Natal, and no prospects for the future, and Mr. De Wet held out some hopes if he were to come and reside here he might be able to do something for him by assisting him in obtaining land. With that in view, the plaintiff and the defendant left Natal for the purpose of taking up their residence here permanently. The exception taken by the defendant to the plaintiff's declaration must, therefore, be disallowed, the exception being to the jurisdiction of the Court, on the ground that the defendant has domicile in Natal. There is sufficient proof that the domicile of the defendant and the plaintiff at present is in this colony. It seems also to be perfectly clear that it would be impossible for these unfortunate young people to live together. The defendant seems to be influenced by an inordinate jealousy. He has suspicions of his wife, and when he is troubled with these suspicions he is carried away by the violence of his temper, and he has at times, as appears from the evidence, assaulted her, and this conduct has been of some considerable duration. Plaintiff has come to the conclusion it is impossible for such a life to continue, that it has become absolutely intolerable, and I think sufficient evidence has been given to prove it. There is nothing actually proved against the character of the defendant which proves him to be an unfit husband for the plaintiff, but his temper during jealousy is of such a nature that it is impossible for her to continue to live with him while he gives way to that temper. Under the circumstances, the Court must give judgment for the plaintiff, and give judgment in terms of prayers (a), (b), and (c) of the declaration, in that a decree of division of the joint estate is granted. The children are very young, the eldest being about two years of age, and for the present, certainly their custody should remain with the mother. It appears that at one time she was their sole support, that through her work she supported, not only the children, but the husband. Under all the circumstances, I am inclined to think he does not even possess the necessary means to support these children. For the present the custody of the children shall remain with the mother. There is also a prayer for maintenance, but upon the evidence that has been given, I come to the conclusion that he is wholly unable to comply with any order the Court might make as to maintenance. Consequently, no order will be made in that respect. It will always be open to the plaintiff, if she discovers hereafter that the defendant has become possessed of means, to apply to the Court that he should then assist her in maintaining the children, and she might also be entitled to maintenance for herself. The defendant will be ordered to pay the costs.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

NETHERLANDS BANK V. BARRY.

C. AND A. FRIEDLANDER V. HADJE BADROODIEN AND TEN OTHERS.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for judgment against all except the second defendant (Hadj E. Saad) for £86 ls. 6d., being amount due for professional services and moneys disbursed, a sum of £25 having been paid off the original amount. There was no service upon the second defendant. The matter arose out of proceedings which recently came before the Court in connection with the Moslem Cemetery Board.

Judgment granted against all the defendants, except Hadje E. Saad.

REHABILITATIONS.

Mr. Sutton applied, under section 117 of the Ordinance, for the rehabilitation of C. R. and P. R. Botha.

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

OLIVER V. OLIVER. { 1907.
 { Aug. 6th.

Mr. Pohl moved for a decree of divorce in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights. Counsel read a letter written by defendant while in gaol, stating that he would comply with the order of Court, and would be in Cape Town by the 24th July at the latest. Affidavits were put in showing that defendant had not returned to his wife.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte DE KORTE.

Mr. De Waal moved for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte CARR.

Mr. Marais mentioned this matter, which was an application for leave to petitioner to sue her husband in forma pauperis and by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights. Efforts to find the respondent had failed, and counsel now applied for leave to give substituted service, and for an extension of the return day.

Return day extended until the 15th October, and substituted service authorised by means of one publication in "Cape Times Weekly" and a registered letter posted to respondent's last known address in German South-west Africa.

Ex parte CAPE TOWN STOCK EXCHANGE, LTD.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., moved for a certain rule nisi to be made absolute authorising the reduction of the company's capital from £725 to £475, and for leave to dispense with the words "and reduced" in the company's title.

Buchanan, J., asked whether the latter part appeared in the rule?

Mr. Benjamin said that the rule called upon all persons concerned to show cause why an order should not be granted as prayed. The matter of dispensing with the words in question was entirely in the discretion of the Court.

Rule absolute, and leave given to dispense with the words "and reduced."

Ex parte KELLY.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones (with him Mr. Watermeyer) moved for a certain rule to be made absolute, admitting petitioner to sue R. P. Houston and Co. in forma pauperis for £500 damages for alleged negligence on board ship, whereby he had been injured.

Buchanan, J., observed that it was very unusual for two counsel to be engaged in a paper suit.

Mr. Jones said that in the recent case of Ottostrom v. Estate Stephan, two counsel were allowed.

[Buchanan, J.: If the Court allows two counsel now, the Taxing Officer would have very little discretion. I will appoint you as counsel, if you like, and Mr. Watermeyer may be briefed if they think fit.]

Mr. Jones said that they had no desire to get two counsel appointed by the Court, so as to bind the hands of the Taxing Officer.

Rule absolute, Messrs. Jones and Watermeyer to be counsel, and Mr. E. J. Schultz to be attorney to the petitioner.

[Buchanan, J.: It is clearly understood that the Taxing Officer has discretion in the matter.]

Ex parte ATTWELL.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., moved on the petition of George Brooke Attwell, of East London, for leave to sue W. M. Cuthbert and Co., Ltd. (East London branch), in forma pauperis for £1,000 damages. Petitioner stated that he had owed respondents a certain amount for boots and shoes supplied. On the 4th February, a summons was issued against him. He called upon the manager (Mr. McMillan) on that day, and gave him a cheque dated the 1st March for £2 17s. 1d., being £1 18s. 6d. amount of account, and 18s. 7d., legal charges. He obtained a receipt for the payment. Subsequently, however, the respondents took judgment against him in the Magistrate's Court, and his case was published among several other judgments in the "East London Dispatch" and other newspapers. He saw Mr. McMillan, who expressed his regret, and said that instructions had been given to the company's attorney, Mr. Drake, to have the summons withdrawn from the Magistrate's Court. Mr. Drake's clerk, however, said that they had not received any such instructions. Dependent demanded £20 and an apology. Respondents denied liability. As a direct result of publication of the judgment, petitioner had received notice from Messrs. Griffiths and Co., in whose employ he had been for 10 years, to leave their service. From the correspondence annexed to the petition, it appeared that Mr. Attwell had demanded £1,000 damages, that respondents disclaimed liability, and that their attorney seemed to think that petitioner should have informed him that he had settled the account. Not having been advised by Mr. Attwell, he took judgment against him in the ordinary course.

Upon counsel certifying probabilis causa, a rule was ordered to issue calling upon respondents to show cause why leave should not be granted, rule returnable on the 20th August.

Buchanan, J.: I would suggest that if they make a reasonable tender it should be accepted, and this action in forma pauperis will be saved.

Ex parte SLACK.

Mr. Louwrens moved for leave to sue one John B. McGregor by edictal citation, and to attach a certain lease ad fundandam jurisdictionem. The lease had already been attached so far as another respondent was concerned, and petitioner desired to sue Mr. McGregor in the same action.

Order granted authorising Mr. McGregor's name to be inserted in the previous orders, and extending return day of citation until the 12th September.

Ex parte ESTATE BOTHA.

Mr. Marais moved on the petition of the surviving spouse and executor testamentary for leave to mortgage half share of certain property in the division of Fort Beaufort, in which a minor is interested.

Order in terms of Master's report.

Ex parte WILLIAMS.

Mr. De Waal moved for leave to the petitioner to consent, on behalf of his minor son, to the partition of certain property, and to sign the necessary documents.

Order granted as prayed.

In re CAPE MINERALS, LTD.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan presented the report of the liquidator, and applied for an order upon certain prayers. The estate, he said, was small, the assets amounting to £67. The liquidator asked that the list of contributories should be taken as settled, should no objection be raised, after it had lain for fourteen days, without a further application to the Court.

Buchanan, J.: You had better follow the usual procedure. The report should first lie for inspection, and publication must be given, and then you can come back to the Court. The usual order will be granted, one publication in the "Cape Times."

Ex parte BLACK AND WIFE.

Mr. Louwrens moved, on the petition of Wm. H. P. Black and his wife, who reside at Green Point, for leave to the second-named petitioner to take transfer of certain property settled upon her by the first-named petitioner, in terms of a certain ante-nuptial contract, and to assume a mortgage liability of £1,800 on the premises. It appeared that the property was mortgaged for the sum of £1,800, at the time the ante-nuptial contract was entered into, and that it was their intention that the second-named petitioner should take it over, with the mortgage. The ante-nuptial contract, while describing the property settled upon Mrs. Black, was silent as to the mortgage registered against it. She was ready and willing to assume the mortgage liability upon receiving transfer.

Order granted as prayed.

LEVINY V. LEVINY.

Mr. Philipson Stow moved for an extension of the return day of a certain citation.

Return day extended until the 12th November.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

REX V. NAUDE AND { 1907.
ANOTHER. { Aug. 7th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Aberdeen, who had convicted appellants of a contravention of section 21 of the Scab Act, No. 20, 1894, and sentenced each of them to pay a fine of 10s.

The charge against appellants was that on the 13th May, 1907, at or near Aberdeen, being the joint owners of 231 sheep and 117 goats, and having become aware or had reasonable grounds to suspect that the sheep had become infected with scab, they neglected within seven days to give notice to the district scab inspector, and failed to make forthwith proper and diligent efforts to cleanse such sheep.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said it appeared to him that, if accused at the time they were informed by the inspector (Van der Merwe) that their stock were infected with scab, they would have insisted on clear proof of the existence of scab, as they did on a previous occasion. He had no reason to doubt the statements of the inspectors.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for appellants, Francois Johannes Naude and Francois du Preez, European farmers, of Aberdeen; Mr. Howel Jones, K.C., appeared for the Crown.

Mr. P. Jones said that the ground of appeal was that appellants had no knowledge of the existence of scab. He submitted that the charge had not been proved.

Mr. Howel Jones said he could not press the conviction, and he must leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Court.

Maasdorp, J.: It seems that not only is the evidence to some extent inconclusive in this case, but also the charge itself is defective, and it must to some extent have been embarrassing to the defendants. They are charged with being the owners of a certain number of sheep and goats on the 13th May, sheep which were scabby, and having those sheep, failing to give notice within seven days that the sheep were infected with scab. Now, it appears upon the record itself that the trial took place on the 17th May, and, consequently, the necessary time had not elapsed from the 13th May, when, as I take it, upon the charge they are alleged to have become aware as owners of these sheep that they were infected. It is said that the charge might bear the meaning that they were owners of the sheep on the 13th May, and were aware seven days before the 13th May that the sheep were infected with scab, but then there is no allegation that they were the owners of these sheep seven days before the 13th May. No exception was taken to this charge, and if the evidence had been perfectly clear as to the guilt of the accused, perhaps the Court might not have allowed the appellants now to take advantage of the defective form of the summons, but it seems to me that the defective form of the summons has some bearing upon the evidence which was subsequently given in the case. The inspectors arrived upon the farm on the 13th May, they inspected the sheep, and found them infected with scab. The Magistrate accepts the evidence of the inspectors upon that point. He himself, upon that evidence, comes to the conclusion that the sheep must have been infected seven days before; but I think that the Magistrate required the evidence of inspectors and experts upon that point before he made any finding upon it. There is no evidence that the sheep were actually infected seven days before the 13th May. Under these circumstances, considering the defective state of the charge and the inconclusive character of the evidence, I think that the conviction and sentence must be quashed. I omitted to say that the inspectors, on arriving at the farm, gave no intimation to the defendants that they intended to institute any prosecution. They gave certain instructions in respect of the cleansing of the sheep, and from the evidence, which is uncontradicted, it appears that the defendants thereupon diligently set to work for the purpose of cleansing the sheep. It must have been taken by the defendants then that there was no further charge standing open against them, when they seem to have done their best to carry out the inspectors' directions.

In re AUERBACH V. SCHWERS.

This was an application by J. M. P. Muirhead, as receiver in the business of Aron Auerbach, of Hamburg, Germany, for an order authorising realisation of the assets and restraining anyone from interfering with the business.

The receiver reported that there were no funds belonging to the business, and that the assets of the South African business principally consisted of a small stock in Cape Town and some samples at Simon's Town, and that the outstandings did not appear to be of much or any value. For the above reasons, it was impossible to carry on the business. He asked the Court for instructions as to what course he should pursue. He suggested that the assets should be realised, that the business should be closed, and that the proceeds of the sale should be paid into court pending settlement of the case between Auerbach and Schwerts now pending. From the second report of the receiver it appeared that certain disputes had arisen between him and one Max Otzen, who said that he held Auerbach's power of attorney.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for applicant; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Dr. Greer), was for respondents, Auerbach and Co.

Affidavits having been read, and counsel heard in argument on the facts:

Maaadorp, J.: When this dispute first arose between the parties, Schwerts claimed that he had an interest as a partner in the business of Auerbach, and the disputes between the parties assumed such a character that it was considered necessary that, pending the settlement of those disputes, a receiver should be appointed to have control of the business and carry it on if necessary. Mr. Muirhead was appointed under those circumstances as receiver. After his appointment, he discovered that there were not means in his possession for carrying on this business, and that it could not, consequently, be conducted by him as an actively going business. While performing his duties as receiver, he obtained possession of certain assets belonging to this business of Auerbach's, and, not being able now to use them, for the purpose of the business, he suggests that these assets should be sold, and the proceeds placed in the hands of the Registrar of this Court. After some correspondence had taken place between him and the representatives of Auerbach, the parties seemed to agree that that was the best thing that could be done, and ultimately there was a consent arrived at between them that the assets should be disposed of, and the moneys paid to the Registrar of the Court. If that were the only difference between the parties, the matter would now be settled between them, but there was another matter of difference which I would not now go into except that it affects the question of costs between the parties in the present motion. If it were not that it affected the question of costs, I would leave it, together with the other matters in dispute, to be hereafter the subject of litigation between Schwerts and Auerbach, but it appears that Mr. Muirhead also claimed that no one should be allowed to interfere with this business of Auerbach's, of which he had been appointed receiver. Now, it seems to me Mr. Muirhead took up quite a proper position in asking that no one should be allowed to meddle with this business, and the ground for his request was his feeling that Mr. Otzen had from time to time done acts which seemed to amount to interference. Upon that he makes this part of his petition that no one should be allowed to interfere with this business of Auerbach's. Under the impression that this application had a wider scope than I think. Mr. Muirhead intended, the respondents quite properly came before the Court to protect the interests of Auerbach. They seemed to feel that this application would go to the extent of preventing Auerbach from carrying on any business that he might wish in the future to carry on here by his agents, and if the applicant had had that object in view he would have failed, because the Court cannot prevent Auerbach from carrying on hereafter any business he might please. If anything Auerbach should do should have the effect of damaging Schwerts in the position he occupied under the original contract, he must protect himself by taking proceedings against Auerbach to recover such damages, but it is impossible for the Court to give a general order against Auerbach now to prevent him from carrying on business. Such an interdict could not be granted, and if Auerbach does anything wrong which will cause Schwere damage, Schwere will be in the position to assert his rights. This dispute between the parties has not necessarily caused all the costs in the matter, because Mr. Muirhead had necessarily to appear here to lay the report before the Court, and so to incur some costs. Now, I do not think that the receiver is to be blamed for the misunderstanding; it may be that, on the other hand, it was quite right for the respondents to see that their rights were in no way injured by an order that this Court might make. The Court will, therefore, make no order as to costs in this application. The receiver would, of course, take his costs out of the proceeds of the assets, but the title of the receiver to his costs must not affect the position of Schwere and Auerbach, and I think it should be left open to them, if hereafter it could be proved that the receiver's costs had been incurred through the default of one party or the other, that the party who is in the wrong might be responsible to the other party for the costs so incurred, but in the meanwhile Mr. Muirhead will be entitled to his costs as receiver, and his appearance here to lay the report before the Court will be part of such costs.

Mr. Schreiner urged that all the costs should be ordered to come out of the estate.

Maasdorp, J.: I do not think that the Court should give any order now that will affect Schwere in a manner which he could not have anticipated, and without his having had an opportunity of appearing here. The Court will grant an order in terms of the first prayer of the receiver's petition of the 3rd July, money to be retained pending further order of Court, no order as to costs, and the receiver declared to be entitled to his costs out of the fund.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

LOMAS V. LOMAS AND { 1907.
ARUNDALE. { Aug. 7th.

This was an action for divorce brought by Robert Lomas, a police constable, of Robben Island, again his wife, Emily Lomas (born Hefer), by reason of her adultery with the co-defendant, Francis Robert Arundale.

The declaration set out that the parties were married on December 12, 1905. They lived together for a few days. The marriage took place in Cape Town, and the wife was to have followed her husband to Robben Island after the honeymoon, but it appeared she did not do so. Subsequently he discovered she was living in adultery with the co-defendant at Kimberley.

Mr. Wallach was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Robert Lomas, the plaintiff, stated he married the first defendant on December 12, 1905, before the Resident Magistrate of Cape Town. They lived together for four days in Cape Town while on the honeymoon. His wife had been at Robben Island before the marriage. Witness left her on Friday, and she was to follow him to the island on Monday, but failed to do so. He subsequently got a letter from his wife, who was then living at Observatory-road, as follows: "Dear Bob,—I am gone from Long-street, but I don't think I shall be here long. I don't think you can keep a decent woman for a wife. I cannot well live on what you sent me, which is nothing at all. If you treat me like what you did the first week, how will it be when we are married years? I am going to my brother. Good-bye.—Emily."

[Buchanan, J.: What does this refer to: "If you treat me like what you did the first week?"]

I cannot say.

[Had you any quarrel during the first week? What do you think she means?]

I cannot say.

[Why didn't she go with you to Robben Island?]

She had her boxes at 50, Long-street, and she had arranged to go down to Observatory and take a room.

Mr. Wallach: Do you think this reference to money means that you did not give her enough?—If I had given her more she would have cleared all the same.

Where does this brother live?—I fancy this brother is a myth.

[Buchanan, J.: How long had you known her before marriage?]

About nine months.

[At Robben Island?]

No, at Cape Town.

Mr. Wallach: Did she know Arundale before?—She told me he persecuted her and followed her about, and she was afraid of him.

[Buchanan, J.: Before or after the marriage?]

Before.

The plaintiff, proceeding under examination, said about three months after he received the letter he found out she was living in Kimberley. He went to Kimberley, and there saw her walking about arm in arm with Arundale. The pair went shopping together. Witness had written to her to the effect that if she could "float" around Kimberley making trips to different places, she could find the money, so that he could get free from her. Subsequently he received a letter from his wife saying she had told Arundale that he (plaintiff) was writing to know how far Arundale was willing to help in the business. She wanted the affair settled on the quiet, and would like to know how it could be done without any scandal, and the cost.

[Buchanan, J.: You asked how much Arundale would give towards the expenses of the divorce?]

I have not mentioned Arundale to her.

[Buchanan, J.: It seems that you have.]

Mr. Wallach: I believe you made a claim for damages in your declaration, but you do not press that?—No.

A witness from Kimberley deposed to the defendants living in Sydney-street as husband and wife. They passed by the names of Mr. and Mrs. Arundale.

Buchanan, J.: You can take a decree of divorce. Of course, there will be no costs given against the first defendant, as they are married in community of property; any costs incurred the plaintiff would be answerable for. You can take costs against the second defendant.

Ex parte GROBBELAAR.

Mr. M. Bisset, on behalf of the applicant, moved for an order winding up the South African Co-operative Dairy Company, Limited, of Adelaide. The petitioner was managing director of the company, and the company was indebted to him in the sum of £443 15s. At an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders in Adelaide the following resolution was passed: "The meeting resolves, in terms of sub-section 3 of section 178 of Act 25, of 1892, that as it has been proved satisfactorily that this company, by reason of its liabilities, cannot any longer continue its business, it is advisable to voluntarily liquidate, and that such be done forthwith." Subsequently two writs of execution were taken out against the company at the suits of Jan Johannes Vosloo and Johannes A. Vosloo for £46 6s. 2d. and £17 19s. 3d. respectively, and the messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court attached six mules and two cream carts, which he sold to satisfy the judgment. Petitioner had ascertained that the liabilities of the company were about £18,000, and the assets were approximately valued at £7,000. It would be detrimental to the petitioner and the creditors if the proceeds of the sale by the messenger of the Court were paid to the Vosloos in satisfaction of their judgment. Petitioner prayed for an order in terms of sections 135 and 136 of Act 25 of 1892 for the official winding up and liquidation of the company, and suggested the names of Peter Davidson and Reginald Barker as official liquidators, and for an order restraining the messenger of the Court of the R.M. of Adelaide from paying over the proceeds or any part thereof of the said writs now in his hands to any other than the official liquidators.

An order was granted placing the company in liquidation in terms of the 135th and 136th sections of the Act 25 of 1892, Messrs. Peter Davidson and Reginald Barker appointed provisional liquidators, and a rule nisi to issue calling on all interested to show cause on the 30th August why these provisional liquidators should not be appointed official liquidators, with all the powers conferred by section 149 of the Act, the rule to be published once in the "Government Gazette" and once in a newspaper circulating in the district of Adelaide, and the messenger of the Court interdicted from parting with the proceeds of any assets of the company pending a further order of Court.

FIRST DIVISION.

WHITEHEAD V. ESTATE { 1907
WHITEHEAD. { Aug. 8th.

Plea in abatement—Will—Insolvency of legatee—Trustee—Parties to action.

To a declaration whereby the plaintiff sought to have his right under the mutual will of his parents declared, the defendant pleaded in abatement on the ground that at the time when the plaintiff's alleged rights under the will accrued the plaintiff was an insolvent, and to this plea the plaintiff excepted.

Held, that the action should not be allowed to proceed without the trustee of the insolvent estate being joined either as co-plaintiff or co-defendant.

This was an argument on the plaintiff's exception to the defendant's plea in abatement.

The declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff, who resides at Steynsburg, in the division of Steynsburg, is a son of the late Joseph Whitehead and his subsequently deceased spouse Wilhelmina Hendrina Fredrika Whitehead, born Coetzer, hereinafter respectively termed the testator and testatrix.

2. The defendant, also a son of the testator and testatrix, is sued in his capacity as executor testamentary in the estate of his mother, the testatrix.

3. The testator and testatrix were married in community of property, and on the 3rd April, 1877, duly executed a joint and mutual testamentary writing.

4. By the said testamentary writing the testating parties, inter alia: (a) appointed the survivor of them, together with the child or children of the marriage, to be the sole and universal heirs of the first dying; (b) provided that the survivor should be allowed to keep the whole joint estate under his or her sole direction and administration and remain in the full possession, and in the enjoyment of the usufruct thereof, in order to support the children until majority or marriage, when the survivor should be obliged to pay over to each the sum due to such child from the estate of the father or the mother; (c) provided that within six months after the decease of the survivor the whole estate should be sold by public auction, realised, and distributed among the said heirs.

5. The said testamentary writing constitutes the last will of the testator and testatrix, and thereby by mutual consent effected a massing of the joint estate with a disposition thereof after the death of such survivor and massing by such disposition all property of the joint estate of the testator and testatrix, including movables and certain landed property or farms hereinafter referred to, upon the conditions and stipulations set forth in such last will.

6. (a) The testator died on the 1st April, 1879, leaving him surviving the testatrix and 11 children, of whom plaintiff is one; (b) the said will thereupon became of full force and effect, and the testatrix adiated and accepted benefits thereunder, and enjoyed the usufruct of the whole joint estate, and under such will was, and administered the said estate as, the executrix testamentary; (c) after acceptance of benefits under the said joint will as aforesaid, the survivor (testatrix) was no longer entitled in law to revoke the said joint will or to make any disposition of the property of the said joint estate inconsistent with the provisions of the joint will.

7. The testatrix framed a liquidation account as such executrix wherein she brought up the landed property at the valuation expressed in an inventory annexed to the said account, awarded herself a half and child's portion of the total value of the joint estate, and in the account awarded the balance to the children of the marriage aforesaid. She subsequently paid to each child the portion of the balance so brought up in the account.

8. At the date of the testator's death the farms Palmietfontein, Kalkoenkrantz, and Vaalkrantz stood registered in the testator's name and were assets in the joint estate, and thereafter on the 27th August, 1881, the testatrix in her capacity as executrix transferred to herself individually the said Palmietfontein and part of Vaalkrantz, and sold the said Kalkoenkrantz and part of Vaalkrantz and received the purchase price.

9. The testatrix subsequently on 26th July, 1906, executed a separate will, to which at the trial plaintiff craves leave to refer, whereby she wrongfully and unlawfully purported to revoke all her previous testamentary dispositions, and wherein she purported to make a fresh disposition of her property and excluded the plaintiff from any share in the inheritance thereby sought to be disposed of.

10. (a) The property so disposed of constituted or included the said joint estate (including the portions paid out as aforesaid, but including the said landed properties or its proceeds), and the provisions of the said separate will were inconsistent with the provisions of the said joint will, and the said separate will accordingly is null and void and of no effect; and the said joint estate and the assets thereof have in law now to be administered and distributed under the said joint will only, but the defendant refuses so to do, and claims to distribute the same under the said separate will. (b) It is necessary that an executor adative should be duly appointed to carry out the provisions of the said joint will.

Wherefore plaintiff claims: (a) An order declaring the separate will of the late Wilhelmina Hendrina Fredrika Whitehead, born Coetzer, dated July 25, 1906, to be null and void and of no effect in so far as it concerns the joint estate of herself and the predeceased spouse Joseph Whitehead; (b) an order declaring that the said joint estate is to be administered and the assets therein distributed in terms of the joint will of the testator and testatrix dated April 3, 1877; (c) a declaration pursuant to the preceding prayer that an executor dative be hereafter duly appointed to administer the said joint estate under the said joint will; (d) alternative relief; (e) costs of suit.

For a plea in abatement before pleading to the merits the defendant says:

1. He admits paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of the declaration.

2. On or about the 1st April, 1879, the testator died.

3. On or about the 20th May, 1890, the plaintiff surrendered his estate as insolvent and Edward James Stanley, of Tarkastad, was appointed trustee in his estate.

4. The defendant contends that such rights (if any) as the plaintiff would now have had in respect of the estate of the survivor (to wit, the testatrix) became vested in the plaintiff on the death of the testator on the 1st April, 1879, as aforesaid, and (if any) passed to the trustee in his estate on plaintiff's insolvency as aforesaid.

5. The plaintiff is divested of all rights under the said will, and is not entitled to sue in this action which can be brought by the trustee only (if at all).

Wherefore defendant prays that plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

The plaintiff's exception to the plea in abatement, answer to plea in abatement, and replication were as follows:

For an exception to the plea in abatement, plaintiff says that he excepts to the same as being bad in law, in that it is not alleged in the said plea that the said trustee, therein referred to, heretofore at any time claimed or now claims any right to or share in the right of inheritance referred to in the declaration and the said plea; nor does it appear that the said trustee has any claim in the premises; nor is it alleged that the plaintiff is still an undischarged insolvent; nor generally does it show that plaintiff is not competent to sue in respect of the said right of inheritance.

Wherefore he prays that the said plea be set aside, with costs. And in case the above exception be disallowed (and not otherwise), plaintiff says for an answer to the plea in abatement:

1. He admits paragraphs 2 and 3, but denies paragraphs 4 and 5 thereof.

2. After his said insolvency he duly received his discharge under section 117 of the Insolvent Ordinance No. 6 of 1843, on the 12th January, 1891.

3. In respect of the share of the joint estate accruing to the survivor under the aforesaid mutual will of herself and her deceased husband (to wit, the half and a child's portion) the said survivor was fiduciary owner thereof, and no right or title therein, or in any part thereof, vested in the plaintiff till the date of her death.

4. At the death of the said survivor, the plaintiff's right vested in him for the first time, and not before, and at the said date he had already received his said discharge, the said survivor having only died in or after July, 1896.

5. The said trustee in plaintiff's then insolvent estate at no time claimed or sought to dispose of any right, title, or expectancy in or to the plaintiff's right to share as fidei-commissary heir or otherwise in the said share of the joint estate—the said trustee has knowledge of the fact relating to the rehabilitation of the plaintiff, of the action herein being instituted by him, and of the terms of the will under which he claims.

Wherefore plaintiff prays that the plea in abatement be set aside, with costs.

Mr. McGregor, K.C. (with him Mr. De Villiers) for excipient (plaintiff); Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Cose), for respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is your case that there was no vesting?]

Mr. McGregor: Yes. Continuing, counsel said the two cases which he relied upon were Huddingh v. De Roubaix (Buchanan, 1878, p. 36) and Lucas v. Hool (Buchanan, 1879, p. 132). In this case the will was such that at the death of the first dying, there was no vesting in the heirs in respect of the property belonging to the survivor, and the survivor was not a fidei-commissary, but there was not in respect of the survivor's half-share any definite vesting. If it were so that the several children at the death of the first dying did not at that moment instantly get a right which they could dispose of, sell, or otherwise, then the case was one in which the case of Jones v. Matthew applied. This was not a case of the ordinary bequest of the farm. It was a case where the survivors themselves had appointed two periods for paying out, the first period of distribution being the death of the first dying and then had to be paid out everything to each child, in terms of the will. If the testatrix had the dominium subject to a trust, then the dominium could not be in two places. Here the children's portion of the joint estate was subject to a fidei-commissum, but it was not a case like that of Rahl and De Jager (1 Juta, p. 38), where they appointed all the children as heirs, and they made the farm over to the children after the death of the survivor. That was a wholly different case from the case before the Court.

Mr. Schreiner said with regard to the joining of the trustee, there was the case of Pratt and Pitman (4 Juta, p. 189), which would be sufficient to show the validity of the plea in abatement. The exception admitted there was an insolvency and the appointment of Mr. Stanley as trustee. The trustee must be a party to the proceedings before the rights of the parties could be decided.

The case of Strydom v. Strydom (11 S.C.R., p. 425) was very much in point. There the action was one in which the person who had been an insolvent (Strydom) sued his trustee, and the trustee was sought by the insolvent to be interdicted from selling or interfering with a certain share in a certain property. The decision was that the trustee was entitled to do what he was proposing to do: to sell that share. That share was the second half-share in the farm then in question. Every word of his learned friend's argument had been to show that the trustee had no right because his client had no right until his mother's death, and his insolvency terminated during his mother's lifetime, and that he obtained rehabilitation during his mother's lifetime. If the Court decided in favour of the plaintiff on the exception it would be inferentially deciding upon the construction of the will. In the case of Hiddingh and De Roubaix the will was entirely different, and the circumstances were entirely different. In the other cases cited by his learned friend there was a life usufruct, but it was not attempted to show that in this case there was a life usufruct.

Mr. McGregor, in reply, said all this would have been very neatly indicated to the plaintiff if there had been a plea of non-joinder. The plea in abatement evoked the question of vesting.

De Villiers, C.J.: This action was brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of having his rights under a certain mutual will declared. The mutual will was made by the plaintiff's parents in 1877. According to the declaration the father died in 1879, leaving surviving him the mother and 11 children, of whom the plaintiff is one. Then in 1890, according to the declaration, the plaintiff became insolvent, and one Stanley was appointed as trustee of his estate. The objection was taken to the declaration that inasmuch as the trustee is interested in this estate as creditor, that the plaintiff was not entitled to bring this action, and if any action could be brought at all the action should be brought by the trustee. The counsel for the plaintiff contended that under the will no right were vested in the plaintiff during his insolvency which could be claimed by the trustee. Now, that is a claim which is in direct opposition to the rights of the trustee, if he has any, and if the Court were now to decide this point in favour of the plaintiff it would be practically deciding the point against the trustee, who is not before the Court, and on that ground I consider it is of the utmost importance that the trustee should be brought into Court either as co-plaintiff or as co-defendant. It is quite true that the plea in abatement does not raise this point specifically. The plea in abatement objects to the plaintiff being the plaintiff at all. I do not see that it can object to that, because if the trustee joins there is no reason why the plaintiff should not join with him. But there is this defect in the declaration, that the trustee, who has a very important interest in the decision of this case, is no party, and the Court will therefore allow the plea in abatement to this extent, that the action be not allowed to proceed without the trustee of the plaintiff's insolvent estate being joined either as co-plaintiff or as co-defendant, and to that extent the exception overruled, the costs to stand over.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

MCKINNON V. MCKINNON. { 1907.
Aug. 8th.

This was an application brought by John Hutton McKinnon, of Cape Town, upon notice upon his wife to show cause why he should not be allowed proper and reasonable access to the younger children of the marriage, or why the said children should not be handed over to his custody.

The case was before the Court a little while ago, when Mr. Justice Buchanan granted Mrs. McKinnon a judicial separation, with custody to her of the younger children, and custody to her husband of the other children, and reasonable access to both parties (17 C.T.R., 562). McKinnon now complained that he was not given reasonable access to the children placed in his wife's custody. Mrs. McKinnon, it appeared, has accepted a nursing appointment on Robben Island, and has had the children removed thither. Recently the present application came before the Court, but Mr. Justice Hopley, who was then sitting, declined to make any order, and suggested that the parties should endeavour to arrive at a settlement, and directed, otherwise, that the application should stand over in order that it might be heard before Mr. Justice Buchanan. No settlement has been reached in the interval, and the matter was therefore set down for hearing before Mr. Justice Buchanan.

Applicant appeared in person; Dr. Greer was for respondent.

Dr. Greer again read the affidavits which had been filed by the parties, and certain correspondence which had passed since the matter was mentioned before Mr. Justice Hopley.

Applicant said that the respondent was throwing serious obstacles in the way of his access to the children in her custody.

Dr. Greer said that applicant was trying to make his wife's life intolerable because she had been given custody of the younger children. Applicant seemed to have formed an altogether erroneous view of the order given by the Court when granting custody of these children to the respondent.

Applicant said that the children were living with coloured people, and were receiving no education.

[Buchanan, J.: Those statements should be put on affidavit.]

Applicant: They are facts. I had no money to put them on affidavit.

Buchanan, J.: The action was originally brought by the wife against the husband for a judicial separation, and the Court granted an order for judicial separation, giving the custody of the two boys, the elder children of the marriage, to the father, and the custody of the two girls, the two younger children of the marriage, to the mother for the present. No misconduct was alleged or shown against the present applicant, the father, and in law he is entitled to custody of the children of the marriage. The Court, however, has the power, as upper guardian of all minors, to act in these matters as it seems to the Court best in the interests of the children, and, considering that these two girls were aged seven and six years respectively, I considered that the interests of the children would be best served by giving the custody of the girls for the present to the mother. The dispositions of the husband and wife seem to be such that it was utterly impossible for the two to get on together, and a judicial separation was granted. Both parties are parents of the children, and entitled to have the children in their custody from time to time, so as to keep up and continue the parental affection which both parties have for their children. For this reason, the Court ordered that either party was to have access at all reasonable times and places to the children, the custody of whom had been given to the other party. The applicant now applies to the Court for a further order to enable him to have access to the two girls in the custody of the respondent. The applicant's temper, it seems to me, is a bad temper, and I think for the present it is better, in the interests of the children, that the applicant should not be where the respondent is, and that the respondent should not come to where the applicant is, but both parents are entitled to have access to the children, notwithstanding. At present the respondent is not able to have the two boys sent over to her on Robben Island, and she does not ask for that to be done. She says she can get away once a month, and when she comes to Cape Town she can go and have access to the sons at a time probably when applicant is at work. But the respondent, having taken these girls over to Robben Island, where they are under her control, though not exactly in her care, I think that the Court should see that the applicant has a right to see the children. I think it is most undesirable that he should go over to the Island to see the children. For the present, it appears to me, the respondent should be ordered to allow the girls in her custody to come over from Robben Island on the first Saturday in each month, and remain with applicant until the following Monday morning, when the applicant is to have the children sent back to respondent. If she wishes to apply to the Court for the boys to be sent to her, she may do so, but at present she says that would be inconvenient to her. There will be no order as to costs. This order will continue until a further order of Court is made. If there is any ill-treatment or any further quarrelling, the Court will then have to consider whether it is not desirable to make a further order. I will give this word of caution to applicant, that he will have to behave well to the children and not cause any more quarrels.

Ex parte ESTATE BOOSE.

This was an application upon notice calling upon respondents to show cause why Gother Mann, of the South African Association, should not be appointed provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Frederick Henry Boose, of Cape Town, with full power to finally liquidate the estate, and distribute the assets.

The petitioners were the South African Association of Cape Town, and certain others representing claims amounting to £22,000, with interest thereon, and the respondents represented claims amounting to £3,794 17s. 3d. Petitioners were in favour of the appointment of Mr. Mann as trustee of the estate; respondents were in favour of the election of Mr. Mann, Mr. Alfred Newton Foot, and Mr. John Andrew, as joint trustees. Petitioners held three votes, and respondents five, and at the second meeting of the creditors a deadlock consequently occurred, seeing that a majority in value favoured one course and a majority in number favoured another. In the affidavits it was contended for respondents that it was not desirable for Mr. Mann to be sole trustee, as other matters were involved in which the interests of the South African Association might conflict with those of the insolvent estate, more particularly in relation to the claim which insolvent said he had against the Muizenberg Estate Syndicate, and in respect of which he some time ago instituted an action. Mr. Mann filed a replying affidavit in which he denied that there was likely to be any such conflict of interests as alleged.

Dr. Greer was for applicants; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., was for respondents.

Dr. Greer said that Mr. Gother Mann was, apparently, acceptable to all the creditors, and the creditors who petitioned for his appointment represented by far the greater amount of the claims. Counsel referred to section 43 of the Ordinance, and In re Lyons Bros. (2 Juta, 136). In practice, the Court had always set itself against the appointment of three trustees, where assets were all local.

Mr. Buchanan said it was perfectly competent for the Court to appoint three trustees. The Court would bear in mind the wish expressed by the minority of the creditors that three trustees should be appointed. Mr. Gother Mann would have to represent certain interests which might very possibly conflict with the interests of Boose's creditors. It would not be any prejudice to the estate if three trustees were appointed. Just the same amount of commission would have to be borne by the estate, the only difference being that it would be shared by three trustees instead of being taken entirely by one.

Dr. Greer, in his reply, quoted Buchanan on Insolvency (p. 65), and urged that if the Court thought two trustees were required, Mr. Mann and Mr. Foot should be appointed.

Buchanan, J.: This is an application for the appointment of a provisional trustee. Meetings of creditors have been held, and the creditors cannot, by majority in number as well as by value, determine who the trustees should be. The policy of the law is that the creditors themselves should have the say and have the right to elect the trustees. There are two sets of trustees in this case. The first, as represented by the applicants, are the preferent bonded creditors, who are secured. The respondents represent the second bondholder and unsecured creditors, and it may well be that the interests of the secured may conflict with the interests of the unsecured. The secured creditors wish Mr. Gother Mann appointed trustee. All the other creditors were in favour of Gother Mann, A. N. Foot, and J. Andrew being appointed. Well, the estate seems to be rather a large one, and under these circumstances, there is no objection to appointing more than one trustee. At the same time, the interests are not so diverse that it will be necessary to appoint three trustees. I think, under the circumstances, two trustees should be appointed, and Messrs. Gother Mann and Alfred Newton Foot will be appointed joint provisional trustees, with full power to administer and liquidate the estate. I think the costs of the application, as costs of trustees, must come out of the estate.

Mr. Buchanan asked whether that would include respondents' costs.

Buchanan, J., acquiesced.

AFRICAN BANKING CORPORATION, LTD.
V. COURTENAY AND OTHERS.

This was an application brought by the African Banking Corporation, Ltd., upon notice calling upon William Harrington Courtenay and executors of estate Bailey to show cause why the set-down of the action brought by applicants against respondents for trial on 20th August should not be discharged, costs to be costs in the cause.

From the affidavits, it appeared that summons was issued on the 11th March last, and that subsequently the plaintiff's manager at East London, William A. S. Fairbairn, left for Europe. Mr. Fairbairn was a material witness in the suit. The case had been set down by plaintiffs a little while ago, their impression being that Mr. Fairbairn would be shortly returning to the Colony, in time for the trial. He, however, did not return, and he was not expected until early in October. The set-down was then withdrawn. In the meantime defendants, contending that there had been unreasonable delay by plaintiffs, set the case down for trial on the 20th August. To this plaintiffs objected, as they would not be ready for the hearing, and now applied for the set-down to be discharged.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., for applicants; Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Mr. Payne), for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin said he did not see how the defendants could be prejudiced by the case standing over until October. Mr. Fairbairn was a material witness, and if the case came on on the 20th, defendants could only get a judgment of absolution, and the proceedings would then have to be commenced de novo. It was not possible for plaintiffs to go to trial without Mr. Fairbairn's evidence. It was now said that the executors wanted to close off the estate of Bailey. The executors had only intervened as defendants. Plaintiffs cared nothing about the intervening defendants. The person who was responsible to the plaintiffs was Courtenay; he was the party whom they sought to make liable.

Mr. Burton submitted that plaintiffs had been guilty of considerable negligence. Although summons was issued in March, and the pleadings were closed in April, they took no steps either to secure Mr. Fairbairn's return in time for the trial or to obtain his evidence on commission. They had simply let the matter drift along. He could not oppose the withdrawal of the set-down under the circumstances, but he submitted that plaintiffs should pay wasted costs.

Buchanan, J.: The respondents in this matter are quite within their rights in setting the case down for trial on the 20th inst., but the plaintiffs (the applicants) say that, in consequence of the absence of a material witness, they are unable to go to trial on that date. Well, under these circumstances, a postponement of the case must be had, but any wasted costs must be paid by the applicants. The notice of set down of this case for trial on the 20th August will be discharged, applicants to pay costs of set down and of this application.

Mr. Benjamin (interposing) submitted that costs should abide the action.

Mr. Burton said that applicants were entirely to blame for the position in which they were placed.

Buchanan, J.: The lesser evil to the plaintiffs will be to pay the costs of this application, than let the case come on on the 20th August. I think the order I made will stand, and wasted costs will be paid by applicants, that is, costs of the set down and of the application. I think it ought to be a condition also that the plaintiffs go to trial next term.

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

PHILLIPS V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1907.
Aug. 9th.
" 23rd.

Agency—Guarantor—Public servant—Scope of authority.

The police officer in command of a certain sub-division of Police District No. 2 was authorized by instructions from Head Quarters to enter into a contract for the erection of certain stables, &c., for £140. One M. undertook the contract, but could not obtain the necessary building material without a guarantee for payment from some responsible person. The officer promised to see plaintiff paid on receipt of the money which would be due to M. on completion of the contract, and plaintiff thereupon supplied the material, charging it to M. M. left the work incomplete, leaving the unused materials on the ground, and the buildings were afterwards completed by the police themselves at a cost of £55. Plaintiff, after fruitless attempts to excuss M., sued the Colonial Government as M.'s guarantors, and eventually the Government offered to pay plaintiff £69 1½s., being the sum alleged to be due to M., on condition of plaintiff withdrawing his action and paying costs to date of tender. This offer plaintiff refused to accept.

Held, that even if the officer had absolutely guaranteed payment to plaintiff, he had in so doing exceeded the scope of his authority, and that the Government were not bound by any guarantee he might have given, but that the plaintiff was entitled to have his claim satisfied, as far as possible, out of such moneys due to M. as defendants might have in hand.

This was an action brought by Morris Phillips, a general dealer, of Kenhardt, to recover from the Colonial Government the sum of £119 4s. 7d. for material supplied in connection with the erection of police barracks in the division of Kenhardt, and £47 11s., taxed costs incurred in a previous action to recover the former amount.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a general dealer carrying on business at Kenhardt. In February, 1904, one Henvin MacDonald entered into a contract with the defendant whereby MacDonald was to erect certain barracks or buildings for the Cape Mounted Police at Schuit Drift and Poffadder, both in the division of Kenhardt. Thereafter the plaintiff, at the request of MacDonald and upon the guarantee by the defendant, through his duly authorised representative and agent, Inspector White, of the said police, then stationed at Kenhardt, to stand good for and secure to the plaintiff the payment for any goods or materials supplied by him to the said MacDonald for the purposes of the said contract, did at divers times between February 5, 1904, and April 30, 1904, sell and supply building material and other goods to MacDonald for the purposes of the said contract, to the total value of £119 4s. 7d. MacDonald, before completing the contract with the defendant, left this colony and proceeded to German West Africa without paying any part of his indebtedness to the plaintiff in respect of the goods sold and supplied. Before leaving the Colony, MacDonald had partially constructed the buildings, using therefor portion of the materials supplied to him by the plaintiff, and after his departure the defendant, by his servants or agents acting under his authority, proceeded with the construction of the buildings, using the remainder or part of the remainder of the said materials delivered, and the defendant had had all the benefit of the materials and other goods supplied. Thereafter the plaintiff made application to the defendant for payment of the amount due in respect of the supplies, which application was refused, and after due notice to the defendant he sued the said MacDonald by edictal citation for the sum of £119 4s. 7d., and on June 14 he obtained judgment against him for that sum and costs, and an order declaring that certain material still lying at Poffadder should be executable for the said claim. On the 25th June, 1906, a writ of execution was issued against MacDonald in pursuance of the judgment, and there was realised in satisfaction of the writ £7 2s. 6d. The taxed costs of the proceedings against MacDonald amounted to £54 13s. 6d., and after deduction of the sum of £7 2s. 6d. left £47 11s. still due in respect of costs. The plaintiff was entitled to payment of £119 4s. 7d. and the balance of costs incurred by the excussion of MacDonald, but the defendant refused to pay either of the sums or part. Plaintiff claimed £119 4s. 7d. and £47 11s., with costs of suit.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted that the plaintiff supplied certain material and goods to MacDonald. Inspector White had not at any time any authority from the Government to enter into any guarantee as alleged. He denied that notice was given to him of the proceedings referred to, and said that prior to issue of summons in this action he received no notice that the plaintiff held the Colonial Government liable upon the guarantee alleged.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Dr. Greer), was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Howel Jones, K.C. (with him Mr. Nightingale), was for the Government.

Morris Phillips, plaintiff in the case, stated he was a storekeeper carrying on business at Kenhardt. He knew Inspector White, of the Cape Police. In 1904 he was the officer commanding the Cape Police in the Kenhardt division, and so far as witness was aware there was no one to whom he was subordinate in that division.

At this stage Mr. Jones objected to the witness giving evidence as to what took place between him and Inspector White until the agency was proved, and the witness was ordered to stand down.

James Thomas White, sub-inspector of the police stationed at Beaufort West, stated when he was at Kenhardt he had no superior in that division. In 1903, mainly owing to the heat, he found it necessary to have certain buildings constructed at Schuit Drift and Poffadder for the convenience of the police. In the ordinary course he would communicate with his commissioner, and take the orders from him. Witness communicated with the Commissioner at Kimberley, and there was a considerable amount of correspondence about the contract. He received authority from the Commissioner of Police at Kimberley to spend £140 on the work at Schuit Drift and £75 at Poffadder. He reported he had made arrangements with MacDonald and the Commissioner of Police signified his approval, and witness made a contract with MacDonald, who was to supply everything except transport. MacDonald was a gentleman of "straw," and could not supply the material, and witness then went with him to the store and informed plaintiff that MacDonald had got the contract.

[Hopley, J.: You told the plaintiff that MacDonald had the contract?]

Yes.

[Had you at that moment any authority from the Government or the Commissioner at Kimberley to contract on behalf of the Government in the way of a guarantee?]

None whatever.

[Is it part of your duty, as inspector of police, to bind the Government in contracts without express orders?]

No.

[You had no authority to go and make any guarantee on behalf of the Government.]

Not with Phillips. I had authority to spend £140 with MacDonald.

[Did you bind the Government?]

Not in any way.

Mr. Burton: You went to see Phillips in order to tell him that MacDonald had the contract?—I did.

Continuing, under the examination, the witness said he went to Phillips because Phillips would not give Mac-Donald the wood and iron unless he saw a Government official. The plaintiff said: "Who is going to pay me?" and witness said: "When the work is finished and the money comes to me, I will see that you are paid." As officer commanding the division, the money would naturally come to him, and he would pay it out. The arrangement with Phillips was the most convenient one.

Cross-examined by Jones: The arrangement with Phillips merely was that when the contract was completed and the money came to him, he would see that Phillips got his money. What he meant was that Phillips would be present when MacDonald got paid. The contract was never completed. Witness did not order the children's hose, lace, and aprons which appeared in the plaintiff's account.

The plaintiff (resuming) stated that White asked him to make out the quantities and the cost, and these estimates were sent to White, but he said the cost was too much for the stables and the forage house. White then asked for an estimate for the stables only. Macdonald came first and wanted material, but witness would not give him credit for anything. Then he brought White to the store, and White said Macdonald had the contract, and if the goods were supplied he would see that witness got paid. Witness made it clear that he would have nothing to do with Macdonald at all. If White told him to supply the goods, he would do so in the name of the Government. White said "All right, you supply the goods, and I will see that you get paid from the Government." Witness sold to the Government, and entered the sale in the book in the name of the Government. Upon receiving a circular from Inspector White, as police officer, he supplied Macdonald with goods.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He had a note in writing from Inspector White to supply Macdonald with the provisions. He was positive that he received the circular from Inspector White.

The bookkeeper of the plaintiff said the goods were supplied to Macdonald upon an order to all storekeepers signed by J. T. White, inspector, C.P.2. As far as he could remember, the circular was to the effect to supply goods to the value of £25, but no more. Any goods supplied to be endorsed on the back of the order, and returned to the Police Office.

Nathaniel Milling, of the C.M.P., stated that in 1905, he completed the stables at Skuit Drift. When Macdonald left the barracks were practically finished. Witness completed the building with the material he found on the spot. The material was valued at £33 3s. Witness was to receive £55 for the completion of the building, but he had got nothing yet from the Government. Witness had spent £50 of his own money, but had not yet been paid. The officer commanding, Lt. Murdoch, gave witness his instructions.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He had no complaint about his account except that there was a little more delay than he expected.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Mr. Jones submitted that there was no case for him to answer. To begin with, Mr. White said he was not authorised to offer any guarantee on the part of the Government, and, secondly, he said that he did not do so. The plaintiff made the case of a direct sale to the Government, but there was nothing in the declaration which claimed the payment of this amount as upon a sale by Phillips to the Government. He submitted that he had no case to meet.

Mr. Burton said the case was still as it stood on the pleadings, that these were goods supplied to Macdonald upon the guarantee of White representing the Government. The note that was sent round to supply the goods might fairly be taken to mean to supply this man with goods. Supposing Macdonald were not a man of straw they would have been quite entitled to charge him and recover from him. Here was a man whom they knew no one would supply on his own account, and they went in and stood good for him. It was true as the declaration was worded it was stated as being a claim against them as sureties, and it was a pure technicality now to say that the whole claim should be thrown out. It was simply a question of error on somebody's part in the way these instructions were applied. If he had made a case of sale to the Government direct, he would have made a much stronger case. Counsel did not think the Government would be prejudiced in any way if the declaration was amended so as to make it a case of liability direct to Phillips. By their conduct they held out to the public that their chief local officer was authorised to take the necessary steps for seeing that this work was done. On the moral grounds, he could not conceive a meaner attitude on the part of a defendant than that of the Government in this case. They had taken these materials, which did not belong to them, and they deprived the plaintiff of the opportunity of executing upon these materials, as they put them into the buildings, and the Government admitted they had the benefit of all these materials, which they knew were supplied upon the recommendation and suggestion of their own officer. On the question of authority, counsel referred the Court to Blackwood Wright's Principal and Agent.

Inspector White (recalled by his lordship) said he had no recollection of having sent such a circular as that described by the plaintiffs' bookkeeper. It was quite possible that it might have been sent during his absence by the Acting Officer Commanding.

[Hopley, J.: Supposing the view of the evidence I take is that the real contract between him and the Government, represented by White, was one of limited guarantee, that is, when this man has completed his work and the payment is to be made, I will see that you are paid for these materials?]

Mr. Jones said he would then argue there was no breach of contract, because he had not completed the work. Proceeding, counsel said the work had only recently been completed. It took the department some time to find out what was actually due to Macdonald, and when they found out that £69 14s. was due by the Government to Macdonald, they had no objection to paying over the sum to the plaintiff, provided he was authorised to receive it by Macdonald, or he obtained an order of Court to protect the Government. As early as April, 1905, the plaintiff set up a claim against the Government, not on a guarantee, but as having supplied direct to the Government. Then, on the 12th January, 1906, a letter of demand was suddenly sent to the Commissioner of Public Works, but he knew nothing about the matter. It was the plaintiff's own fault that the matter came into court. The law was quite clear in regard to the position of Government officers, and it was laid down in the case of Morgenrood v. Colonial Government (9 C.T.R., 132). The authority of White was to enter into a contract with Macdonald, and no one else.

Mr. Burton having been heard in reply.

Hopley, J., said the application for absolution from the instance would be refused.

For the defence, Mr. Jones called Major Elliott, who was Commissioner of Police at Kimberley in April, 1904. He said he had authority from headquarters to have these buildings erected. He authorised White to enter into the contract with Macdonald. White had no other authority but to enter into that contract.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 23).

Hopley, J.: The plaintiff, a general dealer at Kenhardt, sues the Colonial Government for the sum of £119 4s. 7d. upon a certain guarantee alleged to have been made on behalf of the defendant by Inspector White, the officer in charge of the police in the district of Kenhardt, in February, 1904, that the defendant would stand good for and secure to the plaintiff payment for any goods or materials supplied to one Macdonald, who at that time had contracted to erect certain police barracks and stables for the Government at Scuitdrift and Poffadder, two outlying police stations, each about 150 miles from the town of Kenhardt. The plaintiff also sues for a further sum of £47 11s., being the unsatisfied costs of excussing the said Macdonald. The defendant denies that any such undertaking was given by Inspector White, and specially denies that he had any authority at any time to enter into any guarantee binding on defendant. At the date in question, the district of Kenhardt was for public purposes controlled from Kimberley, where there was a Resident Commissioner of Police in command of a wide area known as Cape Police District No. 2, or, more briefly, C.P. 2, of which district the detachment at Kenhardt policed the "K" division. Of the K division, the commanding officer was Captain White, and he was directly responsible to the Commissioner at Kimberley, who in turn was controlled from headquarters in Cape Town. There was telegraphic and postal communication between Kenhardt and the rest of the country. During the year 1903 there were communications between the offices at Kenhardt and Kimberley about the necessity of erecting stables and barracks at Scuitdrift and Poffadder, and these, though apparently dropped for a time, were resumed in November of that year, with the result that on January 30, 1904, Captain White, as O.C. of C.P. at Kenhardt, was authorised to conclude a contract with Macdonald, a local contractor, to build the necessary barracks and stabling at Scuitdrift for £140, and at Poffadder for £75, the understanding being that the Government would convey the material to, and do the necessary cartage at, the respective places. On February 2, 1904, accordingly, the contracts were entered into; or, at all events, the contract relating to Scuitdrift, the only one which has been produced, was executed upon that date. That contract stipulated that Macdonald was to erect the necessary buildings for the sum of £140; and the contractor seems then to have set about arranging to obtain the necessary material for the work, as well as a certain amount of the necessaries of life for the maintenance of himself and his family at the remote post where the work was to be performed. Macdonald, however, was known to be a man of straw, and none of the local shopkeepers were inclined to let him have any goods on credit. Yet he was, so Captain White says, the only man who would undertake the work at the price authorised by the Commissioner of Police. Failing Macdonald, the only probable way to get the work done would have been to detail certain members of the police force for such service, and that course, though feasible as a last resource, would have had the effect of depriving the district of proper police assistance and protection. Such course had not been authorised, and it is quite probable that it would not have been sanctioned by the Commissioner. Captain White, however, anxious to get the necessary accommodation, went with Macdonald to the plaintiff's place of business, and informed him that the contracts for Scuit Drift and Poffadder had been given to Macdonald, and that the material, etc., required was for the purpose of enabling him to carry out his undertaking. The plaintiff, not quite satisfied, then asked who would be responsible for the payment, whereupon White said that when the work was finished by Macdonald, and the money in payment therefor reached him, he would see that Macdonald paid the plaintiff. This satisfied the plaintiff, and he agreed to let Macdonald have the building materials. Those appear to me to be the facts so far as the building materials are concerned; but I may pause for a moment to comment upon a somewhat different complexion which the plaintiff endeavoured to give to the transaction. He maintains that he said at the interview in question that he would have nothing to do with Macdonald, but that he would only sell directly to the Government. He does not say that White agreed to this; but his evidence is to the effect that the goods were supplied on that understanding, and it will be seen (from annexures A and B to the declaration, that the accounts for the building materials are made out directly to the Government. Captain White denies that he purchased directly for the Government, and it is somewhat unlikely that he would have taken such a step, seeing that he had no direct authority to do so. Now the interview at which the supplying of the material was arranged took place early in February, and it is admitted that there was only one interview dealing with that matter, but the material had to be ordered from Port Elizabeth, and was not actually supplied until the month of April, with the exception, that is, of five windows and frames, which were immediately required for Scuit-drift, and which were found in the plaintiff's local stock. These were supplied on February 8, and the entry in the plaintiff's books as regards them is significant. Had the contract been as alleged by plaintiff, the entry should have been made forthwith in an account with the Colonial Government; but the entry made at that time was against Macdonald, being in the counter-book as follows: "H. Macdonald, care of Captain White, five windows and frames, 52s. 6d., £10 12s. 6d., and the item was transferred in the same way to the ledger, in which the whole entry (see fol. 202) is as follows: "1904, care of Captain White, C.P.2, Kenhardt, H. Macdonald (material account).—February 8: To five windows and frames (52s. 6d.), £10 12s. 6d.: April 30: By Colonial Government, £10 12s. 6d. It will thus be seen that the item was transferred in the ledger at the end of April to an account against the Colonial Government, and it now figures as the seventh item in Annexure A to the declaration; but the windows and frames really were supplied on February 8, and conveyed to Scuitdrift on that date. Macdonald was unequivocally and duly debited with them, and it was not until the month of April that the Government was charged in the books with them. I think that the plaintiff's books corroborate Captain White's evidence that there was no sale to the Government, and I may remark that if the plaintiff's evidence had been accepted on this point, the greater portion of his claim upon the alleged guarantee must have failed in the form in which it was presented. I am, however, of opinion that the form of action was correct, in spite of the ultimate appearance of the ledger, in that, if the plaintiff had any cause of action against the Government at all, a point which I shall presently discuss, it was upon a guarantee by them, and not upon a sale to them. It is true that when the bulk of the materials arrived from Port Elizabeth, and when they were delivered on the police wagons for conveyance to the outposts, they were entered as in account with the Colonial Government. But that took place upon April 6, and it is quite conceivable and very probable that the plaintiff at that date had come to the conclusion that he had better contract with Captain White on the spot than with Macdonald, who was then 150 miles away. But if he came to that conclusion, and shaped his books to suit that view, he certainly did not consult Captain White on the matter, nor anyone who had authority to represent and bind the Government in such a matter. It will be noticed that it was at that date that he transferred the five windows and frames supplied on February 8 from the account of Macdonald to that against the Government. This is shown in the counter-book, though in the ledger the cross-entry was not made apparently until the end of April. Having thus far dealt with Annexures A and B, which are accounts against the Government directly for building materials, I pass to Annexure C, which is an account against Macdonald, and about which plaintiff and Mr. Wright, his late bookkeeper, state that on or about February 8, when Macdonald was about to start for Scuitdrift, he brought round to their place a kind of circular or general order addressed to any shopkeeper in the place, authorising the supply of goods required by Macdonald to the value of £25, and asking anyone who might supply such goods to endorse the transaction on the order. They say that some other shopkeeper had supplied or did supply a few articles on such order, and that they supplied the bulk as shown on annexure C. They also say that they, after endorsing the memorandum on the order, returned it to the police office, but they are not sure who signed the order or to whom it was returned, their impression, however, being that the individual concerned was Captain White. Now, Captain White denies having given such an order—and it is curious that none of the other traders in Kenhardt were called to corroborate the plaintiff as to the existence at that time of such an order. I do not think it improbable in the circumstances that Macdonald, who was going into the country far from any shop or base of supply, should have endeavoured to procure such an order for the purpose of getting supplies, and it is even possible that White or a locum tenens might have conceived that it would be right and proper to help their contractor to obtain such necessities of life: but it is strange that White, who was a very candid witness, knows nothing of such order, that no copy of such a document was kept, and that no reference is made to it in any of plaintiff's books. I have looked through both the counter-book and the ledger, and find that all the articles were supplied to "H. Macdonald, c.o. Captain White," and no mention is made of any order or guarantee. I am, therefore, not entirely satisfied that such an order ever existed, or at least that sufficient evidence as to its existence has been adduced. Assuming, however, to the full the complexion which the plaintiff wishes to place upon the transaction, embraced in Annexure C, and also assuming that Captain White guaranteed on behalf of the Government as alleged in the declaration that payment would be made to the plaintiff for the goods supplied, as shown by Annexures A and B, the question arises whether the Government is in any legal sense bound by such undertakings. Captain White certainly was the ostensible local authority for all police matters: he was in command of the force in that division, and in matters affecting their duties and their discipline there is no doubt that he was held out as the agent of the supreme authority; but it by no means follows that by virtue of his position he was held out as the agent for the Government to enter into building contracts, to purchase building materials, or to give guarantees for payment. The most elementary knowledge of law and the slightest exercise of business principles would have served to show that for such matters he would be obliged to get a particular authority, and if that were so it would be incumbent upon persons dealing with him in connection with such matters to inquire into the scope of his authority. Now, for the purposes of the buildings at Scuitdrift and Poffader, he had been invested with a particular authority, and the defendants are bound by all his acts in the execution of his mandate, but not further. What, then, was his mandate and what were the bounds of his authority? He was authorised clearly enough to enter into a contract with Macdonald to erect the necessary buildings for certain sums specified, and it appears to me that his authority did not extend any further than to do all things necessary for the purpose of effecting that object. It was indeed argued for the plaintiff that there was an implied authority to do all acts towards the accomplishment of the erection of the buildings, that the buildings could not have been erected by Macdonald without materials and the necessities of life, that the materials and such necessities would not have been supplied without a guarantee by the Government, and that therefore White had an implied authority to enter into such guarantees. But it is clear that such contracts by no means flowed out of the contracts which White had been authorised to make, and that his superiors could not have contemplated undertaking the risks which it is said that he undertook on their behalf. Considerable latitude in interpreting instructions and in construing authority would no doubt be allowed, and liberal concessions might be made by the Court in cases where public officers have to carry out orders in remote parts of the country where communication with headquarters was proved to be extremely difficult, if not impossible, and where immediate action was to be decided upon; but such was not the case at Kenhardt. There it was a simple matter to communicate with Kimberley, and to receive express instructions on such a matter of difficulty as arose in the case under consideration. Had the difficulty been reported to Commissioner Elliott at Kimberley he might have communicated with Cape Town and obtained authority to guarantee Macdonald's credit, or he might have elected to take some other course; but no such steps were taken, and the plaintiff chose to supply his materials, according to his own version of the matter, to a public officer, or to accept his guarantee for payments for them, without inquiring into and ascertaining the limits of his authority in the matter.

The rule in dealing with public agents is laid down by Story in his work upon agency in a passage which rests upon decisions of the American Courts, but which appears to me to be sound and applicable to this country, and to be supportable upon the principles of our common law, and upon the practice regulating the appointment of public servants in this country. Public agents here are limited in law by the terms of their mandate, and their powers can be easily ascertained, so that no one need be misled into contracts which such agents are not authorised to enter into on behalf of the Government. Story, section 307 (a), says: "In respect to the acts and declarations and representations of public agents, it would seem that the same rule does not prevail which ordinarily governs in relation to mere private agents. As to the latter, the principals are in many cases bound where they have not authorised the declarations and representations to be made. But in cases of public agents, the Government or other public authority is not bound, unless it manifestly appears that the agent is acting within the scope of his authority, or is held out as having authority to do the act, or is employed in his capacity as a public agent, to make the declaration a representation from the Government. Indeed, this rule seems indispensable in order to guard the public against losses and injuries arising from the fraud or mistake or rashness and indiscretion of their agents. And there is no hardship in requiring from private persons, dealing with public officers, the duty of inquiry, as to their real or apparent power and authority to bind the Government." And this language I adopt as setting forth the law of this country. I am therefore of opinion that, even if Inspector White bought the goods in the name of the Government, or promised that the Government would be surety for Macdonald, the Government are not bound by his undertakings. But, as a matter of fact, I am satisfied that Inspector White promised no more than that he personally would protect the plaintiff when the money was paid into his hands by the Government for the purpose of settling with Macdonald. It should not be lost sight of that at the time he made such promise it must have been contemplated that the whole matter would be finished in a few months, and that White would still be on the spot to settle the accounts. As to what happened in the execution of the contract, it would appear that Macdonald, after spending a couple of months at Scuitdrift, and in that time doing a portion of the work stipulated for at that place, abandoned the contract, and crossed the border into German territory, where, it is said, he was last heard of. He left all the unused material in situ, both at Scuitdrift and at Poffadder, and eventually the Government authorised the expenditure of whatever balance might be over, after allowing for the work done by Macdonald, in the completion by the police themselves of the buildings at Scuitdrift—the Poffadder post being apparently left to its fate. The inspector at Kenhardt — no longer Captain White, who had been transferred to another post — thereupon, in 1905, set Lance-Corporal Milling, a member of his force, about completing the buildings, informing him that there was a balance of £55 available for the purpose. Accordingly, Milling proceeded with the construction of the buildings at Scuitdrift, using for that purpose the material supplied by the plaintiff for that contract, but apparently did not complete them until January, 1907, the delay being probably due to interruptions, the nature of which was not explained in evidence. I regret that the parties have not been able to settle this matter without the expensive process of a law-suit, for it seems to me that when correspondence began it would have been possible by means of a little willingness to inquire into the truth to come to an amicable settlement. The correspondence, however, was protracted, and there was no display of willingness on the part of the various departments of the Government which it became necessary to address to unravel the difficulty or to do more than pass the plaintiff on from one department to another. The complication was not of the plaintiff's making, but was due mainly to the fact that the Kimberley office had been abolished, and all the papers transferred to Cape Town, and that confusion and loss of documents was alleged as a consequence. Still, even so, a little sympathy with the plaintiff on the part of any department might have elicited the facts, and led to a settlement without expense. At the end of nearly three years of correspondence about the matter, the plaintiff was informed that there was a sum of £69 14s. due to Macdonald, and that such sum would be paid over to him if he could produce the authorisation of Macdonald, or an order of Court to that effect. And this offer was made conditionally on plaintiff's withdrawing his action and paying the costs of the Government. This offer was made at the end of June, in the present year, when considerable costs had already been incurred, and it was not accepted by the plaintiff. As far as I can see, there should be a larger sum due to Macdonald than the sum mentioned, since it has apparently cost the defendants no more than £55 to complete the contract, which was for £140. There should then be a balance of £85; but it is possible that the defendants may be able to show that deductions from this amount can be fairly made in settling the matters of the Scuitdrift contract. I think that it is right and equitable that whatever sums of Macdonald's defendant has in hand should be paid in satisfaction of plaintiff's claim, and as an order of Court seems to be all that is necessary as far as the present parties are concerned to effect such payment, I think that such order should be made. With regard, however, to this action brought by the plaintiff, it must fail, and there must be judgment for the defendant. Unsatisfactory as I think the conduct of the matter was on behalf of the various departments, through whose offices the correspondence passed, I do not think that such conduct excuses the plaintiff in bringing an untenable claim, and he must therefore pay the costs of suit. There will, however, be an order that the defendant be authorised to pay over to the plaintiff the sum of £69 14s., or such larger amount as an examination of the accounts of the Scuitdrift contract show to be due to Macdonald on a quantum meruit, or upon a deduction of such sum as it has cost the defendant to complete the contract from the contract price of £140.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SYRKIN V. HIGHMAN. { 1907.
Aug. 9th.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

DESVAGES V. AYERS.

Mr. D. M. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,000, with interest from the 1st January, 1907, bond due by reason of non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable, and the rents hereafter accruing to be attached.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

PIENAAR AND CO. V. ROSE.

Mr. De Waal moved for judgment under Rule 319 for £82 10s. 7d., with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Order granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte COX.

Mr. Sutton moved for certain rule nisi to be made absolute admitting petitioner to sue her husband in forma pauperis for a judicial separation.

Respondent appeared, and said he objected to the charge of cruelty. He, however, had no objection to raise to the present application.

Rule absolute. Mr. Sutton appointed counsel, and Messrs. Findlay and Tait attorneys to the petitioner.

Ex parte ESTATE GRUNDLING.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved, on behalf of John Cairncross, executor in the estate of the late Hendrik Grundling, of Oudtshoorn, for an order calling on all persons concerned to show cause why the Registrar of Deeds should not be authorised to pass transfer of 1-16 share in the farms Slang River and Surrounding Slang River, in the division of Oudtshoorn, from one George Dunn to the estate of the late Hendrik Grundling. The farm had been purchased by Grundling, but transfer had not been given. A bond for £50 given by Dunn in favour of one Ernest de Marillac on October 14, 1865, was still registered in the debt registry against the farm. Petitioner believed that the bond had been paid. De Marillac's estate had been sequestrated in 1866, and the final account had been filed and confirmed. No record could be found of the bond in the papers of the insolvent estate. One of the trustees was dead, and the other resident in Hamburg. Counsel also moved for leave to sell a portion of the farm Surrounding Slang River, which had been left subject to the condition that no heir was to have the right to sell till the second generation.

On the second part of the application counsel referred to the case of Lind and Others v. Calitz and Others (9 Juta, 268), where the meaning of the clause had been considered.

Buchanan, J., said that with regard to the second part of the application the executor did not require the authority of the Court to sell. With regard to the first part a rule nisi was granted calling on Lippert (trustee in de Marillac's estate) and others to show cause on 12th November why the application should not be granted. Personal service to be effected on Lippert and one publication of the rule to be effected in the Mossel Bay "Advertiser."

Ex parte DU TOIT.

Mr. Gutsche moved for the appointment of a curator bonis to represent Godlieb Petrus du Toit, a deaf mute (brother of the petitioner), in connection with the realisation of certain estate. Counsel quoted Mostert's Case (4 C.T.R., 399).

Rule nisi granted calling upon respondent or any other person concerned to show cause why applicant should not be appointed curator bonis of the respondent, rule to be explained by some person other than the petitioner to the respondent, and to be served on respondent's parents, if either is alive, or, if not, on the brothers of respondent, rule returnable on the 12th September, costs to come out of the property.

Ex parte NORTJE.

Mr. Gutsche moved, on behalf of the petitioner, as surviving spouse under a certain mutual will, for an order authorising the sub-division of certain property in the division of Oudtshoorn, and authorising the sub-divisional transfers to be passed. The Master recommended that the petition be confirmed, that the amount received (£225) to be paid in reduction of the mortgage bond, and that proof be exhibited to him that the amount had been so applied.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

Buchanan, J.: Before the order is taken out, a sworn translation of the will, which is in Dutch, must be furnished. A translation is annexed to the petition, but it is not sworn.

Ex parte DENHAM.

Mr. Sutton moved, as a matter of urgency, for the appointment of petitioner's brother, B. P. Denham, as curator ad litem to assist her in a certain action which she proposes to institute, and for the personal attachment of one Lieutenant Cooper, R.N., second officer of S.S. Tintagel Castle. Petitioner said that she was 20 years of age, and resided in Cape Town. Both her parents were dead. In November last, while the Tintagel Castle was lying in the Table Bay Docks, the respondent Cooper seduced her under promise of marriage, and she now intended to institute an action against him for £500 damages. Respondent had been seen by deponent's brother, and had stated that he was engaged to another lady. Respondent was resident at Southampton, England, but would be shortly touching at these shores with his boat, which left Durban on the 8th inst. for Cape Town. He had expressed his intention of going to Canada. She prayed for an order appointing her brother as curator ad litem to assist her in the action, and for an order authorising the arrest of respondent on the arrival of the steamer at Cape Town, in order to found jurisdiction in this Court against him, such arrest to continue until the said Cooper shall have given security in such sum as the Court may think fit for the purpose of satisfying petitioner's claim. From correspondence annexed it appeared that a letter had been addressed to respondent at Durban, offering, in order to keep the case out of Court, to accept £100 in satisfaction of any claim petitioner may have against him. The offer was made without prejudice. To this letter no reply had been received.

Buchanan, J., said that he would be prepared to appoint Mr. Denham as curator ad litem, but, as to the other part of the application, petitioner had got her remedy under the 8th rule of Court.

Mr. Sutton: We cannot proceed for the defendant's arrest under rule 8, because he is not domiciled here.

[Buchanan, J.: You find him in the country, and you arrest him.]

Mr. Sutton: We cannot arrest him under the 8th rule, because he is not domiciled.

[Buchanan, J.: You have to find him in the country first. That is not a question of domicile.]

Mr. Sutton quoted Van Zyl's Judicial Practice (p. 136), and cited Schunke v. Taylor and Symonds (8 Juta, 103), and Solomon v. Wolf (8 C.T.R., 184).

Buchanan, J.: Schunke's case does not apply to this case. He was plaintiff, and was called upon to give security.

Order granted appointing Mr. B. P. Denham as curator ad litem to assist applicant in the action intended to be instituted by her against Cooper, and leave of Court granted to arrest respondent ad fundandam jurisdictionem, writ not to be executed, or if executed, to be discharged on the defendant giving security in the sum of £150.

KELLY V. R.M., WOODSTOCK. { 1907.
Aug. 12th.

Agent in Magistrate's Court—Attorney.

In an application to be admitted as an enrolled agent in the Woodstock Resident Magistrate's Court, it appeared that there were more than two attorneys of the Supreme Court habitually practising in the Woodstock Court.

Held, that although such attorneys had no offices in Woodstock, there was such a close proximity of their offices in Cape Town to the Woodstock Court as to justify the Magistrate in holding that they were in practice in the Woodstock Court.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Maasdorp, sitting as a Divisional Court of the Supreme Court, in an application brought by the present appellant against the Resident Magistrate of Woodstock, on notice to show cause why applicant should not be admitted and enrolled as an agent of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Woodstock, under section 36 of Act 20, 1856, as amended by Act 43, 1885.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Rowson), was for appellant; Mr. Close was for respondent.

Mr. Schreiner said that the point raised in this case was whether an attorney, who in one magisterial district had his offices, could for the purposes of Act 43, 1885, be said to be practising in an adjoining district because he frequently appeared in that court, and because his offices were situate in close contiguity to the district. Could a person be said to be in practice in the Resident Magistrate's Court of Woodstock when anyone desiring to consult him had to go out of the district into Cape Town? "In practice," he submitted, meant in practice within the jurisdiction. Counsel quoted section 36, Resident Magistrate's Court Act, No.

20, 1856, and cited Johnson v. R.M., Woodstock (16 C.T.R., 776). Attorneys residing in Cape Town could not be said to be easily accessible and readily available to clients in Woodstock. It was of the essence of practice that the attorney should reside within the jurisdiction. It was not a question of degree or of mere propinquity of one district to another, but a question of the boundaries of jurisdiction.

Mr. Close submitted that all that Johnson's case decided was that if an attorney had an office in the district it was decisive on the question of practice, and if he had not got an office he had to satisfy the Court in some other way that he was in practice.

[Hopley, J.: These two places are contiguous. Where do you draw the line?]

Mr. Close: I would not like to suggest to the Court that a line should be drawn anywhere. Each case would have to be decided on its own merits. Counsel went on to say that Woodstock was practically part of Cape Town, and had been until quite recently strictly and technically a part of the Cape Town district. An attorney in Cape Town was just as available and accessible to a client in Woodstock as he was before. By tram and train, telephone and telegraph, the communication between the two districts was as close and perfect as could well be conceived. Counsel cited Van Wyk v. Resident Magistrate, Willowmore (13 S.C., 216).

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, said that in Van Wyk's case the Court looked to the actual local limits of the jurisdiction.

Hopley, J.: You seem to argue that a man cannot be in practice in the district unless he have a professional residence there?

Mr. Schreiner: That is so; he must be at hand to be consulted. Counsel went on to argue that his learned friend might just as well say that Wynberg was formerly part of the Cape Town district, as that Woodstock was until recently part of the Cape Town district.

De Villiers, C.J.: I quite agree with the learned judge in the Court below that the question whether or not there are two or more attorneys in practice in Woodstock is a question of fact, and it is impossible for the Court to lay down any rule which would apply to every case. Every case must be decided on its merits. It was said by Mr. Schreiner that if this application of his client were refused, it might be held that attorneys could occasionally go from Cape Town to Paarl, and by occasionally practising there, might prevent agents from being admitted. There is a vast difference, however, between such a case and the present. Here we have the case of Woodstock, which, as we know, is in close proximity to Cape Town, and it appears also from the statements of counsel, which are not contradicted, that not long ago Woodstock formed part of the magistracy of Cape Town, and at that time, at all events, the attorneys practising in Cape Town, who were in the habit of practising in Woodstock, would come under the designation of practising in Woodstock, that is, in the Assistant Magistrate's Court. Well, then, Woodstock was cut off from the magistracy of Cape Town, and I should certainly consider that an attorney who had up to that time been practising in the Assistant Magistrate's Court could fairly be considered as practising in the newly-established Magistrate's Court of Woodstock. Reference was made to the case of Johnson, which was decided by myself. In that case the counsel on both sides fixed their attention to the one point, whether the attorneys there mentioned had offices in Woodstock, and, it having been proved that they had offices, the Court decided that that was conclusive. It does not follow that in the opinion of the Court it was necessary that there should be offices. That point was still left undecided, and that is the question which has now been raised. It would not be a long walk from Woodstock to Cape Town to see an attorney, or the telephone or telegraph might be used, and the attorney would be at Woodstock within half an hour. Therefore, I can quite understand the decision of the Magistrate, as well as the decision of the learned judge, that there was such a close proximity as to dispense with the supposed requirement that the attorneys should actually have their offices in Woodstock, if they have offices in Cape Town. On the whole, I think the decision should not be disturbed, and the appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

Buchanan and Hopley, J.J., concurred.

Respondent's Attorney: A. J. McCallum.

BAVUMA V. MORUM BROS. { 1907.
Ang. 12th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate Matatiele, in which the present respondents were plaintiffs and the appellant was defendant. The summons called upon defendant to pay to plaintiffs the sum of £90 18s. 2d., being the balance of a certain account rendered for goods sold and delivered.

Mr. Seymour, who was for defendants in the Court below, took exception to the account on the ground that it was vague and embarrassing. Bavuma, the defendant, was described as a native peasant. He had a kreal near Isigogo, and a sufficient smattering of learning to enable him to read and write in Kafir, and to sign his name. Defendant objected to the account rendered by plaintiffs, as it had no dates, and no particulars so that he could identify the items. The Magistrate overruled the objections. Bavuma denied that he owed £50 for a wagon and £2 5s. cash. He admitted the rest of the account, with the exception of an item of £19. At a subsequent hearing a plea denying the whole of the account was put in. The item of £19 was the only entry that appeared in the books of Morum Bros., excepting a spasmodic entry in the cash-book, which was never carried forward to the ledger. Busse, the manager, admitted that no item was shown in the ledger with regard to the price of the wagon. Appellant complained that the Magistrate's reasons for his judgment were unsatisfactory. He found that the claim leaving a credit balance of £19 was correct, and therefore that the marriage goods, cart, etc., were supplied, a matter of £15 15s. 9d., which defendant claimed be deleted because he treated it as a private matter of the manager Busse. Morum Bros. stated that the oxen belonging to Bavuma were simply held as pledge for the payment of the balance due on the sale of the wagon, but the Magistrate's finding was distinctly against plaintiffs' statement upon this point. The Magistrate found that the present appellant was clearly entitled to receive back his oxen. These he allowed at £9 each, and £5 damages. The Magistrate believed that the cattle were obtained after a certain amount of misrepresentation, and that once obtained they were held by the firm without Bavuma's consent.

Mr. P. Jones was for appellant and Mr. Upington for respondents, who were also cross-defendants. Mr. Jones contended that obviously no judgment could be given for bona fide security, and no damages either. The Resident Magistrate stated that both parties obtained a substantial judgment, and therefore made no order as to costs.

Mr. Upington said although the item of the wagon did not appear in the books, still the purchase was not disputed, and when the defendant Bavuma said he had paid £30 of the amount, then the onus of proving this payment lay with the defendant. He did not see why the Magistrate's judgment should be overruled, simply because the books of the firm were badly kept. With regard to the matter of £15 15s., he submitted that there was evidence to support the Magistrate's finding. All the evidence went to show that despite the fact that certain of the items did not appear in the books, the defendant Bavuma received them, and no serious attempt was made to dispute their purchase. Counsel held also that the oxen were purely held as a pledge for the settlement of Bavuma's debt.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiffs, Morum Bros., sued the defendant in the Magistrate's Court of Matatiele, in the Transkei, for the sum of £90 18s. 2d. This amount is made up in round figures as follows: balance of account goods sold and delivered £40, and balance remaining unpaid of £50 on a wagon bought by the defendant, £80.

The defendant, on the other hand, filed a counter-claim for £217 6s., made up of a number of credits amounting to over £50, balance on an exchange of stock £15 15s. 9d., a further claim of £30 arising out of sundry credits, and a claim of £120 for the wrongful taking of cattle—being the value of 10 oxen at £10 each and £20 damages for their retention by the plaintiff.

When it came to an investigation of the account before the Magistrate, it was found that plaintiff's books—not kept by them, but by their manager—were in a most unsatisfactory state, and did not show many of the items charged by the plaintiffs in this case, and further investigation showed also that the £50 10s., being the first six items claimed in reconvention, had been taken into account by their manager, Busse, from which had been deducted certain counter-claims for goods sold and cash lent, leaving a balance of £19 for which credit had been given upon the account. Of the amounts deducted from the £50 two items, one of £14 5s. 6d. for what is called marriage goods and £9 for cash lent, do not appear at all in Morum Bros.' books. The defendant admitted having purchased the marriage goods, but said that he had paid cash for them, and had also repaid the amount which had been lent to him. He produced no receipt, and the Magistrate, after going into the evidence, has decided against the defendant upon that point.

Consequently, with the exception of a small error deducted by the plaintiffs of £2 6s., judgment for the balance of the account for goods sold and delivered was given in favour of the plaintiffs. As to the £50 said to be due as balance of the purchase price of the wagon, there is no entry whatever in the books of Morum Bros. as against the defendant, and, but for the defendant's own admission, the probability is that Morum Bros. would never have known about the claim and never would have made it against the defendant. The defendant showed that he had given certain heifers which the manager, Busse, had taken over at £50 on account of this wagon, which was bought originally for £80, and the defendant says he paid the additional £30 in cash. He, however, was unable to produce any receipt showing the payment, and, in the absence of any entry on the other side, the Magistrate has given this item also against the defendant. The defendant's claim for £50 as the balance due upon the wagon was based on their allowing for the cattle taken over only £30. The Magistrate found that these cattle were taken over at £50, consequently the £50 balance was reduced to £30, leaving the total due plaintiffs on their account after these deductions were made, £68 12s. 2d., for which he has given judgment in convention.

On the claim in reconvention the Magistrate has found, as before stated, the first six items as against the defendant on the ground that they were included in the plaintiffs' account. On the second item of £15 15s. 9d. he found that this item arose out of a private transaction between the defendant and the plaintiffs' manager, Busse. Similar trading with stock had been done by the defendant, which Busse admitted were transactions on behalf of his principals. Morum Bros. said that their manager had no right to trade upon his own account, but in spite of this Busse says it was a private transaction. This allegation of Busse's, that this was a private transaction, rests upon his own bare statement. It is denied by the defendant, and he has also produced two corroborative witnesses to say that when he claimed a settlement of this £15 admittedly due to him, Busse said he would place it to the credit of defendant's account with Morum Bros. All defendant's transactions were with Busse, and he thought they were all on the same footing.

Under these circumstances I think, even if he had been carrying on this transaction on his own account, that it does not lie in the mouth of Morum Bros. to say that they would select this one transaction from a number of others and eliminate it from their account. The Magistrate has found that Busse's statement was correct, and consequently did not give judgment against Morum Bros. But I do not think that the Magistrate has considered the fact that there was nothing to show that this transaction was, to the knowledge of the defendant, to be separated from the other transactions, and therefore Morum Bros. should be answerable for this transaction just as they are answerable for the other transactions between the defendant and Busse.

I therefore think that the £15 15s. 9d. ought to be included in the claim in reconvention.

With regard to the £30 16s. claimed in reconvention, I do not see anything which would cause me to upset the judgment of the Magistrate.

There only remains the matter of the £100 for the price of the ten oxen and £20 for damages. With regard to that the Magistrate has given judgment for the return of the oxen or for £90, their value, and £5 as damages. It appears from the evidence that the oxen belonged to the defendant, and in his absence Busse, when managing Morum Bros.' business, sent to the defendant's kraal and got the oxen from the defendant's brother without defendant's knowledge or consent, and he kept these oxen as security for the debt to Morum Bros. There was a subsequent transaction about a horse, and Busse afterwards got two more oxen as security for the horse from the defendant's brother. The horse was returned, and the oxen ought to have been restored, but they never were. The ten oxen were handed over by Busse to his principals as their property, and were branded "M.B.," the plaintiff's mark. They were used for the work of Morum Bros., and were hired out by them and included in their stock. It is doubtful if there was any valid pledge of the oxen, and the defendant is entitled to have them returned. The Magistrate in his judgment has made a moderate estimate of their value—£9 each—and these oxen admittedly belonged to the defendant.

As to the Magistrate's finding of £5 for the defendant on the claim of damages, I consider it was thoroughly justified by the fact that Morum Bros. kept these oxen, which they had no right to, worked them and hired them out, and used them just as if they belonged to themselves. I think the damages were very moderate.

The Magistrate, whilst giving judgment for the plaintiff in convention for £68 12s. 2d., has given judgment for the plaintiff in reconvention for £113 18s., but has made no order as to costs, and this is one of the points of appeal. This question of costs is in the Magistrate's discretion, but he must exercise it in a judicial manner. The disputes between the two parties were upon a claim in convention and a claim in reconvention. Each set up claims against the other, and both succeeded very materially on parts of their claims and failed upon other portions of their claims. As the Magistrate was not satisfied with the manner in which the parties gave their evidence, he decided that, instead of giving the plaintiff in convention costs in convention, and the plaintiff in reconvention costs in reconvention, he would make no order as to costs. This is not an unusual judgment, and this Court is not prepared to interfere with that judgment.

With regard to the allowance of the item of £15 15s. 9d., we think that the Magistrate has erred, and the appeal must be allowed in so far as that item is concerned, as this Court is of opinion that the amount was clearly due to the defendant to be credited against the balance of his account. The amount of £15 15s. 9d. will be added to the amount for which judgment was given upon the claim in reconvention, and the appeal in that particular will be allowed with costs; in other respects the judgment of the Magistrate will stand.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

IZAAKS V. NIEUWSTADT) 1907.
AND CO. (Aug. 12th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of the Paarl, in which the present appellant was defendant, and the respondents were plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claimed the sum of £1 14s. 6d. from the defendant. The judgment of the Court was for the plaintiffs. The summons called upon the defendant to appear before the Court of the Resident Magistrate of the district to show cause why he had not paid to the plaintiffs, Retief and Nieuwstadt, trading as Nieuwstadt and Co., £1 14s. 6d., which they said he owed on a balance of account for goods sold and delivered to the defendant during the period June, 1903, to December, 1905. The defendant excepted to the summons on the ground that any dealing he had was with the firm W. A. Krige and Co., and not with the plaintiff firm. In June, 1903, and for a considerable time afterwards, there was no firm of Nieuwstadt and Co. in existence. The firm of W. A. Krige and Co. was taken over by the partners Retief and Nieuwstadt, and due notice was given of such transfer, and Nieuwstadt and Co. took over all the liabilities and assets of the firm. The bills were headed "Nieuwstadt and Co., late Krige and Co." Subsequently an amendment of the summons was applied for, and allowed, by adding the words, "taking over the business carried on by W. A. Krige and Co." A special agreement was pleaded as having been entered into between W. A. Krige, one of the partners of the firm, and the defendant, at the time when the goods were bought, that the amount had to be liquidated by the defendants making boots for W. A. Krige. The only evidence in the case was that of W. A. Krige, who was a partner in the firm of W. A. Krige and Co. The plaintiffs took over the business from his firm, and when it was handed over, there was an amount of £1 14s. 6d. due to the firm. When he gave the defendant credit, he agreed he should make boots for him, and so square off the amount.

These boots were not made for the partnership account, but for his own account. The plaintiffs took over the account of £1 14s. 6d., and gave witness consideration for it. The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said it was contended for the defendant that he was not liable to Nieuwstadt and Co., but that he had a special arrangement by which the debt was to be liquidated by his making boots for W. A. Krige. In this case plaintiffs sued the defendant for £1 14s. 6d., balance and account for goods sold and delivered. In 1906 the partnership was dissolved, the two plaintiffs taking over the business, and the name was changed to F. W. Nieuwstadt and Co. Plaintiffs gave due notice of this, and also stated they were taking over the debts of the firm. During the time that the firm was carried on under the style of W. A. Krige and Co., the defendant purchased certain articles from the firm, and an agreement was entered into between him and W. A. Krige by which the defendant was to liquidate his debt by making boots for Krige for his own personal use. This was done. In 1906 Krige paid to the firm on behalf of the defendant £4 7s. in reduction of his account, leaving a balance of £1 14s. 6d., and this item was one of the amounts handed over to the plaintiff firm for which he received consideration. There was nothing to show that the plaintiffs, while partners in the firm, knew anything of this private arrangement between Krige and the defendant, and it was quite clear that the plaintiffs took over the amount owing by the defendant in all good faith. He found that the arrangement between Krige and the defendant was purely a private one, and the plaintiffs were not bound by this arrangement.

Mr. Upington was for the appellant (defendant), and there was no appearance for the respondents.

Mr. Upington said the defence in the case was really one of payment, and it was perfectly clear from Krige's own evidence that at the time the indebtedness was incurred there was an arrangement between the defendant and himself, as a partner of the firm, that this debt should be liquidated in a particular way. He submitted that Mr. Krige, as a partner of the firm of Krige and Co., had full authority to enter into such an arrangement with the debtor of the partnership. If that arrangement was entered into, and the debt had in fact been liquidated—there was no dispute on that point—in the manner in which it was arranged it should be liquidated, then the plaintiffs, who were at the time partners in the firm of Krige and Co., could not now, having changed the style of their firm to that of Nieuwstadt and Co., claim from defendant that he should pay over again to them this amount of £1 14s. 6d. It would be a most inequitable thing that a partner of a firm should be enabled to persuade a man to purchase goods on the understanding that he should be allowed to liquidate the indebtedness in a particular way, and afterwards the partnership should repudiate any liability. He must be allowed to pay in boots. They never demanded any particular boots of him.

Maasdorp, J.: The evidence upon which the Magistrate came to a decision in this case was very simple in its character, and it appears from that evidence that Mr. Krige, one of the partners of the firm of Krige and Co., sold certain goods to the defendant, and at the time the goods were sold he agreed that he would accept from the defendant boots to be made by the defendant, and that the price of the boots should go off against the price of the goods which had been bought by the defendant. It has been argued that a contract of this nature was quite within the power of a member of the partnership. Now, I have grave doubts upon that part of the case. I do not think that it is within the power of any single partner to agree that he should accept a personal benefit in consideration for a debt due to the firm. It is quite possible, as has been argued by Mr. Upington, that any single member of the firm having power to accept payment of moneys might agree with a debtor that that money should be paid to someone else, and that credit should be given to him. It is quite within the power of a partner to make an arrangement of that kind, which is within the ordinary course of business, a debtor being prepared to pay his account, and paying the money to a certain person at the request of one of the partners. But that this actually settles with the firm the transaction, does not seem to me to be within the ordinary course of business. No partner has authority to arrange that certain articles should be handed over to him privately and personally, and that that should be regarded as settlement of the debt due to the partnership. The debtor must settle with the partnership or with its duly authorised agent. But I think this case ought rather to go off on another point. Taking it that Krige had the power to agree that for the moneys due by the defendant he should accept boots in payment from time to time, then, I think, this result still remains, that if at any time the debt has been reduced by the delivery of some boots and a balance remains due, the partnership is not bound to indefinitely give credit to the bootmaker, but may demand the payment of the balance which still remains due, after the debt has been reduced by the delivery of some of the articles. Now, it seems that after a certain time, some boots were delivered to Mr. Krige, and their value paid by him to the partnership. A balance of £1 14s. 6d. remained due. I think that the partnership is entitled to claim that the £1 14s. 6d. shall now be paid, and it is only when this is paid that the whole of the defendant's debt will be liquidated. There was another question raised as to the right of the new firm of Nieuwstadt and Co., which had taken over Krige's debts, making a claim against the defendant for this amount. Now, I quite agree with Mr. Upington that Nieuwstadt and Co. must now be taken to stand exactly in the same position as Krige and Co., and no position can be taken up by Nieuwstadt and Co. which could not have been taken up by Krige and Co. I think Krige and Co. would have been entitled to sue for the balance after accepting the agreement made by Krige personally, and giving credit for the articles that had been supplied to Krige. I think the judgment of the Magistrate ought to stand, and the appeal will be dismissed.

ESTATE SCHOLTZ V. ESTATE { 1907.
SCHOLTZ AND SCHOLTZ. { Aug. 13th.
" 24th.

Will (mutual) — Massing — Adiation — Vesting — Fidei-commissum.

The late S. D. J. S. and his wife (married in community) executed a mutual will, bequeathing their farm Ka. to their son P. E. S. for a certain sum. The survivor and all their children per stirpes were instituted heirs to the rest of the estate. Half the proceeds of the said residue were to go on the death of the first dying, in equal shares, to the survivor and to the children (including grandchildren) of the marriage per stirpes. The survivor was to have the life usufruct of the other half of the joint estate and also of the farm M., which, on his (or her) death, was to be sold and the proceeds to be distributed among the children per stirpes, who were similarly to inherit the survivor's share of the residue of the joint estate on his (or her) death. The survivor was also to have the life usufruct of the farms Kl. and T. F. On the death of the survivor, these farms were to go to the heirs per stirpes, subject to fidei-commissum, in favour of their descendants. The testator predeceased his wife, who adiated, and after his death made a separate will, instituting her children and their descendants as her universal heirs. The testators had 12 children, 3 of whom predeceased both their parents, leaving issue. One child, G. S., survived his father, but predeceased his mother. Plaintiff was the widow of G. S., and now sued in her capacity as executrix of his estate. The defendants were the executors of both the joint estate and also of that of the testatrix. The plaintiff objected to three of the distribution accounts filed by the defendants and marked "I," "J" and "K" respectively. In "I" the executors awarded $\frac{1}{2}$ of the proceeds of the farm M. to each of the 12 children (or their descendants per stirpes) of the testators and $\frac{1}{2}$ of the share of G. S. was awarded to his estate and the other half to his children. In "J" they awarded $\frac{1}{2}$ of the proceeds of the farm T. R. to G. S.'s children, and in K. they dealt in the same way with the share of G. S. under his mother's will. The plaintiff contended that an entire $\frac{1}{2}$ th should have been awarded to the estate of G. S. in each of these distribution accounts.

Held, that as the rights of the heirs under the mutual will vested on the death of the first dying, plaintiff's contention must be upheld as regards account "I."

Held further, that as G. S. never had more than a bare spes successionis to the farm T. F., all his fiduciary rights therein had, on his death rested in his children, and that defendants' contention as to account "J" must be upheld.

Held further, that as the separate will of the survivor disposed only of property which had come to her out of the joint estate, and as she had adiated under the joint will, the provisions of that will must govern the distribution of her estate, and that the account "K" must be amended in accordance with plaintiff's contention. Costs to come out of the estate. Strydom v. Strydom (11, S.C.R., 425) followed,

This was an argument on a case stated.

The special case was set out as follows:

1. The plaintiff is Cecilia Johanna Scholtz, in her capacity as executrix testamentary of the estate of her late husband Gert Daniel Jacobus Scholtz, who was a son of the late Gert Daniel Jacobus Scholtz and his subsequently deceased spouse Gezina Susanna Scholtz (born De Beer), hereinafter called the testators.

2. The defendants are Hendrik Lode-wyk Aucamp and Joachim Jacobus Scholtz, (1) in their capacity as executors testamentary of the joint estate of the testators, and (2) in their capacity as executors testamentary in the estate of the late Gezina Susanna Scholtz (born De Beer), the testatrix.

3. The testators, who were married in community of property, executed their joint last will on June 1, 1895, and thereafter they executed certain codicils to the said will on November 30, 1897, January 14, 1898, September 2, 1898, and November 12, 1898, respectively.

4. The testator died on June 1, 1902; thereafter the testatrix adiated under the said will and codicils and accepted the benefits thereby conferred, and died on the 22nd December, 1904; but prior to the last-named date, to wit, on February 19, 1904, she executed a will, and thereafter, in April, 1904, she executed a codicil thereto. She died without having revoked or altered the same.

5. The plaintiff's husband, Gert Daniel Jacobus Scholtz, who was married in community of property to the plaintiff, died on August 14, 1904, leaving his widow and children him surviving, and leaving a joint will executed with the plaintiff, and whereunder she was appointed executrix.

6. At the date of the death of the testator, there were nine children (including plaintiff's husband) born of the marriage of himself and testatrix, him surviving; and three children of the said marriage had predeceased him.

7. Under the aforesaid will the testators, after bequeathing to their son, P. E. Scholtz, as a prælegacy their farm Kareeboschfontein, declared to appoint the survivor and all their children per stirpes (staakgewyze) as their sole and universal heirs of all property movable and immovable, without exception (save the said bequeathed farm), the survivor to have and to enjoy as his or her exclusive property the one-half of their joint estate, the other half to devolve upon and belong to their said children in equal shares.

8. They further directed that at the death of the first-dying the whole joint estate, except the farm Mauritsfontein, should be sold, and the proceeds divided in manner stated above (in the last preceding paragraph), namely the children one-half and the survivor one-half, and with regard to the said farm, directed that the survivor should enjoy during his or her life the full, free, and undisturbed right and usufruct therein, and that after the survivor's death the said farm also should be sold and the proceeds distributed among their said children in equal shares per stirpes; and they reserved to themselves the right to alter the said will by separate instrument or otherwise.

9. Thereafter, by codicil "B," the testators directed that by the word "children" which appears in the institution of heirs in the said will must be understood also the children of such of their children who are already deceased or may still die, these stepping into their parents' place by representation.

10. By the said codicil they further directed that after the death of the survivor the share accruing to him or her under the will shall devolve upon and belong to the heirs appointed in their said will per stirpes and in equal shares, on the express understanding, however, that the survivor shall have and enjoy his or her full and undisturbed life interest and usufruct not only in and over the said share, but also in and over the hereinafter bequeathed landed properties (in the next succeeding paragraph hereof referred to).

11. By the said codicil they further declare to bequeath as a pralegacy their farms Klipfontein and Twee Rivieren to all their heirs per stirpes and in equal shares on certain conditions.

12. Thereafter, by codicil "C," they repeated the provisions set forth in paragraphs 9 and 10 hereof in similar terms and made other conditions, instead of those contained in "B," with regard to the bequest of the said farms Klipfontein and Twee Rivieren.

13. Thereafter, by codicil "D," they revoked section (b) of clause 3 in the last-mentioned codicil, and in lieu thereof provided as follows: "The said heirs shall not have the right to sell to strangers the herein bequeathed farms or any portion thereof, the children, grandchildren, and descendants of each stirps to be alone entitled to sell between and among themselves, but not the one stirps to the other, so that the 12 stirpes shall continue to possess in 12 equal shares per stirpes, it being the wish of the testators that the same shall remain under their descendants until after the fourth generation, and with that object the same shall from time to time devolve upon and belong to the descendants or successors of their said heirs equally and per stirpes, and on failure at any time of descendants of any stirps or stirpes, then the share or shares of such stirps or stirpes shall devolve equally on the remaining stirpes;" and anything contrary to the provisions of this codicil in the will or previous codicils was revoked and annulled.

14. Thereafter, by codicil "E," they altered the provisions of "D" in such manner that their son-in-law, A. J. Combrink should have the right to sell and cede to their grandsons, G. D. J. Scholtz, J. H. Scholtz, and J. J. Scholtz, children of their son, J. J. Scholtz, the rights and bequests devolving upon him by virtue of the said codicil, the said last-named three children to come in place of their said son-in-law as far as concerns the said rights and bequests, subject to all the directions contained in the said will or codicils.

15. After the testator's death the defendants entered upon the administration of his estate, and in December, 1903, filed their first liquidation and distribution account, according to which there was a balance for distribution of £3,241 15s. 8d.; the moneys thus distributed consisting of cash found in the estate, the proceeds of the sale of movables and of certain outstanding accounts collected. The testatrix was paid one half-share of this sum, and the other heirs (including plaintiff's husband, the said late Gert Daniel Jacobus Scholtz, who received one-twelfth of one-half the other half.

16. On March 6, 1905, after the testatrix's death, the defendants filed their second liquidation and distribution account, showing a balance of £3,519 14s.

3d., and awarded one-half thereof to the testatrix's estate, and one-twelfth of one-half thereof, namely £145 3s. 9d., to the estate of plaintiff's husband; the moneys distributed under this account consisted of amounts received from Government as compensation for war losses, the proceeds of a promissory note, and the sworn appraisement of the farm Twee Rivieren.

17. On September 15, 1906, the defendants filed their third and final count in the testators' joint estate, according to which the balance for distribution was £11,498 14s. 1d. This amount consisted chiefly of the proceeds of the sale of the farm Mauritzfontein. According to this account, they distributed to the estate of the plaintiff's husband £479 2s. 3d., and a like sum to his children jointly. The plaintiff objects to the said distribution, and claims that the sum distributed to the children should also have been awarded to her husband's estate, the whole amount of £958 4s. 6d. to be administered and distributed in terms of the joint will of herself and her husband.

18. The defendants, as executors testamentary of the testatrix's estate under her will "F," have filed two liquidation and distribution accounts, whereunder they have awarded property in the testatrix's possession at her death—being property accruing to her by virtue of the aforesaid joint will and codicils of the testators out of the corpus of the joint estate of the testators, and not being moneys acquired by or accruing to the testatrix from and out of the usufruct of the joint estate—in accordance with the provisions of the testatrix's will "F," and not according to the provisions of the will and codicils of the testators. The plaintiff disputes the correctness of the said accounts, inasmuch as they do not award to her husband's estate one-twelfth share or any share of the amounts which the testatrix was entitled to out of the corpus of the testators' joint estate, and submits that the testatrix could not by separate will deal with any property forming part of the joint estate.

The plaintiff contends: (a) That the defendants should be ordered to amend account "I," filed on September 15, 1906, by awarding to her the sum of £958 4s. 6d., instead of the sum of £479 2s. 3d. (b) That the defendants should be ordered to amend account "J," filed on March 11, 1905, by awarding to plaintiff the one-twelfth share of £1,540, or £128 6s. 8d., which has been awarded in the said account to her children, under the separate will of the testatrix. (c) That defendants should be ordered to amend account "K," filed on July 27, 1905, by awarding to plaintiff the one-twelfth share of £1,203 12s. or £100 6s., which has been awarded in the said account to her children under the said separate will. (d) That the costs should come out of the estates whereof defendants are executors.

The defendants contend: (a) That by the terms of the said joint will and codicils thereto the survivor, the said late Gezina Susanna Scholtz (born De Beer), was instituted fiduciary heir as to one-half of the said joint estate (except the said bequeathed farm), and as to the farms Mauritzfontein, Klipfontein, and Twee Rivieren, forming part of the said estate, she was further instituted usufructuary in respect of the remaining half thereof. (b) That the plaintiff's husband, the said late Gert Daniel Jacobus Scholtz, having predeceased the said survivor, the right in and to one-twelfth of one-half of the proceeds of the said farm Mauritzfontein vested in him, and one-twelfth of the remaining one-half vested in his children upon the death of the said survivor. (c) That by reason of the said predecease, the right to the one-twelfth share claimed by the plaintiff in her contention (c) vested in the children to whom it has been awarded, and not in the plaintiff's husband. (d) That the accounts "I," "J," and "K" are correctly framed according to law, and should not be amended.

Mr. McGregor, K.C. (with him Mr. De Waal), for plaintiffs; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones) for defendants.

Mr. McGregor said that on the authority of Strydom's case (11 Juta, p. 423), if the life interest given to the survivor was a usufruct, the presumption was that the vesting took place at the death of the first dying. If the life interest was a fidei-commissum only, then the life interest was deferred. There really was no separate estate; the whole of the estate was dealt with by the will and codicils. Even if their lordships should hold that there was a fidei-commissum in respect of one-half, then he said, on the authority of Strydom's case, the presumption here was overruled, and the facts here pointed to the intention that there should be a vesting. They changed the provision in the will, and just as he submitted there was a vesting at the death of the testator in respect of Mauritzfontein, so there was a vesting in respect of the whole of the balance. Counsel also cited the cases of Kahl v. De Jager (1 Juta, p. 38), and Nortje v. Nortje (6 Juta, p. 9).

Mr. Upington said his learned friend had lost sight of what really was the main feature that must be regarded in this will, and that was that the survivor was appointed heir with the children. This case was utterly and entirely different from the two cases cited by his learned friend. There was no revocation of the institution of the heirs under the will. His learned friend's contention in regard to the balance of the estate was wholly untenable. Counsel cited the case of Kahl and De Jager (1 Juta, p. 38), Nortje v. Nortje (6 Juta, p. 9), Lucas v. Hool (Buch. 1879, p. 132), and Hiddingh v. De Roubaix (Buch. 1878, p. 86). As regards the farm Mauritzfontein, in one half of it there was Mrs. Scholtz's life interest, coupled with the ownership. She was the owner of one half. In the other half there was the bare life interest alone. With regard to the first half, counsel submitted the rights of the children would only vest upon her death, and the right of the second portion of the farm would vest immediately upon the testator's death. As to the general principle which he submitted should govern the case, the case of Re Zipp (Buch. 1878, p. 132) put what he was contending for very clearly.

Mr. McGregor, in reply, said the law of the case was contained in two cases. The one was In re Zipp and the other Strydom's case. These two cases had to be read together. It was pointed out in the latter that what was laid down as a presumption in Re Zipp was not more than a presumption, and in any case the Court was entitled to draw its own conclusion as to the intention of the testators. In Re Zipp it was admitted that the life interest was only the usufruct, and on that admission by counsel the question was discussed, and it was found that the rights under the will vested at the death of the first dying. In Strydom's case, the Court found that there was vesting at the death of the first dying. Counsel also cited the case of Williams v. Williams (12 S.C.R., 392).

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (August 24).

Buchanan, J.: The late S. D. J. Scholtz and his wife, who had been married in community of property by mutual will, bequeathed their farm Kareeboschfontein to their son, P. E. Scholtz, for a price to be paid after the death of the survivor into the joint estate. They then instituted the survivor and all their children per stirpes as heirs of the whole of their remaining estate. The will directed that the whole of the joint estate except their farm Mauritzfontein should be sold at the death of the first dying, and the proceeds divided one-half to the survivor and one half to the children. The survivor was to have for life the full and free right and usufruct in and of the farm, Mauritzfontein, and after the death of the survivor the farm was to be sold and the proceeds distributed among their children per stirpes. Several codicils were afterwards made under the reservatory clause of the will. To make clear their intention, the testators in the codicil marked B declared that by the word "children" in the will must be understood "the children of such of their children who are already deceased or may still die, these stepping into the place of their parents by representation." They then mutually declared their wish and desire to be that after the death of the survivor the share accruing to him or her should devolve upon their heirs per stirpes, the survivor, however, to have the full and undisturbed life interest and usufruct, not only over the said share, but also in and over the landed properties thereafter bequeathed. In this codicil they then bequeathed and prelegated their farms Klipfontein and Twee Rivieren to all their aforesaid heirs per stirpes, subject to certain conditions of entail extending to the fourth generation. The testator predeceased his wife, who made another will, dealing specially with property not now in question, and nominating generally her children and their descendants by representation her sole and universal heirs. The testators had twelve children, three of whom predeceased both their parents, leaving issue. Their son Gert survived his father, but predeceased his mother, and also left issue. The plaintiff was the widow of the son Gert, and sued in the capacity of executrix testamentary of his estate. The defendants were the executors, both of the joint estate and of the estate of the executrix. The defendants had filed several liquidation and distribution accounts, to three of which plaintiff took objection. In the account marked "I," filed in the joint estate, the executors brought up the proceeds of the sale of the farm Mauritzfontein, of which they awarded one-twelfth, or £958 4s. 7d., to each of the groups of twelve children or their descendants. The share coming to the son Gert they divided, giving one-half thereof, £479 2s. 3d., to Gert's estate, and the other half equally to the children of Gert. The plaintiff claimed that Gert's estate was entitled to the whole of the £958 4s. 7d., and contended that the account should be amended accordingly. The defendants supported their award on the ground that only one-half of the inheritance went to Gert under the joint will, and the other half passed to his children under the will of the survivor, Gert, having predeceased her. Though by the mutual will the survivor was to have one-half of the joint estate, yet the proceeds to be realised by the sale of the farm Mauritzfontein were therein specifically bequeathed to the children. The survivor by her sole will did not in terms interfere with the joint bequest. She adiated under the mutual will, and she enjoyed the life interest in the farm. This case resembles closely that of Strydom v. Strydom (11 S.C. Rep., 425), where it was held that under similar bequests on the death of the first dying, the rights of the children became vested, and that the survivor, as far as the farm was concerned, was only a usufructuary, and not a fiduciary heir to the property. As the son Gert survived his father, his share in the proceeds of the farm became vested in him, and this vested interest was transmissible to his heirs. His death before the death of the survivor did not divest him of his interest. This interest was to the whole of his share, and I fail to see good reason for the action of the executors in awarding his estate only half of the share bequeathed to him. On this part of the special case, therefore, the contention of the plaintiff must be upheld, and the defendants be ordered to amend the account marked "I" accordingly. The next account to which the plaintiff objects is marked "J" and deals with the distribution of the shares in the farm Twee Rivieren. The defendants have awarded one-twelfth share to the children of Gert. The plaintiff contends that the award should have been made to the estate of Gert. This farm was one of the two properties placed under entail. All that was given to the son Gert was a right to the property for his lifetime, after the expiration of the life interest of the survivor therein. At the date of Gert's death he had not yet come into possession of his share in the property, and on his death his children stepped into his place. Gert, during his lifetime, had only a spes successionis, but whether he had come into possession or not, his death would terminate any rights he had in the property. The defendants, therefore, have properly awarded the share in the property to the children of Gert, and this distribution account will not be interfered with. There only remains the objection taken to the account marked "K." This is a liquidation account in the estate of testatrix. The amount coming to each of the twelve sets of heirs is only £100, and the executors have awarded this sum among the children of Gert. The plaintiff contends that this sum should have been awarded to the estate of Gert. The special case admits that the property distributed in this account accrued to the testatrix by virtue of the joint will and codicils, out of the corpus of the joint estate, and was not money acquired by the testatrix from and out of the usufruct of the joint estate. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the provisions of the joint will and codicils must regulate the distribution of these assets. By these testamentary institutions the property is directly vested in the children in case at the death of the first dying, the life interest therein only being reserved to the survivor. The decision in Strydom v. Strydom appears to me to govern plaintiff's contention as to this account, as well as to the first, and this account marked "K" will have to be amended accordingly. As to costs, the plaintiff prays that they should come out of the estates, whereof defendants are executors, and this will be ordered. Judgment accordingly for the plaintiff in terms of her contentions (a) and (c) of the special case, with costs out of the estates.

THIRD DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

DHARSEY V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. } 1907.
Aug. 13th.

Indian—Permit for temporary absence from the Colony—Acts 47 of 1902, Sec. 3, and 30 of 1906, Sec. 4.

Save in the case of Asiatics domiciled in S. Africa previous to the promulgation of Act 30 of 1906, it is in the discretion of the Immigration Officer to fix the period during which permits for temporary absence granted under Sec. 4 of that Act shall be available.

This was an application upon notice calling upon the Acting Chief Immigration Officer to show cause why he should not be directed to issue, in terms of section 4 (sub-section g) of Act 30, 1906, a permit authorising applicant to absent himself from the Colony for a period of 18 months or upwards, and at the expiration thereof to return and land in the Colony.

Applicant is an Indian and a British subject, and has resided in the Colony since 1890. He is the registered owner of a certain stand in the township of Vryburg, and has held a general dealer's licence there since the records were commenced in 1897. He had applied for a permit authorising him to go to India, and be absent from the Colony for a period of 18 months, and on his return to be re-admitted to the Colony without being subjected to the tests imposed under the Immigration Act of 1906. Correspondence had taken place between his attorneys and the Immigration Department, from which it appeared that the Acting Chief Immigration Officer took up the position that there was no obligation upon him to issue a permit to the applicant, under section 4 (sub-section g) of Act 30, 1906, and that the issue of such a permit was optional and in his discretion. It was the usual practice to issue permits to Asiatics for a period of twelve months, under regulations 18 and 23, except in certain cases. The period of twelve months was fixed by the Minister. A longer period than twelve months was allowed to Asiatics going to Mecca or visiting some other country than India, as well as India. Applicant had not, the officer said, given any sufficient reason why a permit should be granted to him for any longer period.

Mr. M. Bisset was for applicant; Mr. Howel Jones, K.C., was for respondent.

Mr. Bisset said that this matter was brought before the Court by way of a test case in regard to the issue of permits to Asiatics for temporary absence from the Colony. The Chief Immigration Officer took up the position that he was not bound to issue a permit at all unless he thought fit. He also took up the position that if he did issue a permit it should only be for a period of 12 months, unless the applicant could show that he was going to Mecca or going to some other country than India as well as India, so that it would be necessary for him to take an additional period to enable him to visit both those countries. The Immigration Officer claimed that the period, like the granting of the permit, was within his discretion.

Counsel referred to section 3 (sub-section f) of Act 47, 1902, and section 1 of Act 30, 1906, and said that the question arose whether under Act 47, 1902, applicant had by reason of domicile acquired rights, privileges, or powers which he still retained in terms of the saving clause of Act 30, 1906. Counsel referred to section 4 of the Act of 1906. The direct question that applicant wished to have decided was whether Dharsey, being an Indian lawfully resident in the Cape Colony, the Immigration Officer was bound to issue to him a permit, and, if so, whether it was in his power to restrict the operation of the permit to a period of 12 months irrespective of circumstances. Counsel quoted section 4 (sub-section g) of the Act of 1906, and referred to regulations 18 and 23, framed under the Act. The former regulations seemed, he said, to refer specially to Asiatics, but he did not think the latter regulation was intended to apply to Asiatics. The Court, in deciding this case, must look solely to regulation 18 in conjunction with section 4 (sub-section g). He contended that under the section the Minister had no discretion in the matter of granting permits. Counsel contended that if the temporary absence were within the spirit of the Act, and even if the period were 18 months, then the Minister had no discretion to refuse a permit. He quoted Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes (pp. 344—et seq.).

Mr. Howel Jones said he did not think it necessary to go at length into the first part of his learned friend's argument. If the applicant were really exempt from the Act, owing to his having been domiciled here before the Act of 1902 was passed, then the ground of this application fell away entirely. Counsel went on to contend that there was no obligation under the Act which made it compulsory upon the Minister to issue a permit to anyone who desired to absent himself from the Colony. He submitted that the Minister was justified in fixing a period of 12 months under permits for temporary absence, unless certain special circumstances were shown to exist in favour of an extension.

Mr. Bisset having been heard in reply,

Maasdorp, J.: Under the provisions of this Act, it was intended to give the Government power to prevent persons from entering the Colony, whose presence here might not be considered desirable, and a definition is given in section 3 of Act 30, 1906, of such persons whom the Government should be authorised to exclude. These persons are denominated "prohibited immigrants," and the Act, makes provision as to who should be regarded as prohibited immigrants. Under the 4th section of the Act provision is made for exempting certain persons from the disabilities contained in section 3. It would appear that under the Act 47 of 1902 (section 3), the classes of persons who were exempted were different from those now mentioned in the 4th section of the present Act. Incidentally, in this case, a question has been raised upon one of the clauses of the former Act, which also exempted such persons from disability as had been domiciled in the Colony. I do not think that any opinion need now be expressed with reference to the position of persons who had acquired a domicile and who were exempt under the previous Act, because if the applicant himself had acquired such privileges as he could insist upon as exempting him from the provisions of the present Act, then his present application is wholly unnecessary. If the applicant is actually entitled to privileges upon the ground of domicile, then such privileges can be insisted upon at such time as he claims the right of re-entering the Colony, and even if, by virtue of such domicile, he is entitled to certain privileges, the Court cannot now decide what his position may be with respect of domicile at some future period when he may again request to be allowed to enter the country. The decision of the Court must be confined to the terms of the application that has been submitted, and the decision of the Court must, also be confined specially to the facts of this particular case. It has been suggested that the opinion of the Court is required to some extent as a guide for future cases that might arise, but the Court will not express any opinion as to circumstances which might arise in future cases and which do not arise now. For instance, it is suggested that there is a dispute between the Government authorities and the applicant as to whether the Minister, or the officer appointed by him, has absolute discretion to refuse a permit without giving any reason for it. Now, that question has not been raised by the respondent in the present case. There has been some casual mention of the power which the Immigration Officer might possibly possess of absolutely refusing any permit to the applicant to leave the country, but that position has not been insisted upon by the respondent. The respondent is perfectly willing to grant a permit, but he wishes it to be subject to certain conditions. Now, the question is whether he is entitled to insert the conditions which he proposes in the permit, and to grant the permit under such conditions as the contents are provided for by the rules. Amongst the persons exempted from the disabilities created under section 3 of this Act, we find the following: "Any Asiatic who having, when lawfully resident within the Colony, obtained from the Minister a permit issued under such regulations as may be proclaimed by the Governor and authorising him temporarily to absent himself from the Colony, returns in accordance with the terms of the conditions of such permit." Now, it is contemplated by this clause that it shall be within the power of the Governor to make regulations providing for the conditions under which permits are to be granted to Asiatics who wish to absent themselves temporarily from this country. Such regulations have been made, and the Court will now have to decide whether the regulations so made are ultra vires or unreasonable. The regulation in question between the parties is to the following effect: "Permits to Asiatics lawfully resident in the Colony shall be issued in such form as may from time to time be prescribed by the Minister, which form shall state the period for which the permit is available, the port at which the grantee shall disembark on return to the Colony, and there shall be paid for every such permit a fee of £1 sterling. Every permit shall contain a photograph of the grantee and such particulars and marks as may be necessary for the purpose of identification." Now, it is only necessary to say, with reference to the conditions here provided for, that the question between the parties arises as to the reasonableness of the condition respecting the period for which the permit should be granted. In other respects, it seems to me that it cannot be said that there is anything unreasonable in this rule, and, as far as the period of absence is concerned, it is a circumstance which is expressly contemplated by the section under which the rule is made. Provision is to be made for authority to the applicant temporarily to absent himself from this colony. It seems that the importance of the time for which the applicant should absent himself from this colony was in contemplation by the Legislature, and for some reason or other their attention was directed specially to the fact that the absence should be temporary. It is provided in the regulation that such period shall be stated in the permit, and I think that, not only is that a reasonable provision, but it is an absolutely necessary provision. If the absence is to be temporary and limited, that limit should be fixed in each case. The applicant in this case says he himself should be the judge as to the period for which he should be allowed to be absent, because he is the best judge as to how much time he may require for the business on which he may be engaged. But that is not what was contemplated by the Legislature. It was contemplated that the Minister should have a check upon the re-entry of persons into this colony, and that it was for him to fix the conditions that he might think fit within reason upon which the re-entry should be allowed. The applicant now claims that he should be granted a permit authorising him to be absent for 18 months. The Immigration Officer answers that he has power under the instructions of the Minister to fix the period, and that he regards twelve months as a reasonable period for the visit by the applicant to India, and that if the applicant can submit to him grounds which could reasonably induce him to extend that period, then he might still be willing to do so. The applicant has refused to lay his request before the Minister in such a form as would afford the Minister the necessary information for granting a further extension of time, and he wishes the Court to declare that he is unconditionally now entitled to receive a permit to absent himself for 18 months, and I am of opinion that that application must be refused. The application will be refused, with costs.

Mr. Pohl moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £210, with interest from the 1st March, 1906, and for £4, taxed costs, and premiums of insurance; counsel also applied for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

VAN DER BYL AND CO. V. VENNER.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment, under Rule 32d, for £101 8s. 2d., for goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Order granted.

DIVORCE SUITS.

EDWARDS V. EDWARDS.

This was an action brought by Margaret Magdalene Edwards, of Cape Town, against her husband, Ernest Henry Edwards, of Cape Town, for divorce, on the ground of the defendant's adultery with some person or persons unknown to plaintiff.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for plaintiff; defendant had been barred.

W. T. Birch, clerk in charge of the Marriage Register, Colonial Secretary's Office, gave evidence to registration of the marriage.

Plaintiff said that she was married to defendant in community of property Cape Town on the 18th January, 1904. Defendant was a waiter. About April last, she found defendant was using certain medicines, and she asked him what he was using the medicines for. He admitted that he had not "played the game with her," and said that he had committed adultery. Witness had since been residing with friends. There was no joint estate.

Dr. Julius Petersen spoke to having treated the defendant in the early part of this year.

C. Leffler, clerk, in the employ of plaintiff's attorney, gave evidence as to an admission of adultery made by defendant.

Decree granted, with costs.

ROWE V. ROWE.

Mr. Struben moved for a decree of divorce in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights. Defendant was sued by edictal citation, and counsel put in an affidavit as to substituted service by registered letter and publication in the "Melbourne Argus" as ordered.

Decree of divorce granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte MARAIS. { 1907.
Aug. 13th.

Mr. Roux moved for a certain rule nisi, under the Derelict Lands Act, to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte SLABBERT.

Mr. Howes moved for leave to petitioner to mortgage his share of property in the estate of his parents in the sum of £100 to enable him to enclose his defined share, and eradicate the prickly pear from the land. The landed property bequeathed by the parents of petitioner and the co-heirs had been apportioned, and partition transfers had been duly effected in the name of each son. Under the will the legatees were restricted from mortgaging the property during their lifetime. All the heirs agreed to the bond being passed as proposed. Counsel explained that there had been previous applications in this estate.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte DUCKITT.

Mr. D. M. Buchanan moved for leave to have transfer passed of certain property free of duty. From the petition it appeared that petitioner and her late sister acquired certain six lots of ground at Wynberg, and had 12 cottages erected thereon. Petitioner's sister was a better business woman than deponent, and she managed their affairs. Subsequently to her sister's death, petitioner discovered that the whole of the property was registered in the name of her sister alone. As indicating that she had a half share of the property as acquired, petitioner stated that in her last will her sister gave her a life interest in her six cottages. Petitioner asked for leave to have the error in the transfer amended by transferring one-half of the property to herself free of duty. Application had been made to the Treasury, but the Government officials referred the applicant to the Court.

Maasdorp, J.: I think the application is rather premature. You have not even established your right to have transfer. There is no one before the Court to represent the late sister's rights. You must be prepared to take transfer before you can have any order as to whether the duty should be paid or not.

Mr. Buchanan asked that the matter might stand over.

Maasdorp, J.: There will be no order at present. The matter may stand over.

Ex parte VENTER.

Mr. Swift moved, on the petition of the executor dative, for leave to pass transfer to the Colonial Government of certain two portions of ground in the division of Willowmore, expropriated for railway purposes. There were three minors interested in the estate, and petitioners asked leave to sign all necessary documents on their behalf.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte HAHN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the amendment of petitioner's name in the Deeds

Registry, in which he is described as "Charles Hahn," by which name he is generally known.

Order granted, subject to mortgagees' consent being obtained.

Ex parte ESTATE KANNEMEYER.

Mr. Roux moved, on the petition of the executor testamentary, for an order authorising him, on behalf of certain two minors, to pass a fresh mortgage bond on certain property at Salt River, so as to enable the shares of the legatees to be divided.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte KLOPPER AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Payne moved, on behalf of petitioners, who are minors, and are assisted by their tutor dative, for an order authorising registration of transfers of the farm Bonecavehill, division of Barkly East, in lieu of their undivided shares, with certain other parties in the farms Bonecavehill and Lamont.

Order granted as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

MALLOCH V. SOMERSET { 1907.
EAST MUNICIPALITY. { Aug. 14th.
" 15th.

Engineer (hydraulic)—Incomplete plans—Remuneration.

This was an action brought by Wm. Farquhar Malloch, hydraulic engineer, Uitenhage, against the Somerset East Municipality, to recover a sum of £225 1s. 9d. for professional services.

A number of amendments were made in the pleadings by consent between the parties.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that on or about the 23rd October, 1903, he was employed by defendants to prepare plans and specifications for carrying out certain scheme for supplying water to the town of Somerset East. Thereafter he prepared plans and specifications for such scheme, and delivered same to defendants in or about September, 1904, and defendants accepted same in or about that month. The proper and customary remuneration for the preparation of plans and specifications for engineering work was 2½ per cent. calculated on the estimated cost of such work. The estimated cost of the proposed works was £8,943 11s., exclusive of engineer's fees. Plaintiff was by reason of the premises entitled to be paid for preparation of the plans and specifications £223 11s. 9d. On or about the 7th July, 1905, plaintiff, at the special instance and request of defendants, also took certain measurements on the mountain, for which work £1 10s. was a reasonable remuneration. He therefore claimed £223 11s. 9d. and £1 10s., with interest a tempore morae, and costs.

Defendants, in their plea, said that prior to the request made to plaintiff in 1903, and in or about the year 1902, plaintiff had been employed by them to do certain preliminary work in connection with the said water scheme. Thereafter he rendered to them an account for £175 14s., being a fee at the rate of three guineas a day, and expenses. The said account was paid in or about the year 1904. The work for which plaintiff was paid was such as was usual and necessary in connection with the preparation of plans and specifications. Defendants admitted the delivery of certain plans and specifications by plaintiff, but they denied that these were sufficiently detailed for the purpose of carrying out the water scheme referred to. They were unable to proceed with the said water scheme, and, in consequence, another and different scheme was being prepared. They admitted that plaintiff was entitled to reasonable remuneration for work done by him, but denied that 2½ per cent. on the estimated cost was reasonable and customary remuneration for such work, and said that the amount already paid to plaintiff should be taken into account in estimating what plaintiff was entitled to. They submitted that £100, over and above the sum already paid, was a fair and reasonable remuneration for the plans and specifications and the work done in July, 1905. The estimated cost of the works was £6,583. Defendants had tendered £100, and repeated this tender, otherwise they prayed that the claim be dismissed, with costs.

Plaintiff, in his replication, admitted having been paid £175 14s., but said that this sum was paid solely for and on account of certain services rendered in making certain inspections and reports, irrespective of the services subsequently rendered by him in and about the preparation of plans and specifications. He admitted the tender prior to summons, but said that the same was wholly insufficient.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C. (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones), was for plaintiff; Mr.

Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C.), was for the defendant Municipality.

Wm. Farquhar Malloch (the plaintiff) said he was a consulting hydraulic engineer practising at Uitenhage and Port Elizabeth. When he first performed certain services for the Somerset East Municipality he was Town Engineer at Uitenhage. Proceeding, witness described in detail the work which he did on being called in on the first occasion by the Municipality, and for which he had been paid. He said that, except as to three days for which he was paid at the rate of three guineas per day, all the work which he did on the first occasion was independent of the preparation of plans and specifications. Witness said that subsequently in 1905 he was approached with regard to preparing a cheaper scheme, but was asked to postpone his visit for six months, as it would be impossible to go to Parliament with a Bill in the ensuing session in March of that year. One of the estimates which he had sent to the Municipality was £6,583. In that, however, the reservoir was only provided for, as half the size of the one he had been instructed to provide for. A sum of £1,194 should be added on account of that. Then there was also to be added 15 per cent. for contingencies, making a total of £8,943 odd. Witness was engaged for a period of between two and a half and three months in preparing the plans and specifications. He was engaged upon the work from October, 1903, to June, 1904, and did it in the evenings between 7 and 10 o'clock, and on Sundays. Certain of the work was done gratuitously for him by a friend. The plans and specifications were sufficient to enable any competent foreman to carry out the works without the intervention of an engineer.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness was of opinion that the plans were sufficient for the purpose of calling for tenders. During the time he was employed on the plans and specifications, he was in the service of the Municipality of Uitenhage as Town Engineer. If he had been engaged in doing nothing else from day to day, the preparation of the plans and specifications would have occupied him about two months. He did not regard himself as a quick worker, or as a slow one, but he considered that he was an average worker. He could not have done the work in one month. From the scheme, as approved by the ratepayers, certain items were omitted. In his claim of 2½ per cent. he included these items. The estimate of £6,583 was made up as follows: Pipes, £3,112; pipes and tunnel, £1,902; small service reservoir, £1,569. In his first report he estimated for a reservoir of 500,000 gallons capacity. This was afterwards reduced to a small reservoir. The amount of £1,569 was for a quarter million gallons' reservoir. The reduction was made in consequence of a conference with the Municipal Council. There was a difference of £1,194 between the large and the small reservoir. That made £7,777. To that amount 15 per cent. had to be added for contingencies. He considered that it was quite reasonable to include the contingencies in the estimate.

Mr. Schreiner: What right have you to claim a percentage on the contingencies?

Witness: I claim a percentage on the total estimated cost.

Cross-examination continued: Witness did not think it necessary to make any provision in the estimate he framed for presentation to the ratepayers of the amount of £175 that he had been paid. If he had never known anything previously about the scheme, and had been making plans and specifications, his charge would have been 2½ per cent.

Mr. Schreiner: Do you contend that you could bring in your prior knowledge, acquired during 19 days' work at Somerset East, and charge it a second time to the Council?

Witness: It was not used a second time. Except for three days' work, for which I allow nine guineas, the preliminary work was of no value in the preparation of the plans and specifications.

Further cross-examined: The plans and specifications that he prepared furnished, he considered, a workable scheme, on which tenders could be called. The plans were complete, except for the final detailed drawings. Sections were not shown, but all necessary provision was made in the specifications. Sections would be provided when the work was in progress. It was not necessary to have sections in order that tenders could be called for. He did not think that 1½ per cent. would be sufficient to allow for the work he had done on the plans and specifications, because he considered that they were quite complete, and sufficient for requirements.

Mr. Schreiner put it to witness that his claim was very belated, and that in May, 1906, he knew that the Council were not going on with his scheme?

Witness: No. They don't know yet whether they are going on with it.

With your scheme?—Yes. I was told not six weeks ago that if this other scheme that they are trying to get through Parliament falls through, they would fall back on my scheme.

Wm. Westhofen, consulting engineer, formerly of the engineering staff of the Public Works Department, said that, considering the magnitude of the work, he regarded the plans and specifications prepared by plaintiff as quite good enough for any contractor that knew his work to offer a tender upon. He thought it was understood in the profession generally that 5 per cent. should be allowed to the engineer on the estimated cost—2½ per cent. for plans and specifications, and 2½ per cent. for additional plans and supervision. He did not consider that 2½ per cent. would include remuneration for reports and estimates that were prepared for the constructing body before any scheme was agreed upon. Preliminary surveys and investigations were generally paid for separately.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Witness had had experience while in the Public Works Department of water schemes carried out by municipalities under contract. Plaintiff's plans and specifications would have been sufficient, if submitted to the Public Works Department, to ascertain the likely cost of the works and whether the estimate would be sufficient. Witness had not seen the plans while he was in the service of the Public Works Department. With the key plan, he would have been satisfied that the work done by plaintiff was sufficient to form an estimate or call tenders upon.

Buchanan, J., pointed out that the correspondence showed that the Public Works Department reported that the Government's professional advisers could not recommend a loan on the drawings so far supplied.

Further cross-examined: No contractor would have tendered for work of this kind unless he first went over the ground, otherwise he would simply be a gambler. He would not base his tender on plans and specifications merely.

Re-examined: When the plans came before the Public Works Department, witness was engaged on the construction of the Colesberg bridge.

Mr. Ingham said he was an Associate of Institute of Civil Engineers. He had had considerable experience in England and in this country as a water engineer. He was at present engaged in carrying out the new water scheme at Port Elizabeth.

Mr. Benjamin: What is the usual charge for specifications?

Witness: Two and a half per cent. for plans and specifications and two and a half per cent. for carrying out the work. On small contracts, say, of £6,000, the charge would probably be higher, 6 per cent. perhaps altogether.

Witness (continuing) said the charge was never in any case less than 2½ and 2½ per cent.

Mr. Benjamin: If you prepare preliminary estimates, is that included in these charges?

Witness: No, these would be special charges.

Mr. Benjamin: These estimates and preliminary reports, are these simply rough estimates?—Yes.

Do you allow for contingencies?—I do. It would be foolish for any engineer not to do so.

The amount taken into account for contingencies is always taken into account in the estimates?—That is so.

Witness further stated that he had gone very carefully into the plans and specifications. They were quite sufficient for a contractor to work upon. It was not customary to put into these plans all the minute details of levels, etc.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner. With a few slight alterations, witness said he would have sent in similar plans to those submitted.

Do you think a contractor ought to go over the ground before sending in tenders?—No good contractor would send in a tender without going over the ground. He would have to find out what it would cost to get his material on to the job and see the lay of the ground, etc.

Do you then say that no contractor can expect sufficient from an engineer purely from the plans alone?—Not in this particular case. A man would be very foolish to send in tenders without going over the ground.

[Buchanan, J.: You say that the usual charge is 5 per cent. altogether?]

Yes.

[To prepare these plans you have to get local knowledge?]

Quite so.

[If you obtained local knowledge in the first instance, would it be fair to charge twice over?]

That would depend on circumstances.

Thos. Wilson Cairncross, associate member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, previously City Engineer in Cape Town, stated that 2½ per cent. was the usual charge for drawing up plans and specifications. In the absence of any arrangements this amount would not be included in the amount charged for getting out the preliminary reports. A contractor would certainly have to go over the ground before sending in tenders. About 15 per cent. was usually allowed for contingencies, because they could not depend upon the prices of labour and material.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Do you say that a man has to get 2½ per cent upon 15 per cent. for contingencies when these contingencies are not required?

Witness: The charge would not be unreasonable. Alterations may take place. The contractor may put on items himself for contingencies.

Do you agree with the question of the costs?—I have not been asked to go into that question.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

Reuben Archer said he was Town Clerk of Somerset East. Mr. Malloch, he believed, inspected the mountain reservoir, and the whole area. Witness gave plaintiff the fullest information. During the period before plaintiff was called upon to furnish plans, he sent in information regarding the distribution of the water. The scheme was approved of with the exception of the oil pumping tank on the mountain. Witness said he showed plaintiff a letter from the Public Works Department stating that the plans had been rejected. Plaintiff then stated that the Council still owed him 30s.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He was under no misapprehension with regard to the amount of 30s. That was all plaintiff mentioned as being owing to him.

Thos. W. Stainthorpe, called, said he was employed in the Public Works Department. He was an associate of the Institute of Civil Engineers, and had large experience in water engineering. It was his duty to examine all the water schemes submitted to the Public Works Department throughout the Colony.

Have you examined the plans and specifications in question?—Yes.

Do you say that these plans were properly got out?—They were very slovenly got out. Few men in the profession would have turned them out so unsatisfactorily.

Witness (continuing) said these plans were in the department in 1906, and he rejected them with the approval of his chief, Mr. Gordon. The levels on the plans shown were only surface levels, and he believed that the enormous pressure would burst the pipes. Certainly, these plans should have been got out in such a manner that the contractor could work by them. There was no law with regard to the charge for getting out plans and specifications, but the usual custom was when an engineer was called in he was asked for a preliminary report. This preliminary report would be remunerated by so much per day, and out-of-pocket expenses. When the Council adopted a scheme the usual plan was to pay the engineer at the rate of 5 per cent. for the plans completed and for carrying out the work. The engineer had to prepare everything necessary for the contractor to base his tender upon.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He did not approve of the scheme submitted by Mr. Malloch.

Mr. Benjamin: Engineers disagree, like doctors?—Well, there are engineers and engineers, and unfortunately for municipalities, there are far too many careless engineers in this country. The scheme in question was rejected by the Government.

Perhaps the Government hadn't any money?—I don't know anything about that.

Witness (emphatically): I wish to say distinctly that if the Municipality had to pay 2½ per cent. for these plans and specifications, they certainly would not have got value for their money.

Arthur Capel Valentine Baines, Town Engineer, Somerset East, said he did not consider the plans sufficient or proper plans and specifications. As an engineer, he would not go on with the works upon these plans. He thought it impossible for an engineer to get the necessary material to prepare the plans and specifications in two day's time.

James Just Niven, A.M.I.C.E., said that he believed 1½ per cent. was sufficient remuneration for the work done.

Mr. Stainthorpe (recalled) said about 30 days would be ample for the completion of the whole work. It would be quite impossible to take the levels in two days.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Mr. Benjamin said that the great portion of the evidence for the defence was that the scheme was unsatisfactory, not that the plans were unsatisfactory. Mr. Malloch entered into an arrangement with the defendant Municipality, in which it was stated he would have three guineas a day and expenses, and in addition to that, he would have a special allowance for plans and specifications. The amount paid to Mr. Malloch was simply for preliminary reports, and it did not come into this liability at all. It was perfectly clear from the letter of the Government that they thought the plans satisfactory, with the exception of one or two points, but the fact was that the Government had no money, and therefore refused the scheme. If this £175 were already paid in full settlement to Mr. Malloch, why should the defendant Municipality tender a further £100? Mr. Malloch did not press his claim for remuneration, because the scheme was held up for six months. Mr. Benjamin, in conclusion, said that the amount asked for was perfectly reasonable, and really, if they took the 1½ per cent. which Mr. Niven thought enough, then they would find that even this was better than the amount the defendants tendered.

Buchanan, J.: In this action the plaintiff claims £225 for services rendered to the Municipality of Somerset East. These services were given by the plaintiff in his capacity of an engineer, and I admit at once that these services are not to be compensated at the rate of mere manual or clerical services, but specially as professional services. In the case of such professional services the professional education, training, and experience of the person must be taken into account, and must be compensated for accordingly. The claim is founded upon an agreement made with the plaintiff to prepare plans and specifications for the construction of a certain scheme of waterworks, the cost of which was estimated at £8,000 to £9,000. The defendant Municipality, it was stated, engaged plaintiff to take preliminary surveys to obtain the necessary information to prepare such a scheme. For the work done by plaintiff they paid him £176, and they have tendered another £100 in full settlement. It would appear from the correspondence that the plaintiff was originally engaged at three guineas a day and out-of-pocket expenses. On several occasions he visited the locality, and he also charged for work done at his own residence in Uitenhage. The plaintiff prepared preliminary reports, and eventually a meeting of ratepayers authorised the Council to carry out the work, whereupon the Council wrote plaintiff, requesting him to draw up plans and specifications in order to obtain a loan for construction purposes. These plans were handed to the Government, but the loan was not granted upon the information supplied. The plans have been produced in Court, and professional witnesses have been called, who gave their opinions upon them. As usual, the evidence called for the one side has differed from that called on the other. It was stated that five per cent. was the usual amount allowed for preparing plans and specifications and for supervising the work. If the work was not carried out, a charge of 2½ per cent. on the estimated cost should be awarded for making the plans. The plaintiff admits that these plans were not completed plans; but states that they were sufficient to lay before the Government for the purposes of raising a loan. He admits that a good deal more work would have had to be done to the plans if the work was to be carried out. If I were to use my own judgment, I would certainly say that the plans and specifications in the state they are now were not complete or sufficient to submit to tenderers or contractors. If the plans had been satisfactory, and details had been prepared properly, surely an item of 16 per cent. for contingencies would not be necessary in the estimate of the cost. I take it that such plans were not such as could be expected from a man who was to be paid 2½ per cent. for them. In the sum of £176 already paid, the plaintiff allotted £60 for preparing the estimates, £60 for personal inspection of the spot and taking levels, and £50 for expenses. Now, Mr. Ingham said that the charge of 2½ per cent. would include the preliminary expenses incurred by the engineer. In court the plaintiff offers to allow a small portion of these preliminary expenses which he has been paid, but I do not think that he makes sufficient allowance. The work and time for which he has been paid he is not entitled to charge for again in the 2½ per cent. That being so, as these plans and specifications sent in had not been sufficient to enable the Municipality to get a loan. The plaintiff had been informed in February, 1906, that the matter must stand over indefinitely in consequence. No further claim was made until November of that year. I think that the tender of £100 by the Council was a reasonable and satisfactory tender, and one that plaintiff would have been well advised to accept. Judgment will therefore be for the plaintiff for £100, but plaintiff must pay the costs incurred since the tender.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

Ex parte PEILE. { 1907.
{ Aug. 14th.

Mr. Inchbold moved, on behalf of the petitioner, for leave to sue her husband, Edward Dunganion Peile, in forma pauperis, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce by reason of the respondent's desertion.

The parties were married, counsel said, in Workington, Cumberland, on the 10th July, 1900, and the husband, without any lawful excuse, deserted the petitioner in Cape Town, in July, 1904, since when petitioner had not heard of her husband. She had made inquiries from all sources as to his whereabouts, but she was not able to find him. There were two children of the marriage, aged six and two years respectively. Petitioner was desirous of suing her husband by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, and, failing his return, for a decree of divorce and custody of the children of the marriage.

The plaintiff said she was not possessed of property of the value of £10. The respondent came to Cape Town during the war with the Imperial Yeomanry in 1901, and in 1902, when he was discharged, he started business at Uitenhage as a butcher, which he carried on for over a year.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He deserted you in 1904. Did you know he was going?]

No, sir. He said he was going to a football match, and never returned.

[Did he come here to settle in Cape Town before he left?]

Yes.

[What was he doing here?]

He was a painter at Woodstock.

[Did he come to settle here in Cape Town?]

Yes, otherwise I should not have come out to him, but it was to Uitenhage I should have gone.

[You did go to Uitenhage?]

No, sir. He met me here.

A rule was granted calling on the respondent to show cause by the last day of the November term why the plaintiff should not be allowed to sue the defendant in forma pauperis for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, with custody of the children, the rule to be served personally, failing which one publication in the "Daily Telegraph," London.

REX V. CHONG.

Gaming in a public place—Summons.

The accused was charged in a Magistrate's Court with contravening Sec. 7, Sub-sec. 13 of Act 27 of 1882, as amended by Sec. 37 of Act 36 of 1902, in that he did "wrongfully and unlawfully play a game of chance with dice and money in a public street."

Held, that although part of the charge was surplusage, the charge substantially stated an offence under these Acts.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of the Resident Magistrate for the District of Cape Town in a case in which the accused was charged with the crime of contravening section 7, paragraph 13, of Act 27, of 1882, as substituted by section 37 of Act 36 of 1902, in that upon or about the 1st August, 1907, at or near Cape Town, the said Chi Chong was wrongfully and unlawfully playing a game of chance with dice and money in a public place. He was, secondly, charged with a contravention of the Police Offences Act by resisting a police officer in the execution of his duty. He was found guilty on both counts, and on the first fined £5, or three months' imprisonment, and on the second fined £2, or fourteen days' hard labour, to take effect after the expiration of the first sentence.

The appeal was brought on the grounds that the conviction was not supported by the evidence given before the Court, and was contrary to law, and that the charge was vague, embarrassing, and bad in law, in that it did not disclose the offence in terms of section 37 of Act 36 of 1902, and, thirdly, that the offence, if any, amounted to an offence under Act 9 of 1889, section 3, as the form of gambling amounted to a lottery as defined by sections of the said Act.

Mr. Upington was for the appellant, and Mr. Howel Jones, K.C., was for the Crown.

Mr. Upington said he was not prepared to say that there was no evidence before the Magistrate upon which, assuming the charge to be in order, it would not have been competent for him to convict. There was a conflict of testimony between the policeman and one of the by-standers and Chi Chong. He did not appeal against that portion of the sentence which consisted in hindering or resisting the police in execution of their duty. The substantial ground of appeal was that the charge upon which he was found guilty did not disclose an offence under section 37 of the Gaming Act, which repealed sub-section 13 of section 7 of the Police Offences Act, and substituted a new sub-section rendering unlawful "betting in any street or open place, or playing therein at any game for a wager or stake, or playing at or with any table or instrument of gaming." Now, the charge on which the accused was found guilty charged him with wrongfully and unlawfully playing a game of chance with dice and money in a public place. It had been held frequently by the Supreme Court that where a statutory offence was charged that the words of the section should be set out in the charge substantially, or as nearly as possible. Now, this particular charge did not set out any particular offence under that section. He was not charged with playing a game for a wager or stake, and he was not charged with playing at or with any instrument of gaming.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are not dice an instrument of gaming?]

Mr. Upington: Dice may or may not be. Of course, the essential part of the thing would be that the game played, in order to be a game of chance, should be played for money or for valuable consideration. Persons might play with money, money simply being regarded as counters in the game. It would not follow because I have dice or money that both of them are in a sense instruments of gaming. One can understand persons might play at a roulette table in a perfectly innocent and perfectly lawful manner, and it seems to me they would not be contravening this particular sub-section, which has been substituted for the old sub-section of the Police Offences Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing a person had a roulette table in a public street and was playing with that table, would not that be an infringement of the Act?]

Mr. Upington: I submit not. After all, this is a penal statute, and of course the section would be construed strictly, and the whole object and intent of the section is to prevent actual gaming in the sense that the person plays at a game of chance or with one of these instruments of gaming.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the meaning of chance? Doesn't that imply that there is a chance of winning money? Where does the chance come in?]

Mr. Upington: The chance is that you may win or lose the game. There are plenty of games of chance that one does play without any stakes at all. For the matter of that, one can understand a game of cards, as bridge, being played for counters.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing a man is playing with a roulette table in the street and there was no evidence that gaming was going on, would not that be an infringement of this Act.]

Mr. Upington: I submit an instrument of gaming must be taken to mean not only an instrument that can be used for the purpose of gaming, but that an instrument is used for it. In fact, a person might use dice or a gaming table, or a roulette table, or so forth in a public place for purposes other than the purposes of gaming. In such a case there would not be a contravention of the terms of the section.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But didn't money pass in this case?]

Mr. Upington: In this case money was used. I will read what the detective says on that point: "I saw accused sitting in the middle. He had a board in front of him, marked out in six squares. He then raised a tin box containing dice. He then paid out to those who had won, and pocketed the other money. There were several tickets and pennies. I saw them play three rounds." Proceeding, counsel contended that the charge did not sufficiently set out the statutory offence provided for under the new sub-section 13 of the Police Offences Act. If it did sufficiently set out that offence in the way it should be set out, there was no doubt that there was some evidence before the Magistrate that an instrument of gaming was used, but the appellant was not charged with that specific offence. He was charged with playing a game of chance, but he was not charged with playing for a wager or stake. His submission was that a person might play a game of chance with dice and with money, using them in the course of the game, without actually gaming and without actually contravening the terms of the new sub-section 13 of the Police Offences' Act. No doubt, if the charge had been drawn up in this way: "The said Chi Chong was wrongfully and unlawfully playing at or with a table or instrument of gaming," then the charge would have been correctly set out under this section. He submitted it had been ruled over and over again that where a statutory offence was relied upon, the words of the section must be followed as closely as possible, and that had not been done here at all. In the old Police Offences Act, section 7, sub-section 13, it was thus set out: "playing or betting in any street or other open and public place, at or with any table or instrument of gaming or pretended game of chance." "Or pretended game of chance" was specifically left out in this new sub-section. This was rather in substance a more important appeal than might appear on the outside of it, so to speak, in that the accused was liable to deportation in consequence of this conviction.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He can still be tried. Supposing you succeed, could he not be tried again?]

Mr. Upington: Yes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you admit the evidence is clear on the point?]

Mr. Upington: I do not admit that, but my admission goes to this length, that there was evidence upon the record to support the Magistrate's finding. I am told there were other witnesses for the defence, and they were not called.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why not?]

Mr. Upington: Because the objection to the charge was taken before the Magistrate, although it does not appear upon the record, and it was not amended. Proceeding, counsel contended that the charge did not disclose the offence it purported to disclose. There was another point taken in the appeal. It was contended that this offence, as disclosed in the indictment, if an offence at all, was one against Act 9 of 1889, an Act for the prohibition of lotteries.

Mr. Jones said it was difficult to understand how the accused was embarrassed by the charge. It was clear he was playing a game of chance with money and for money, and he was paying out to the winners. How could the accused say he was prejudiced by this charge? Dice were clearly an instrument of gaming. Counsel referred to the 9th section of the same Act, which said that whenever any such house or place was suspected of being kept or used as a gaming-house, was entered under a warrant, and any cards, dice, balls, counters, tables, or other instruments of gaming found, they would be evidence that the house was a gaming-house. That showed that dice were clearly an instrument of gaming. All that it was necessary to set out was that the accused was playing with dice in a public place, to wit, Albert-street. The charge here went a little further, and said he was playing a game of chance with dice with money. It was not necessary to say he was playing for a wager or stakes, because there was another portion of the section which states it was an offence to bet in any street or open place.

Mr. Upton having been heard in reply,

De Villiers, C. J.: The main ground of the appeal is that the summons does not disclose an offence in terms of the Act of 1902. The charge in the Magistrate's Court was: contravening section 7, paragraph 13, of Act 27 of 1882, as amended by section 37 of Act 36 of 1902, in that the accused "did wrongfully and unlawfully play a game of chance with dice and money in a public place, to wit, Albert-street." Under that Act the offence would be playing at or with any table or instrument of gaming in any street or public place. And now the question is whether the charge does not substantially state that the accused did play at or with any table or instrument of gaming. It is quite true that the Court has always held that the charge should substantially state the offence with which the accused is intended to be charged. And to my mind this charge does substantially state what the charge against the accused is. If dice can fairly be by considered as an instrument of gaming, then I think substantially the charge is made. Now, under the 9th section of the Act, dice are referred to as being instruments of gaming. Cards, dice, balls, tables, or other instruments of gaming used in playing a game would be evidence under the 9th section. Therefore under the 37th section the statement that the accused had been playing at or with dice would be a sufficient charge. In the present case there are some words added to the words of the Act. The words added are "game of chance," and the words "and money." The addition of these words surely ought not to be held to make the charge a bad one. If money was used, and if it was a game of chance, then it was clearly a case of gaming with instruments of gaming, and the charge would be sufficiently stated. In my opinion, the provisions under the Lotteries Act do not apply to the present case. According to the evidence in the present case, the witness says: "I saw a crowd of coloured men at the top of Albert-street. I went close up to them. I saw accused sitting in the middle. He had a board in front of him, marked out in six squares. The men were putting money down on the squares. The accused then raised a tin box containing the dice. He then paid out those who had won and pocketed the other money." Well, to call that a lottery would be rather a mis-description of what actually took place. It was a case of gambling pure and simple. This gambling took place in a public street, and clearly it is an offence aimed at by the Act of 1902. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLBY.]

CHASE AND ANOTHER V. { 1907.
RIGGE. { Aug. 15th.

Unsoundness of mind—Lunacy —Asylum—Curator.

On an application to declare of unsound mind a lady detained in a lunatic asylum under part 1 of Act 1 of 1867 and to have a curator appointed to her person and property, the Court was satisfied from the evidence that, although she suffered from mental excitability and a certain degree of incapacity to manage her own affairs, she did not suffer from such unsoundness of mind as would justify her further detention in the asylum.

Held, that she should be released from further confinement and a curator bonis appointed with the powers mentioned in the 35th section of the Act.

[De Villiers, C.J., asked, in the case of Chase v. Rigge, which had been called, if Mrs. Rigge was in town?] Mr. Sutton: No, my lord. I only heard at ten o'clock this morning that the case was coming on.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It may be a matter for consideration when the case is heard whether the Court cannot appoint some person with her consent, supposing the Court finds she is not of unsound mind, to attend on her, and report to the Court from time to time.]

Mr. Sutton: Medical men?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, no. Some of the family, I should think. Is there no one the parties could agree upon as a competent person?]

Mr. Bisset: I am for the applicant.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Sutton): You, as curator, might consult her, and see whether she has not some friends who wish to live with her.]

Mr. Sutton: Yes; she has a sister. She told me she wanted the sister to go and live with her.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is the sister unmarried?]

Mr. Sutton: Yes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I understand the reports of the medical men appointed by the Court are somewhat conflicting. Sir Edmund Stevenson does not see any signs of insanity. Dr. Wright's opinion is more qualified. He does not think she should be kept at the asylum. He thinks she should go to her own home under supervision.]

Mr. Sutton: He says: "I consider this lady should be allowed personal liberty with a restricted pin allowance. That her establishment, carriage, etc., should be kept for her by some independent responsible person other than a relative, and that she should not be allowed to leave this Peninsula without the sanction of the Court until her complete recovery, that I consider will not be long, and which I consider will be hastened by adopting the suggestion I have made."

[Would the parties both agree to Mr. Coulter?]

Mr. Sutton: She seems to have a great confidence in him.

Mr. Bisset: The relatives are well satisfied with Mr. Coulter, who appears to be able to get on very well with Mrs. Rigge. With regard to Mrs. Rigge's sister, I am told she is looking after Mrs. Rigge's mother, and it will probably be impossible for her to leave Mrs. Rigge's mother at the present time. As for the rest, the relatives feel that somebody should be appointed to take care of the property. They would be pleased if the Court could see its way to allow Mrs. Rigge to be released from the asylum.

De Villiers, C.J.: Under all the circumstances, it will not be necessary to postpone the case further, nor will it be necessary to have the defendant, Mrs. Rigge, in court. At the last hearing in this case, the doctors' evidence appeared to be unanimous that the defendant was of unsound mind. The appearance of this lady in court, and the manner in which she gave her evidence, led me to doubt her mental unsoundness, and as she was anxious to be examined by some other doctors, and she mentioned Sir Edmund Stevenson as the doctor she wished to be examined by, I appointed him, and subsequently I appointed Dr. Wright, of Wynberg, as a doctor to be associated with Sir Edmund Stevenson for the purpose of inquiring into the condition of this lady's mind. Dr. Stevenson has sent in a report, a very brief one, and to the point, and it is to the following effect: "As requested by the Court, I saw Mrs. Rigge, at Valkenberg, on the 9th inst. A full report of the case was read over to me by the resident medical officer. The impression received by me from the report is that Lucy Mary Rigge is suffering at times from occasional mental excitement. From my own immediate observation and examination, I was unable to find any symptoms of insanity. I am of opinion that Lucy Mary Rigge was not insane when I saw her." Dr. Wright is more qualified. He sends in a report, and he mentions certain facts in connection with the plaintiff's detention which shows she is a lady of some eccentricities, and indeed a little more than eccentricities, but, at the same time, even he is not prepared to recommend that she should remain in the asylum. He says: "I do not see that the degree of departure from the normal is a large one, but it undoubtedly exists, and her ideas are grandiose above what her fortune warrants, and I consider that if she had a full control of her fortune before her return to the normal occurs, she will squander a large portion if not the whole of it, as she frequently remarked: 'Why shouldn't I spend what money I like?' stated in a tone that was rather defiant and wanting in appreciation of its value." No doubt there was some importance in what the doctor here states, but, on the other hand, the evidence does not show that while she had the spending of the money that she was very extravagant. She was very kind to her relatives. She took them to Europe, and spent considerable money upon them, but upon herself there seems to be no great expenditure, nor do I consider that the expenditure upon her relatives was at all extravagant. Then Dr. Wright goes on: "This lady retains, however, so much of what is pleasant, sympathetic, and generous in her nature that I consider her present surroundings are detrimental towards her recovery. The classification of cases must at a public asylum be so crude that patients who are refined and only slightly deranged come in contact with so much that is offensive to their tastes and repulsive to their natures by being surrounded with other poor people having fits, rushing about using bad language, etc., can only rend the heart of others who are likewise confined with them when they are able to realise what it all is, as this lady, Mrs. Rigge, is able to do. If it is not presumption for me to suggest I would remark that I consider this lady should be allowed personal liberty with a restricted pin allowance; that her establishment, carriage, etc., should be kept for her by some independent responsible person other than a relative, and that she should not be allowed to leave this Peninsula without the sanction of the Court until her complete recovery that I consider will not be long, and which will be hastened by adopting the suggestion I have made." Now, I quite agree with what Dr. Wright says as to the inadvisability of keeping this lady at the asylum. However, kindly and sympathetic the treatment may be, still it is not the treatment which can, in my opinion, do any good to a lady like this who, at all events, has sufficient mental capacity to realise the position in which she is. It seems to me a case in which notwithstanding the opinion of the doctors, expressed in court, the Court should exercise its discretion. I consider this woman should no longer be retained in the asylum, but should be set at liberty. I consider, therefore, that for the present, for her own sake, it is advisable that somebody should control her money affairs. The evidence does disclose a state of mental excitability on her part, and a certain degree of incapacity to manage her own affairs, but not such unsoundness of mind as would justify her further detention in the asylum. The Court, therefore, declares that the defendant is not of such unsound mind as to require any custody of her person. The Court orders that she be discharged from confinement. The Court declares for the present the defendant is incapable of managing her affairs, and appoints Mr. Coulter as curator bonis with the powers conferred under the 35th section of the Act, and with further power to pay the fees of the doctors appointed by this Court to examine the defendant, the curator to file quarterly accounts with the Master of the Supreme Court, and report from time to time to the Court as to the mental condition of Mrs. Rigge, costs of the application to be paid by the curator.

Mr. Bisset said there was about £350 required to pay present liabilities, and he asked the Court to give the curator authority to obtain an advance from the bank to meet these liabilities.

The Chief Justice: The Court will authorise the curator to obtain an advance from the Standard Bank for £350 for the purpose of meeting present liabilities. What I would suggest is that this lady should have for the present some friend whom she trusts, and whom she likes to live with her for her own sake. I think the curator would have the power to pay any such person for the assistance she may give.

ESTATE LOUW V. ESTATE { 1907.
LOUW. { Aug. 15th.

Mutual will—Acceptance of benefits—Adiation.

A husband and wife made a mutual will, under which the survivor was to have a child's portion in addition to his or her half share of the joint estate, and was to enjoy the usufruct, during life, of certain two farms belonging to such joint estate. After the death of the wife, the husband, as executor, awarded to himself only half of the joint estate, and the remaining half to the children, such assets including the proceeds of one of the farms which the husband had sold as executor. He remained in possession of the other farm without any objection on the part of the children.

Held, that such mere occupation was not proof of adiation on the surviving husband's part in the face of the other indications of his intention not to adiate.

This was a special case, stated in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff is Isaac Jacobus Louw, sen., in his capacity as executor dative in the estate of the late Maria Margaretha Klasina Louw (born Strauss), hereinafter called the testatrix, pre-deceased spouse of Nicolaas Everhardus Louw (now deceased), hereinafter called the testator.

2. The defendants are Clasina Johanna Louw (born Van Zyl), widow of the testator and Henry Allan Fagan, in their capacities as executrix and assumed executor respectively of the estate of the testator.

3. On the 28th of September, 1871, the testator and testatrix, who were married in community of property, executed a mutual will.

4. By the said will it was provided inter alia as follows: "It is further our will and desire that all our landed property, which we possess or may yet acquire, shall after the death of the survivor, be sold by public auction amongst our heirs." The survivor, together with the children of the first dying were appointed heirs, and after the institution of heirs the said will proceeded as follows: "and such to all the property to be relinquished by the first dying on demise, excepting the pre-viciously bequeathed property movable as well as immovable, Acts and credits, inheritances and expectancies, to be assumed and possessed by them for always as free and personal property, without the contradiction of any one; the survivor shall, however, be held and bound to bring up and maintain in an honourable and Christian way the children begotten of this marriage until their majority, earlier marriage or other approved states, at which time there shall be paid out to each of the same, for or in lieu of paternal or maternal portion, such amount of money as the survivor shall find to pertain to him or them according to the condition of the estate." It was also provided by the said will that the survivor should remain in full and undisturbed possession of the estate, in order the better to be able to educate and maintain the minor children until they should receive their inheritances. The parties crave leave to refer to the terms of the will for the further material portions thereof.

5. The testatrix died in 1876, and at the date of her death there was certain landed property in the joint estate of herself and the testator, consisting of the farm Augustfontein and a half-share of the farm Matjesfontein, both registered in the name of the testator.

6. Thereafter the testator remained for several years in possession of the said farms, and enjoyed the usufruct thereof. Subsequently the said half of the farm Matjesfontein was sold by him as the executor of the said joint estate, and an account framed and filed in the Master's Office by him distributing the whole of the proceeds of the said property amongst the children of himself and the testatrix. The testator continued in possession of Augustfontein aforesaid and in the enjoyment of the usufruct thereof till his death. The testator at no time filed any inventory in the said estate. In neither of the aforesaid accounts did the testator award to himself any child's portion under the said will, nor did he therein bring up or notify any reservation of usufruct of any landed or other property in the estate. To each child was duly paid out his or her share brought up in the said accounts.

7. The farm Augustfontein was not disposed of by the testator, and still stands registered in his name.

8. In or about September, 1877, the testator married again, and his second wife, now his widow, to whom he was also married in community of property, and by whom he has had several children, nine of whom survive, four of them being minors, is the above first-named defendant. The defendants submit that they sufficiently represent the said minors for the purpose of this action, their interests not being in conflict with those of the first-named defendant.

9. On the 3rd March, 1906, the testator and his said second wife executed a mutual will, whereby it was provided inter alia that the survivor of them should have the right to remain in possession of their whole joint estate for life, and that after the death of the survivor the said estate should be distributed in equal shares among all the children of the second marriage, the children of the first marriage being especially excluded from participation therein.

10. The testator died in or about August, 1906, and thereafter the survivor took out letters of administration in his estate, and assumed the second-named defendant to act as co-executor. The plaintiff was on the 21st of December, 1906, appointed executor-dative of the testatrix at the instance of the heirs in the said first joint estate.

11. There are certain debts due by the testator which there are practically no assets in his estate to meet, unless it be held that the said farm Augustfontein registered in the testator's name, or the half-share thereof, is liable for such debts. None of the said debts were due by the said first joint estate, and they were all incurred after the first will came into operation.

12. Among the said debts are included the cost of a certain application in 1906 to have the testator declared a lunatic, of another application (which never came into Court, owing to the testator's death) respecting the maintenance of himself and his family, also the costs of litigation incurred shortly before his being declared a lunatic in defending a certain claim advanced against him, and other debts, amounting in all to approximately £360.

13. The Divisional Council valuation of the said farm Augustfontein is £850.

The plaintiff contends: (a) That the said farm Augustfontein must be submitted to public auction, without reserve, amongst the heirs sprung from the first marriage. (b) That the said heirs sprung from the first marriage are alone entitled to share in the proceeds of the realisation of the said farm. (c) That the testator's half-share in the said farm is not liable for his said debts. (d) If it should be held by this Honourable Court that the testator's half-share in the said farm is liable for his said debts then: that the heirs sprung from the first marriage are entitled to claim on the testator's estate for the amount realised by the said share concurrently with other creditors.

The defendants contend: (e) That the said farm Augustfontein should not be submitted to public auction without a reserve price of not less than £500 being fixed. (f) That the heirs sprung from both the first and second marriages are entitled to participate in the auction of the said farm Augustfontein. (g) That the proceeds of the sale of the said farm, or (alternatively) the testator's half-share therein, is liable for and has to be charged with, his said debts, and the costs (as between attorney and client) of this litigation; and that the heirs sprung from the first marriage are not entitled to claim concurrently with the other creditors in respect of the testator's half-share. (h) That if this Honourable Court should find that there was adiation by the testator, the accounts heretofore filed by him in the estate as aforesaid have to be rectified, by awarding to his separate estate (represented by the defendants) the several "child's portions" not heretofore brought up or reckoned in the said accounts. (i) That in any event the costs of this litigation (as between attorney and client) should be paid out of the proceeds of the said sale.

Mr. Burton, K.C., for plaintiff. Mr. McGregor, K.C., for defendants.

Mr. Burton said that the matter in dispute could be regarded from two points of view, that of the children of the first marriage, and that of those of the second marriage. The children of the first marriage contended that the children of the second marriage had no claim to the proceeds of the farm Augustfontein, that was to say, that there was a massing of the estate after the first will so far as the landed property was concerned. The testator enjoyed benefits under the first will, and had, therefore, adiated and could not dispose of the farm in the second will. He had enjoyed the usufruct of the farm Augustfontein till his death, sold Matjesfontein and distributed half of the proceeds amongst the heirs of the testatrix without awarding himself a child's portion, but he kept the other farm Augustfontein all his life, and he would not have been entitled to do that but for the will. He took benefits, and that was the crucial test. If he did not mean to adiate he would have given up testatrix's half of Augustfontein.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is not because he acted under the will that he did not give up half of Augustfontein, but because he neglected his duty as executor.]

Mr. Burton submitted strongly that the enjoying of the proceeds of the farm Matjesfontein amounted to adiation. The question of adiation was a question of fact. His not taking a child's portion was probably due to an oversight. He deprived his children of their half of the farm Augustfontein till the time of his death.

De Villiers, C.J.: As to adiation, the Court is of opinion that there was no adiation on the part of the testator. It is admitted in this special case that the mutual will gave the survivor a child's portion in addition to his own half.

When the testator came to administer the estate and to furnish his accounts of distribution, he did not take that child's portion. He practically renounced his right, and paid out to the children the full shares which would have come to them if he had not got his child's portion at all. That, in itself, is a strong indication of non-adiation on his part. But then it is contended that there was one act on his part which did amount to adiation, that he remained in possession of one of the farms. I do not think that what he did is such a strong indication of adiation as his paying out the children would be an indication to the contrary. It is quite consistent with the facts stated that he may have remained in possession of the farm Augustfontein with the approval of all parties interested, and without any intention of acting under the provisions of the will. But then it is said there was this bequest of sheep and cattle for the sum of £100. Well, that bequest must be taken in connection with the other prelegacies which were made, viz., to the children. It was a conditional bequest, as he gave consideration for the amount—for the sheep and other things that were prelegated to him; and I do not consider the fact that he did pay that consideration ought to foreclose the defendants from now saying that there was no adiation on his part. The Court will declare that the heirs sprung from the first marriage are entitled to claim that the half-share of the testatrix in the farm Augustfontein shall be sold by public auction, the costs of this application to be paid by the plaintiff and the defendant in their respective capacities as part of the costs of administration.

HOWSE, REYNOLDS AND CO. V. TILBROOK.

Mr. Watermeyer moved, on behalf of applicants, for an order declaring certain shares and book debts executable to a judgment obtained by applicants against respondent. Petitioners stated that they were the legal holders of a promissory note for £400, made and signed by defendant, due on the 31st May last. On the 21st April last respondent issued a power of attorney authorising petitioners to sell certain 425 shares in the Prietka Diamond Syndicate and to apply the proceeds to the liquidation of the note. He, however, failed, and neglected to give transfer of the shares. Petitioners had taken judgment on the note against defendant and a writ of execution had been issued against the movable property, upon which a return of nulla bona had been made. Leave was asked to have the shares and certain outstanding book debts declared executable to the judgment, and the proceeds applied in satisfaction of the writ, and the balance, if any, to be handed over to defendant.

Masendorp, J.: I don't see how I can grant an order attaching the man's book debts. If they want to do that they must have him made insolvent. The shares will be declared executable, with costs, subject to production of affidavit of service.

ABRAHAMSON V. GUARDIAN INSURANCE CO., LTD.

This was an application upon notice to respondents to show cause why a commission de bene esse should not issue to take the evidence of Solomon Woolf Lorie, accountant, Johannesburg, in an action instituted by applicant against respondents, and why the case should not be removed from the cause list and postponed.

It appeared that the witness, while temporarily practising in Cape Town, had examined the applicant's books, and that it was desirable that his evidence should be procured for the trial. Applicant had carried on business as a general dealer at Brackenfeld Siding, division of Stellenbosch, and his property had been insured in the respondent company. A fire took place, and the applicant had brought an action for payment of £500 insurance. The company urged that it was of the utmost importance that the witness should give his evidence before the Judge who had to try the case.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. Upington was for respondents.

Dr. Greer said it would be very inconvenient for the witness to come down, and it would also add very much to the costs if he had to attend the court. The defence of the company was threefold: (1) That proper notice was not given; (2) that there was misrepresentation of the nature of the buildings; and (3) that the first account filed was inconsistent with the second.

Mr. Upington: We say it is a false and fraudulent claim. Counsel urged that in view of the special connection Mr. Lorie had had with the case it was imperative that he should give his testimony in court. Two claims were put in of an utterly divergent character. The expenses of a commission would be far greater than if the witness came and gave his evidence in the court. No objection was raised by respondents to the postponement of the case until next term.

Dr. Greer, in his reply, said that only one claim really had been made, viz., £500. Respondents had made a good many misleading statements.

Maasdorp, J.: The applicant in this case asks for a commission to take the evidence of a Mr. Lorie at Johannesburg. It is said that Mr. Lorie's evidence is very material for the purposes of the plaintiff's suit. Mr. Lorie is an accountant who was employed in this case to go through the plaintiff's books and make up the necessary statement of his affairs. It does not appear to me that there is any reason why, in the absence of Mr. Lorie, someone else should not be employed to take the same steps that Mr. Lorie has taken to qualify himself for giving evidence in the case. But it is said that some expense has already been incurred in the employment of Mr. Lorie in his capacity as accountant, and that this expense will have to be incurred again if another accountant is now employed. It seems to me that the costs of employing another accountant will not be anything like the costs of a commission to take the evidence of Mr. Lorie at Johannesburg. If there are any other reasons which make the evidence of Mr. Lorie specially material beyond his information as gained from the books, then it might be necessary for those purposes to have Mr. Lorie here. But there are no other circumstances mentioned, and it is, therefore, only a question now whether to obviate the costs mentioned by the applicant a commission should be appointed to take the evidence in Johannesburg. If the applicant is fully convinced that he cannot proceed without the evidence of Mr. Lorie, then steps must be taken to obtain the attendance of Mr. Lorie in court, but, upon the information that is now before the Court, it seems to me that the same evidence could be obtained by a cheaper course, and the application must be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

COTTON V. ARNOLD AND CO. { 1907.
Aug. 19th.
„ 31st.

Contract of sale—Cancellation of contract—Time of payment of price—Future delivery—Measure of damages.

Where no time of payment is fixed in a contract of sale, the parties are presumed to have intended that the price shall be paid on delivery.

Where under such a sale, the vendor has delivered part of the goods without insisting upon payment, he cannot afterwards rescind the sale on the ground of the purchaser's delay in payment of the price, unless such delay took place under circumstances evincing an intention on the purchaser's part to be no longer bound by the contract.

The measure of damages for the breach by the seller of a contract of sale of goods to be delivered in futuro is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the several periods of delivery, in the absence of evidence that the purchaser could have gone into the market and obtained another similar contract on such terms as would mitigate his loss.

This was an appeal from the High Court of Southern Rhodesia.

In the Court below the present appellant had sued the respondent for breach of contract.

The declaration was as follows:—

1. The plaintiff is a broker and general agent, carrying on business at Salisbury. The defendants carry on business in co-partnership as auctioneers at Salisbury.

2. On or about the 19th June, 1906, the defendants agreed to sell and deliver during the month of August, 1906, to the plaintiff, at Salisbury station, 250 bags of 203 lbs. each in weight of mealies at 13s. 9d. per bag. Subsequently it was agreed that the place of delivery should be altered from Salisbury station to the Surprise Mine siding.

3. The defendants delivered 238 bags and 861 lbs. under the said contract, leaving a balance of 11 bags and 117 lbs. which it was agreed they should make good in making deliveries under further contracts hereinafter referred to, but on or about the 7th September, 1906, and before the defendants had made good the said deficiency they refused to deliver any more mealies under the said or any other contracts.

4. The plaintiff was compelled to and did purchase 11 bags of mealies on the 19th October, 1906, in the market at the market price of 18s. per bag, and thus suffered a loss of £2 6s. 9d. through defendants' breach as aforesaid.

5. On or about the 19th June, 1906, the plaintiff and defendant entered into another contract whereby the defendants agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff at Salisbury station, 1,400 bags of 203 lbs. each in weight of mealies at 14s. per bag, 250 bags of the said amount to be delivered in July, 1906, 350 bags in August, 1906, 350 bags in September, 1906, 350 bags in October, 1906, and the remaining 100 bags in July and August, have delivered the same was 17s. per the place of delivery should be altered to Selukwe station.

6. The defendants delivered 1,156 bags and 177 lbs. under the said contract referred to in paragraph 5 hereof, but on or about the 7th September, 1906, the defendants repudiated the said contract and refused to deliver the balance of 243 bags and 26 lbs.

7. The market price of such mealies at the time when the defendants should have delivered the same was 17s. per bag, and in consequence of defendants' failure to deliver the said 243 bags, the plaintiff has suffered £36 9s. damages.

8. On or about the 13th July, 1906, the defendants agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff 750 bags of 203 lbs. each in weight of mealies at 14s. per bag, delivery to be made at the firm of Finnie and Finnie at Gwelo, 250 bags of the said amount to be delivered in August, 1906, 250 bags in September, 1906, and 250 bags in October, 1906.

9. The defendants delivered 506 bags and 131 lbs. under the said contract referred to in paragraph 8 hereof, but on or about the 7th September, 1906, the defendants repudiated the said contract and refused to deliver the balance of 243 bags, 72 lbs.

10. The market price of such mealies when the defendant should have delivered same was 18s. per bag, and the plaintiff was compelled to and did purchase 243 bags of mealies of a like kind, weight and quality at the said price of 18s. per bag, and has suffered a loss of £48 12s. through the defendants' breach aforesaid of the said contract referred to in paragraph 8 hereof.

11. On or about the 13th July, 1906, the plaintiff and defendants entered into another contract whereby the defendants agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff at the Giant Mine Gadzema, 1,500 bags of 203 lbs. each in weight of mealies at 14s. per bag, 500 bags of the said amount to be delivered in August, 1906, 500 bags in September, 1906, and 500 bags in October, 1906.

12. The defendants delivered 522 bags and 81 lbs. under the said contract referred to in paragraph 11 hereof, but on or about the said 7th September, 1906, the defendants repudiated the said contract and refused to deliver the balance of 977 bags, 195 lbs.

13. The market price of such mealies when defendants should have delivered same was 17s. and 17s. 6d. per bag, and the plaintiff was compelled to and did purchase 500 bags of mealies of a like kind, weight and quality in the market at 17s. per bag, and 478 bags at 17s. 6d. per bag, and has suffered a loss of £158 13s. through defendants' breach as aforesaid of the said contract referred to in paragraph 11 hereof.

14. On or about the 8th August, 1906, the defendants agreed to sell and deliver between the end of August, 1906, and the end of November, 1906, to the plaintiff at Salisbury 2,000 bags of 183 lbs. each in weight of mealie meal at the price of 15s. 10d. per bag.

15. It was subsequently agreed on or about 17th August, 1906, that the defendants should sell and deliver before the end of October, 1906, to the plaintiff 500 bags of 203 lbs. each in weight of mealies at 15s. per bag instead of 500 bags of the said mealie meal.

16. The defendants delivered 950 bags of mealie meal before the end of August, 1906, under the said contract referred to in paragraph 14 hereof, but on or about the said 7th September, 1906, the defendants repudiated the said contract and refused to deliver the balance of 550 bags of mealie meal.

17. The market price of such mealie meal when defendants should have delivered same was 18s. 11d. per bag, and the plaintiff was compelled to and did purchase 550 bags of mealie meal of a like kind, weight and quality in the market at the said price of 18s. 11d. and has suffered a loss of £84 15s. 10d. through defendants' breach aforesaid of the contract referred to in paragraph 14 hereof.

18. The defendants failed to deliver the said 500 bags of mealies or any part thereof under the contract referred to in paragraph 15 hereof, and on or about 7th September, 1906, the defendants repudiated the said contract and refused to deliver the said mealies.

19. The market price of such mealies when the defendants should have delivered the same was 17s. per bag, and the plaintiff was compelled to and did purchase 500 bags of mealies of a like kind, weight and quality at the said price of 17s. and has suffered a loss of £50 through the defendants' breach as aforesaid of the said contract referred to in paragraph 15 hereof.

20. The plaintiff duly accepted and paid for all the mealies and mealie meal the defendants delivered under the said contracts in accordance with the same and performed all his parts of the said contract and was always ready and willing to accept and pay for all the said mealies and mealie meal to be delivered by defendants under the said contracts, and to continue to perform all his obligations thereunder, but the defendants in breach of the said contracts refused to continue to perform the same and all things have happened all times have elapsed and all conditions have been fulfilled entitling plaintiff to bring this action.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims:

1. £2 6s. 9d. damages as set out in paragraph 4 hereof.
2. £36 9s. 0d. damages as set out in paragraph 7 hereof.
3. £48 12s. 0d. damages as set out in paragraph 10 hereof.

5. £84 15s. 10d. damages as set out in paragraph 13 hereof.

6. £50 damages as set out in paragraph 19 hereof.

4. £84 15s. 10d. damages as set out in paragraph 17 hereof.

7. Interest a tempore moræ.

8. General relief.

9. Costs of suit.

To this declaration the defendants plead as follows:—

1. They admit the allegations in paragraph 1, and they say they are also commission agents and general dealers.

2. In regard to paragraph 2, the defendants admit the sale at the price therein stated. They say that the agreement of sale was reduced to writing in the form of a broker's note. The sale was for cash to be paid "f.o.r." Salisbury station, that is on delivery of the mealies on to the trucks of the railway at Salisbury at the defendants' cost. They deny that this contract was in any way departed from or varied. The mealies delivered under this contract was consigned to the Surprise Mine siding purely for the convenience of the plaintiff, and in no way altered his liability to pay cash on delivery at Salisbury Station.

3. As to paragraph 3 the defendants delivered 239 bags and 86 lbs. of mealies in terms of the above contract, and it was agreed that the balance should be delivered when the plaintiff asked for them. Prior to the 7th September, 1906, the plaintiff had no instructions in regard thereto and having failed to pay cash for so much as was already delivered the defendants on that date refused to be held further bound by the said contract.

4. As to paragraph 4, the defendants say the market price of mealies for cash at that date was 15s. 6d. per bag. They have no knowledge of the other allegations in that paragraph.

5. The defendants admit the agreement set out in paragraph 5, which they say was also in writing in the form of a broker's note. The terms of payment were cash on delivery at Salisbury station. They deny that the place of delivery was ever altered, and say that the mealies supplied under this contract were consigned to Selukwe purely for the convenience of the plaintiff, and that he remained liable to pay cash on delivery at Salisbury station.

6. The defendants delivered in all 1,180 bags and 160 lbs. under this contract; they admit they refused to deliver the balance.

7. As to paragraph 7, they say the market price was 15s. 6d. per bag for cash. They have no knowledge of the other allegations in that paragraph.

8. As to paragraph 8, they admit they sold 750 bags of mealies as therein mentioned and that the same were to be consigned to Finnie and Finnie at Gwelo, but they say this agreement was also in writing and that the place of legal delivery was Salisbury station, and that it was a term of the agreement that cash should be paid on delivery at the said station.

9. They admit the allegations in paragraph 9, and say that on delivery at Salisbury station the plaintiff refused to pay cash as was agreed upon.

10. As to paragraph 10, they say the market price for cash at that date was 15s. 6d. per bag. They have no knowledge of the other allegations in that paragraph.

11. They admit the allegations in paragraph 11, save the statement that delivery was to be made at Gadzema, but say that agreement was also in writing in the form of a broker's note and was part of the agreement set out in paragraph 9 of the declaration and subject to the same terms, and payment was to be made on delivery at Salisbury station.

12. They admit paragraph 12, and say they duly delivered the mealies therein stated at Salisbury station consigned to Gadzema, but the plaintiff refused and failed to pay cash for the same on such delivery.

13. As to paragraph 13, they say the market price was 15s. 6d. per bag for cash. They have no knowledge of the other allegations in this paragraph.

14. They admit the allegations in paragraph 14, and say the said sale was in writing and for cash.

15. They admit the allegations in paragraph 15 save that the date of delivery was November and not October. This agreement was also in writing and payment was to be made of cash on delivery at Salisbury station.

16. They admit the allegations in paragraphs 16 and 18.

17. As to paragraphs 17 and 19, they say the price of mealie meal was 17s. cash and of mealies 15s. 6d. cash, but otherwise they have no knowledge of the facts set out in those two paragraphs.

18. They deny the allegations in paragraph 20 save the allegation that the goods delivered were duly accepted, and they refused to continue to perform the said contracts.

19. The defendants say that in all the above agreements it was stipulated and agreed that cash should be paid for each amount delivered at the stated place, viz., Salisbury railway station, and it was essential to the due and proper fulfilment of such contracts that payment should be made as stipulated, yet the plaintiff in breach of his agreement never save once made payment of cash against delivery and only from time to time after they became due made smaller payments on account.

20. The defendants on numerous occasions informed the plaintiff that payments had not been made as agreed upon, and on the 10th August, 1906, they informed the plaintiff that they refused to deliver further supplies unless due payment was made.

21. Nevertheless the defendants continued to deliver, and on September 7th, 1906, the plaintiff owed the defendants the sum of £966 9s. 1d., being arrear amounts for goods delivered.

22. The defendants were so hampered and jeopardised in their business by the aforesaid non-payment that it was impossible for them to continue the contracts, and the statements made them by, and the conduct of the plaintiff showed the defendants that he had no intention and was incapable of fulfilling his contracts on their original terms. Thereupon the defendants rightly and legally gave notice on the 7th day of September, 1906, that they declined to be held bound by, and fulfil, the contracts any further.

23. Summons was subsequently issued by the defendants against the plaintiff, and the said amount was paid in full on the 19th day of September, 1906.

Wherefore the defendants pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

To this plea the plaintiff makes replication, and says:—

1. That in all the contracts referred to in the declaration after the same had been entered into as therein alleged the plaintiff in his usual course of business handed to the defendants broker's notes containing a note or memorandum of the particular contract or contracts.

2. Subsequently the places of delivery stated in such notes was altered at the request of the defendants and for their benefit and convenience to the places mentioned in the declaration, and the defendants undertook and agreed to deliver the said grain and meal at such places.

The plaintiff denies that he agreed or was liable to pay for the said grain or meal as alleged by the defendants or until after the same had been delivered as aforesaid.

3. The plaintiff from time to time duly paid the defendants the amounts accruing due in connection with the said contracts when the defendants had delivered the said grain or meal as agreed and the plaintiff denies that there has been any undue delay in making such payments or any breach by him of any of the said contracts entitling the defendants to repudiate and break the same as they did or any breach at all by the plaintiff of any of the said contracts.

4. And further, with regard to the allegations in paragraphs 20, 21, 22, 23 of the said pleas the plaintiff denies each and every allegation in paragraph 20 and 22, except the breach and repudiation by the defendants of the said contracts on the 7th September, 1906, mentioned in paragraph 22. The plaintiff says that no dispute occurred between the defendants and himself until the month of September, 1906, when a dispute arose as to the quality and condition of certain mealies which the defendants had delivered at Selukwe and the plaintiff claimed from the defendants a reduction in the price of such mealies on account of their unsound condition.

5. Subsequently on or about the 6th of the said month the defendants requested payment of a sum of £823 15s. 4d., and the plaintiff thereupon informed the defendants that his books and accounts did not show that amount to be due but that he was ready and willing to pay them whatever amount was due to them as soon as they should furnish him with proper invoices and details showing the amount due.

6. On the 7th September, 1906 the defendants sent the plaintiff a letter of demand for the sum of £966 9s. 1d. The plaintiff thereupon sent the defendants a cheque for £748 for the amounts due to them not in dispute, and again informed the defendants that he was ready and willing to pay them whatever further amount was due to them as soon as such amounts were ascertained to be correct and to pay them all further moneys accruing due to them from time to time under the said contracts as soon as the same became due. The defendants returned the said cheque and repudiated as aforesaid the said contracts.

7. On or about the 10th September, 1906, the plaintiff paid the defendant a sum of £806 6s. 5d. the amount then ascertained to be due, and again informed them that he was ready and willing to pay them whatever further amounts were due to them as soon as the same were ascertained and became due.

Notwithstanding the said payment the defendants on or about the 12th September, 1906, caused the said summons to be issued for the sum of £966 9s. 1d., which the plaintiff denies was the correct amount due to the defendants at that date.

9. On the same day, viz., the 12th September, 1906, a further amount of £58 17s. 6d. having accrued due to the defendants under the said contracts the plaintiff paid the same, and on the 17th September, 1906, a further amount of £81 15s. 11d. having been ascertained by the plaintiff as being due to the defendants the same was paid by the plaintiff, together with the sum of £17 12s. 6d. the amount in dispute in connection with the unsound mealies referred to in paragraph 4 hereof.

10. Save as aforesaid and except as to admissions by defendants in their pleas the plaintiff denies the allegations of fact and conclusions of law therein contained and again prays judgment in terms of his declaration.

The defendants made rejoinder and said that:—

1. They admit the allegation in paragraph 1 thereof and deny those in paragraphs 2 and 3.

2. As to paragraph 4 they admit that the dispute therein set out did take place, but otherwise refer to the allegations already made in their plea.

3. As to paragraphs 5 and 6 the defendants say that when the demand for £823 15s. 4d. was made the defendants did not include the value of the lot of mealies consigned to Selukwe station which are those referred to in the aforementioned dispute. The plaintiff alleged these mealies were unsound and the defendants offered to take them back, this offer plaintiff did not accept, whereupon defendants included their value, to wit £142 4s. 9d. in all subsequent demands, together with a sum of 9s. previously omitted. The defendants deny the other allegations in paragraph 6.

4. As to paragraph 7 the defendants admit the said payment and say the total indebtedness was then ascertained and due and there was no need of any further inquiry.

5. The defendants deny paragraph 8 and crave leave to refer to the summons when produced for the full terms thereof.

6. As to paragraph 9 the defendants admit the payment of £58 17s. 6d. as therein set out but say the sums of £81 15s. 11d. and £17 2s. 6d. were not paid until the 19th day of September, these amounts being ascertained and due when and before the first demand was made for them.

7. Save as above and save as to the admissions contained the defendants say they deny all and singular the allegations in the replication contained.

The judgment in the Court below was as follows:—

Plaintiff sues for damages for the alleged breach of what he calls six separate contracts, but I think there is much force in the Attorney-General's contention that this was one consecutive series of acts looked at always as one contract. I shall consider the distinction later on, but for the present I shall treat the transaction between the parties as one continuous whole.

Defendants admit that they contracted to sell and deliver to plaintiff certain mealies and mealie meal, but they join issue with him as to what were the exact terms of the contract, and they go on to say that plaintiff's action in the course of their dealings was such a gross violation of the terms of the contract as justified them in withdrawing from it.

Defendants' contention on the pleadings is that the contract is contained in five brokers' notes, and the Attorney-General objected to any evidence to vary these notes.

The plaintiff contends that these notes do not constitute the whole contract, but must be read subject to certain subsequent verbal agreements.

The first note is quite plain. It is for the sale of 250 bags of mealies delivered at Salisbury Station f.o.r.

These terms the plaintiff certainly did not observe.

The second note is for the sale of 1,400 bags of mealies, but no place of delivery is mentioned. I agree with the Attorney-General that without further evidence the proper interpretation of this note is delivery at Salisbury and prompt cash payment. The last term the plaintiff did not observe.

The third note which it is contended contained separate contracts contains the words "250 bags nett Salisbury station, consign to Finnie and Finnie, Gwelo," and "500 bags monthly, consign to Giant Mine, Gadzema."

For plaintiff it is contended that the words "consign to" imply a contract to deliver at the places named and to await payment until such delivery.

I am inclined to the Attorney-General's contention that without extrinsic evidence the true construction of this note is that legal delivery was to be made at Salisbury station, and payment made on such delivery. But whatever be the true construction, I find from the evidence that plaintiff was in default in payment in either case.

The fourth note was for 2,000 bags of mealie meal and is unambiguous—delivery was to be at Salisbury, and payment should have been cash on delivery. On this note the plaintiff was to a small extent in default. For 500 bags he paid promptly on delivery; 300 bags were delivered but not paid for promptly, but the payment for this was only a few days due when the contract was repudiated.

The fifth note is only a variation of the fourth, substituting mealies for a portion of the mealie meal.

This Mr Russell strongly urged was a separate and distinct contract, that in this the plaintiff could not be in default as the time for execution had not arrived, and that with regard to this contract at all events the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. I shall deal with that contention later on.

I wish now to deal with the plaintiff's version of the contract as set forth in his pleadings. He contends in effect that the contract in each case was the broker's note plus certain verbal agreements.

In brief his version is that defendants agreed to deliver the mealies and mealie meal at certain railway stations to be named by him, he to be responsible for railage from Salisbury to such other stations, and that payment was to be made when he (plaintiff) received advice that such mealies and mealie meal had been duly accepted by his clients at such places of consignment.

This version is absolutely denied by the defendants, and it lies on plaintiff to prove this version if he wishes to succeed. For whatever was in his own mind, unless he can prove that defendants agreed to this deferred payment he has proved no consensus ad idem, and therefore has no contract to sue on.

In order to ascertain if defendants did agree to this it is necessary to go at some length into the history of the dealings between the parties, for in order to judge the intention of the parties at the time of entering into the contract we must not only take what they now say, but test it by their actions right through.

Defendants admit that they agreed to consign the mealies and mealie meal to such places as the plaintiff required them, but alleged that this was an entirely separate agreement for the mutual advantage of both parties, and in no way varied the agreement that cash was to be paid on delivery at Salisbury railway station. Both defendants repeatedly emphasise their view that this was to be a "spot cash" transaction f.o.r. Salisbury station.

The negotiations for the transactions now in dispute commenced on June 18th. There had been other transactions between the parties, but they do not affect this case. The plaintiff is a broker, but in this case he acted as principal. He had sold in advance large quantities of grain to various clients, chiefly mining companies, and he came to defendants to buy in order to complete his own contracts.

The next day, June 19th, the broker's notes Nos. 1 and 2, already referred to, were passed.

It is admitted that at the same time it was further agreed that defendants should consign the grain covered by these notes right through from places where they bought on the Umtali line to the stations where Cotton wished to deliver to his clients.

Each side alleges that this additional agreement was made at the request of the other. I don't think it matters at whose request it was made—it was obviously for the advantage of both parties. Defendants saved 3d. per bag on railway charges—plaintiff was saved the trouble of re-consignment at Salisbury station.

This agreement was verbal and as is not unusual in verbal agreements there is a dispute as to what took place.

Plaintiff states that he told Messrs. Arnold and Co. that he would pay on advice that the goods had reached the place of consignment, and that he must have a reasonable time to pay.

Both Mr. Arnold and Mr. Bernstein say that nothing of the sort took place. They both insist that they plainly told Cotton that this arrangement for consigning through was not in any way to affect the date of payment, that the transaction was to be "spot cash," and payment to be made as the goods passed through Salisbury station. They say Cotton gave them to understand that he was a big buyer with unlimited cash at his disposal; he talked of buying many thousands of bags, and forced them down to bed rock prices by threatening to go behind them and buy direct from their suppliers—that they could not afford to sell at these prices except for "spot cash" that he laughed at their fears about not getting cash, and said that he had always plenty of money at the bank, and that they could have it whenever they wanted it; that on those representations they agreed to consign through.

In the middle of July defendants commenced to deliver—the first invoice for £98 17s. 7d. was presented on July 14th; the mealies covered by this invoice left Salisbury station on July 15th and reached Selukwe on the 18th. This was paid in full by Mr. Cotton's clerk on the 19th. I gather from Mr. Pollard's evidence that this was not paid in consequence of advice from Selukwe—that he did not receive until the 27th, but that he paid it is a sort of advance to assist defendants.

On July 19th and 21st invoices for £176 2s. 1d. and £66 11s. 6d. were presented. No definite cheques for these specific amounts were ever paid, but on July 21st Mr. Cotton's clerk paid £125, as he says that was all that it was convenient to pay at the time.

With regard to this cheque, Mr. Arnold states that he had great difficulty in getting it out of Pollard; that Cotton had promised him the money would be paid; that Pollard said a cheque for more would not be honoured by the bank, and he was compelled to accept what he could get. It will be noted that up to this point the action of the parties are consistent with Arnold and Co.'s contention that money was to be paid on delivery of invoices. We have not yet heard the contention put forward later that plaintiff was not to pay till he had received advice from the mine—Pollard merely says he has not the money to pay, and Cotton was out of town.

Consignments continued to go through, and invoices were sent on July 27th and 30th. With regard to the latter, it is alleged that Cotton never received it. On the evidence I think it probable that this invoice, as also one for August 11th, was not seen by Cotton though sent by defendants. I think it must have been somehow mis-laid in Cotton's office. But I cannot acquit Cotton of blame in the matter. In his letter to Selukwe G.M. Co., September 8th, he says he considers these mealie deals to have been done in a most unbusinesslike manner, and to a certain extent I agree with his words, though not in the sense in which he meant them to be understood.

If instead of paying vague amounts from time to time on account he had—as I consider it was his duty to do—paid specific cheques against specific consignments, the absence of these invoices would at once have been detected. However, defendants have not made this a cause of quarrel, and have been prepared to base their case on the supposition that these invoices reached Cotton on September 7th, instead of on the due dates. The amounts were not sufficiently large to alter the principle for which they are contending.

No further payments were made until a cheque for £150 was paid on account on August 8th.

There is a serious disagreement as to the circumstances under which this cheque was paid. Cotton says that Bernstein came and asked for money—his memory is rather weak as to whether he dealt with Arnold or Bernstein, and as to whether conversations were direct or over the telephone—as a matter of fact Bernstein was away at the time. Cotton says that by his books at that date he owed defendants about £50, but it appears that he did not credit defendants until he received advice from his mines or I am inclined to think from some later evidence, until he actually received payment from his mines. According to invoices delivered, he owed defendants at that date over £200. He states that he offered Bernstein or Arnold, or whoever it was, £50. More was asked for. He was overdrawn at the bank. But on defendants' assurance that a certain consignment of Finnie and Finnie, Gwelo, had gone forward, he gave the cheque for £150, on defendants' promise to send the rail note, as he had an arrangement with the bank, and Finnie and Finnie, that on production of the rail note he could draw against consignments forwarded to the latter—that the note was not sent, and he compelled defendants to hand over the cheque. This is, to a certain extent, corroborated by Pollard. Arnold, for he was the partner who interviewed Cotton on this occasion, gives a different version. He states that on August 7th he by telephone demanded money—that Cotton said he would come and see him—that later Cotton came to his office and talked about taking up further options—that he, Arnold, suggested first paying for what he had received—that Cotton promised a cheque the next day—that the next day, August 8th, he, Arnold, went to Cotton's office about 11 a.m. to ask for the cheque—that Cotton offered £50—that he, Arnold, pointed out that over £200 was due. Cotton said: "You are in a great hurry for your money," and he mentioned certain mines that owed him money. I, Arnold, said I had nothing to do with his mines, and wanted his cheque. I said, "You will get no more grain unless you pay up." Then Cotton gave the cheque for £150, but subsequently telephoned to have it held over. Arnold held it over till the 10th, when it was paid. He states he was compelled to hold it over as he was told it would not be paid. Arnold denies absolutely that there was any talk about drawing against Finnie and Finnie's rail note. The consignment for Finnie and Finnie did not go through until August 11th, therefore on August 8th there was no rail note to draw against, and it was impossible for a business man like Arnold to have promised to deliver it that day. The invoice for this consignment was delivered to Cotton on August 11th or 12th. Arnold's story seems to me the more credible one.

On August 11th Bernstein returned from Johannesburg. On the Monday morning, the 13th, he asked by telephone for the money—he got none, but was promised a cheque next day. Consignments continued to go forward, and Messrs. Arnold and Bernstein say that in each case they asked for money. They say that their practice was to send over the invoice, and later in the day to telephone for a cheque. No further payments were made until August 22nd, when a cheque for £200 was handed to defendants' clerk, Lover, who had been sent to ask for the money. Bernstein states he, Cotton, was promising us cheques from day to day.

About this date 500 bags of mealie meal were delivered at plaintiff's request to Wightman and Co. These were promptly paid for by cheque on August 23rd, and a small cheque for railage was also paid that day. A good deal of grain and meal was now going forward.

On August 24th an important conversation took place; I shall take the evidence of it from my note book:—

Cotton:—"Later in the month Bernstein came and asked me for money, but he did not press me. On the 23rd Bernstein may have asked for the money. On the 24th I paid two cheques. £150 each. I paid £150 in the morning, and then I received advice from the Giant Mine that they had received 487 bags, for which I owed £322. I then sent him another cheque for £150. The first £150 was an advance."

And later on:

"August 23rd, I told Bernstein that he owed us money."

Pollard:—"August 23rd—Arnold and Co. asked for money. I think by telephone. I said to Arnold, we didn't owe them money. Two cheques on August 24th. . . . between times of sending them the mail arrived, and we got advice of further delivery of grain at Giant Mine."

Bernstein:—"Returned from Johannesburg August 11th—found money was owing by Cotton—on morning of August 13th I telephoned over—can't say who answered—we didn't get any money. A cheque was promised next day. A week or so later I went over. About that date our heavy dealings began. I went over to Cotton and asked for cheque—could not get one—he promised one the next day. On morning of 24th he telephoned that he had received money—he asked me to send for cheque—he sent me cheque for £150—he had given Arnold £200 on the 22nd, and he had paid for Wightman's mealie meal £395, and for railage £36. On 23rd there was still a large amount owing. £495 5s. 11d. was due to us, omitting two invoices said to be lost. Immediately I received cheque I rang up Cotton and asked what he meant by sending such a sum when he knew that a much larger amount was due. And I threatened then to stop supplies unless more money was sent. He asked me to send over for another £150. I sent over and got it."

And in cross-examination:

"August 24th, before Cotton sent me the first cheque he telephoned that he had received over £300 from Giant Mine. I sent my own messenger for the first cheque."

By that morning's mail Cotton had received not merely advice of delivery at Gadzema, but the actual cheque from the Giant Mine sent in reply to an urgent wire of his on August 22nd.

Cotton and Pollard say that Messrs. Arnold and Co. never demanded or pressed for money though they asked for it. I do not know what meaning Messrs. Cotton and Pollard attach to these words, but my impression of the evidence is that Arnold and Co. were most persistent duns.

After the 24th still more consignments went through, but nothing was paid except a cheque for £50 on account on August 30th, wrongly dated August 12th.

Plaintiff states that up to this point the relations between the parties had been perfectly amicable, except for the dispute on August 8th re Finnie's rail note, which I have already referred to, and a complaint about the non-forwarding of a certificate of origin with certain mealies, consigned to Selukwe. (I do not know if he considered Messrs. Arnold and Co.'s persistent dunning, which I referred to above, as quite amicable.)

The matter of the certificate was this:—It had been agreed that in order to obtain the cheaper rail rate South African grown mealies only should be supplied. On August 1st the Selukwe G.M. Co. wrote that the requisite certificates of origin had not been sent with a certain consignment. Bernstein says the Selukwe people might well have taken them, and subsequently obtained a refund from the railway, and Arnold remarked that as the mealies came from Rusape they might well have been accepted as South African, however the matter was set right before the final breach between the parties, and although Cotton in a letter to Selukwe G.M. Co. on September 8th says that Arnold and Co. have made these mealies a cause for breaking their contracts there is no evidence to support it. Arnold and Co. never by any evidence before me made this question a pretext for breaking their contract. Their reason for refusing supplies has been plainly given and always adhered to, viz.: the neglect or refusal of Cotton to pay promptly on delivery of invoices.

I understood Mr. Cotton to contend in Court that the final rupture between the parties was due to certain alleged unsound mealies, delivered to the Selukwe G.M. Co. early in September.

On September 4th Cotton intimated to defendants that he had received advice that Selukwe G.M. Co. refused to accept certain mealies alleging they were unsound. Several letters on this subject passed between the parties between September 4th and September 7th. Cotton alleges that this dispute was the reason why defendants repudiated the contract and refused to deliver any more grain. Bernstein denies absolutely that this had anything to do with their refusal to deliver any more, and gives evidence as follows:—

"He said he couldn't pay because he hadn't got it. He puts us off from day to day. We continued to supply till August 29th. I called up Cotton and asked for money. He said he had no money—had received money from his mine. I told him we had nothing to do with his mine, and if he did not pay up at once we should refuse to deliver any more grain. I said we wanted the money and must have it. He replied, 'You will have to wait.' I replied that unless he did pay we should refuse to deliver any more grain. Then he said, 'Do you really mean you won't deliver any more grain.' I replied, 'Not unless you pay up at once.' This was at end of August or beginning of September. We had not then heard that Selukwe mealies were unsound. We refused to deliver any more."

This dispute regarding the Selukwe mealies was considering the dealings between the parties not a matter of great importance.

350 bags of mealies consigned to Selukwe station were reported as unsound. Cotton asked defendants to either consent to a reduction of 1s. per bag or to take back the mealies, supply others, and pay for cartage to and fro between the station and the mine. Defendants replied that they were quite willing to accept re-delivery at Selukwe station, but objected to pay the cartage as their point of delivery was the railway station. The mealies had not as a fact been removed from the station, but Cotton was under a misapprehension on this point. Cotton accepted the reduction of 1s. per bag from the mine. The defendants held him bound to his original price. The amount in dispute was therefore about £17 10s., as Mr. Cotton's attorney subsequently remarks, "Not worth the cost of a High Court action," and it is alleged that for this dispute the defendants repudiated the contract.

Whilst this dispute was proceeding, and before it had reached an acrimonious stage, defendants wrote a letter as follows:—

"We hereby request an immediate settlement of the enclosed account due for grain delivered. Our arrangement being for cash against delivery from time to time cheque per bearer will oblige."

In the account annexed to this letter the 350 bags then in dispute were not included. The account is dated September 4th, but the covering letter is dated September 6th, which it is admitted was the date on which it was sent and received. Mr. Lover took over this letter but returned without a cheque.

The next day defendants having heard that Cotton had sold the unsound mealies at reduced price, write:—"As you have seen fit to sell them we hold you responsible for the full amount. We now enclose further account including the 350 bags above referred to, totalling £966 8s. 0d., and must ask you to settle same forthwith, failing which we shall place the matter in the hands of our solicitors."

The correspondence is then continued by the attorneys on each side. Vigne and Honey on behalf of Arnold and Co., write a letter of demand. Mr. Nicholls, for Cotton, makes some proposal, but as it is said to be made "without prejudice," I can take no notice of it. Vigne and Honey reply: "Our clients stand by our letter to Mr. Cotton, and summons will now be issued." Mr. Nicholls replies on September 10th "enclosing cheque for £806 6s. 5d." This cheque had originally been dated September 8th, and made out for £748 4s. 8d., and in this form had been refused. It was now sent with the date and amount altered. This letter contained some important passages as showing the state of mind of the parties. With regard to one item Mr. Nicholls writes:—

"This debit my client cannot yet accept as he only received invoice for same on 7th instant, and has only now invoiced it out himself." This refers to one of the invoices said not to have been received on due date. With regard to another item the letter states: "This my client cannot yet accept as a debit as the Surprise write him under date the 6th instant, that this consignment has not yet arrived." At close of the letter "my client further instructs me to say, the arrangements concluded are set out in the brokers note." Vigne and Honey accept the £806 6s. 5d. on account, and repeat that the contract was for cash against delivery from time to time, and allege that amounts are long overdue. A further cheque for £58 17s. 6d. is sent for amount of delayed invoice less railage, and a further letter from Mr. Nicholls states, "My client has never sought to evade any of his liabilities, but naturally objects to meet them before they become due. Further cheques will be paid as they fall due." On September 17th Mr. Nicholls sent cheque for £99 8s. 5d., waiving the dispute for £17 odd for damaged mealies at Selukwe. This liquidated Arnold and Co.'s demand.

The above summarises the history of the case as given by each side. Messrs. Arnold and Bernstein were minutely cross-examined, their letter books ransacked, their dealings with other people gone into, and every attempt made to find a flaw in their evidence, but they explained every point to my perfect satisfaction.

On the evidence, therefore, I cannot find that defendants entered into any such contract as is alleged by plaintiff in his pleadings. On the contrary, I am satisfied that defendants agreed to sell and deliver solely on condition that payment was to be "spot cash" on certificate that the grain had passed through Salisbury station. I cannot know what was actually in Mr. Cotton's mind, but the evidence seems to lead to the conclusion that he also at first accepted that view of the contract, as witness payment of the first invoice before receipt of any advice from Selukwe (I reject altogether the statement about advances for mutual assistance). It seems that it was only because he had not the money that he failed to pay promptly, and put off defendants until he could get money from his buyers. Compare the prompt payment for mealie meal delivered to Wightman and Co. in this town, for which he was probably paid promptly with the delay in connection with consignments to distant places, and in particular the payment made on August 24th. I do not think Mr. Cotton was quite candid on this point. He stated in Court that on the morning of the 24th he received advice by mail that certain grain for the Giant Mine had been delivered at Gadzema station. The facts are that on August 22nd Cotton sent an urgent wire to the Giant for a cheque, and the same day—August 22nd—the secretary of the Giant Mine posted him a cheque for £377, and it was therefore the actual cash and not advice of delivery that Mr. Cotton received by mail on the 24th, and even then he did not pay in full. Mr. Cotton says he could have paid Arnold and Co. at any time—that he could have drawn on his clients—that the mines would have financed him. This is hardly consistent with his correspondence—see wires to Giant August 22nd, to Strathmore Selukwe, and Surfeit Selukwe of September 4th, they are urgent demands for cheques. His letter to Finnie and Co. of September 8th says that the bank refuses to discount any more bills on them, and they must make arrangement so that he can pay his suppliers. In his letter to Selukwe G.M. Co. of September 8th he says they could have got delivery "and so have paid for them, in which case I could have paid Arnold." Evidence is given that he had an arrangement with Wightman and Co., who would have been prepared to finance him at a price. He did not make any use of this arrangement. I can only presume that he did not wish to pay the price demanded, and preferred to keep defendants waiting for their money.

In my opinion, therefore, plaintiff has failed utterly to prove the contract set up in his pleadings, and I think that alone entitles defendants to absolution from the instance.

But Mr. Russell has argued in effect that there was some contract, and whatever the contract was the defendants broke it by stopping delivery. I doubt whether he is entitled to set up one contract in his pleadings, and then when an entirely different contract is proved to turn round and say, "Well, if you didn't break the contract I allege you broke the one that has been proved." That was in effect his argument when he said, "Even on defendants' own version of the contract they had no right to stop delivery."

But as he has urged this I shall say at once that in my opinion upon the facts I find proved defendants had every right to stop further delivery.

Mr. Russell relied on the Cape case of Attwell v. Logan (3 J., 107) and Mercy Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benson and Co. (L. R. 9 App. Cases, 434), and upon an unreported judgment by myself in 1896 in the case of Wiltoughby's Consolidated v. Culverwell and Matthysen.

I quite agree with him that if defendants had been sued on the contract that I find proved for failure to deliver it might not have been sufficient for them to set up one or perhaps even two or more delays in payment by Cotton. But I think the rule governing these cases is best laid down by Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Freeth v. Burr (L.R. 9 Com. Pleas, p. 208) where, at page 213 of the report, he says: "The true question is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract."

I am satisfied that the acts and conduct of Mr. Cotton, especially his refusal to pay promptly, which I find to have been of the essence of the contract, evinced an intention to be no longer bound by the contract as understood by defendants, and as I find proved to have been agreed to, and that entitled defendants to repudiate the contract on their part and to stop further delivery.

As to the small question of the 500 bags of mealies which Mr. Russell urged was a separate contract, I am of opinion that it was part of the whole transaction and must fall with the rest. But if it can possibly be said to be a distinct contract separable from the others, then I say that here also Mr. Cotton by his acts and conduct had practically told defendants that he did not intend to pay promptly, and, therefore, they were entitled to refuse to deliver.

In my opinion, taking the case from any point of view, defendants are entitled to absolution.

JUDGMENT:—Absolution from the instance, with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin, K.C.), for appellant. Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Louwrens) for respondents.

Mr. Schreiner said that on the first three contracts the evidence was that certain portions of the mealies were delivered, but on none was the whole amount delivered. The parties differed as to the point when payment was legally due, but that point was not determined in any of the contracts. There was no such phrase as "spot cash" Salisbury or statement as to when payment was to have been made.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose the rule would be where the contract was silent that payment should take place on delivery?]

But in that case payment is not so much of the essence of the contract as to make payment for one parcel a condition precedent before delivery of the other parcels. Defendants' remedies would be to sue for payment. He referred to Attwell v. Logan (3 J., 107) and Hiddings v. Shade (16 S.C., 128).

[De Villiers, C.J., referred to the case of Sadie v. Standard Bank.]

Mr. Schreiner said that in Sadie's case the decision went upon the ground that the man never intended to part with his property. The goods in this case passed through Salisbury in sealed trucks, and no investigation could take place at Salisbury. He referred to the case of Greenhiels v. Chisholm (3 J., 220), which was not cited in the Court below, and where the contract was very much like the one in question. Counsel then proceeded to discuss the evidence given before the Court below, and was asked by the Court to confine himself to the documentary evidence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you contend that plaintiff was not bound to pay till the goods arrived at their destination?]

Mr. Schreiner replied in the affirmative. The learned judge seemed to have taken f.o.r. to include payment as soon as the goods were on rail. There was nothing in the contract to say that payment had to be made immediately the goods were on board at Salisbury. He referred to the Mersey case (L.R. 9, A.C. 434, and 51 L.T., 637), Freeth v. Burr (L.R.G.C.P., p. 208). Plaintiff paid up everything on September 17, and called on defendants to go on delivering, which they did not do. Mealies had in the meantime gone up in price. Defendants said, "Because you have not paid promptly in the past, therefore we shall not deliver on any of the other contracts providing for future delivery." But plaintiff had never repudiated the contract or done anything that went to the root of the matter. Defendants should have tested the matter by tendering delivery on any one of the other contracts.

De Villiers, C.J., suggested that there was another way of testing the matter, namely, by claiming back the goods for which plaintiff had not paid.

[Buchanan, J.: Would that cancel the contract?]

Mr. Schreiner: Not the future contracts. We set out five contracts in the declaration, and the learned judge considered them as one. Continuing, he said that delivery was to be of so much every month, and failure to pay after one delivery did not entitle the sellers to cancel the contracts as regards all deliveries. There was nowhere anything to show that time was of the essence of the contract. If a man honestly believed his contract to mean a certain thing and the other party believed it to mean something else, then if it was not a matter that concerned the essence of the contract the erroneous view would not justify a termination of the contract, and that is where the learned judge—he submitted with all respect—went wrong. He cited the Rimney Railway Case (93 L.T., p. 112), where all the English cases were discussed; Voet (19, 1, 21), Leake (on Contracts, p. 461), Sadie v. Standard Bank (7 J., 87), Quirks' Trustees v. Assignees of Liddle (3 J., 322).

Mr. Upington said that there were three main issues to be determined. (1) What was the contract between the parties? (2) Had that contract been performed by the plaintiff? And, if not, (3) whether the acts and conduct of the plaintiff amounted to an intimation to the defendants that he repudiated the contract as it stood? With regard to (1), the delivery was to be at Salisbury. In approaching the question of what the contract really was, it was necessary to see what the position taken up by the parties in the pleadings was; outside the pleadings the Court would not go. He said that the contract was set out in the brokers' notes plus subsequent verbal agreements; defendants said in brokers' notes only. The learned judge in the Court below found the alleged oral additions not proved. The brokers' notes meant that payment and delivery had to be as far as possible simultaneous. He distinguished Sadie's case, and referred to Greenhiels v. Chisholm.

De Villiers, C.J., asked if a misunderstanding on an immaterial point gave a right to repudiate—a misunderstanding that would not go to the root of the contract.

Mr. Upington replied that it all depended what was meant by a circumstance that would go to the root of the contract.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did not your clients treat it as immaterial by not insisting on payment before the goods left Salisbury?]

Mr. Upington: They could have insisted, but with regard to the first contract the plaintiff paid up promptly, and later on the difficulty arose through defendants' construction of the contract.

He relied upon plaintiff's refusal to take the goods unless delivered at the mines. He referred to Attwell v. Logan.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The parties did not consider the matter of the payment as of very much importance, as they did not put it in the contract. The contract was of so much importance to the plaintiff that he would have entered into it even if it stipulated that payment should be made on delivery at Salisbury?]

But there is the other side of the question, that of the defendants, and they say plaintiff was allowed to buy the mealies at bedrock prices because the payment had to be made against delivery at Salisbury. It was quite certain that the invoices were sent in promptly. It was not necessary to say that plaintiff repudiated the contract; he refused to perform it, and defendants could not go into his motives. Whether the refusal was bona fide or not the result was the same to the defendants.

[Maasdorp, J.: Did you at any time say to the plaintiff, "If you insist in your view of the contract then we stop"?]

Mr. Upington said his clients were not in law bound to do that. He cited Withers v. Reynolds (2 B. and A., 882) and Bloomer v. Bernstein (L.R. 9, C.P. 588).

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, referred to Pollock on Contract, 7 ed., pp. 266, et seq.

Cur. Adr. Fult.

Postea (August 31st).

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff instituted his action in the High Court of Southern Rhodesia for damages sustained by him by reason of the defendants failing to deliver to him certain mealies and mealie meal, which had from time to time been purchased by him from them. The contracts of sale were in the form of brokers' bought notes signed by the plaintiff and by him delivered to the defendants. In four of these notes delivery was required to be made at Salisbury Railway Station, and on the face of two of these it appeared that such delivery was required for the purpose of consignment to mines away from Salisbury. In one of them the place of delivery was not mentioned, but the plaintiff admits in his declaration that delivery was to be made at Salisbury Station—although he adds that it was subsequently agreed that the place of delivery should be altered to Selukwe Station. Two of the notes were dated 19th June, 1906, the third was dated 13th July, 1906, the fourth 8th August, 1906, and the fifth 17th August, 1906. The course of dealing in fulfilment of the contracts was for the defendants to deliver invoices to the plaintiff on the goods arriving at Salisbury Station, and thereafter to apply to the plaintiff for payment, but on no occasion was payment demanded as a condition of delivery at or consignment from Salisbury. "It was foreseen," said one of the defendants in his evidence, "in making a contract that Cotton (the plaintiff) would not see mealies as they passed through. We agreed that all shortage and damage should be made up on future consignments. Cotton knew we were getting grain down the Umtali line. Only once or twice did we post the invoices. Mr. Lover, our clerk, sometimes took them over; usually our head boy took them." Upon receipt of these invoices, the plaintiff would pay the whole or part according as he had funds in hand or had advices that the mealies had been received in good condition by the consignees to whom they had been forwarded by the defendants. The balances in favour of the defendants gradually increased, and although the plaintiff was continually pressed for payment, he never kept up in his payments with the quantities appearing from the invoices to have been forwarded. I do not, however, find any evidence that the plaintiff ever repudiated any of the contracts. To prove such repudiation the defendants' counsel relied, among other things, upon the evidence given by the plaintiff himself, where he says: "I said to Arnold (one of the defendants) I would pay as soon as I had proof of delivery at the mines—but I don't mind advancing you money on what you say has gone forward." The fact that the plaintiff wished to treat the money so paid as advances cannot be regarded as a repudiation of the contract even if, according to the true construction of the brokers' notes, payment had to be made on delivery at Salisbury. Quite independently of his view that payment should be made on delivery to the consignees, he would naturally not wish to bind himself by payments made before he could possibly know whether the mealies had arrived in proper quantity and in sound condition. He certainly was entitled to better proof of arrival at or despatch from Salisbury than the defendants' invoices. In point of fact, disputes did from time to time arise as to whether the invoiced quantity had been received, and as to the condition of those actually received by the consignees. Early in September a correspondence passed between the parties as to 350 bags of mealies alleged by the plaintiff to have been delivered at Selukwe Station in a weavilly condition. On the 6th of September the defendants wrote: "As the point of delivery was Selukwe Station, you must either accept the mealies at the original price or return them to us at Selukwe Station." On the same day the plaintiff said in reply: "Under the circumstances, I have given instructions that I will sell the mealies to the mine at the reduced price of 17s. 6d. per bag, and shall debit you with the 1s. per bag that I have lost from the inferior mealies you have supplied me with." On the 7th September the defendants wrote: "As you have seen fit to sell the 350 bags of mealies we hold you responsible for the full amount. We now enclose further account, including the 350 bags above referred to, totalling £966 9s. 1d., and must ask you to settle same forthwith, failing which we shall place the matter in the hands of our solicitors." On the same day the plaintiff, in answer to a letter from the defendants enclosing an account of September 4, 1906, wrote in reference to two items: "We have never received invoices for the above," and as to a third item appearing from the account to have been delivered at the Surprise Mine: "This has not been received by the Surprise, as per their letter which we received to-day. Kindly prove delivery, or give us original rail notes. On receipt of the above details we will send you a cheque for what is due to you." This letter would seem to show that, whatever might be the plaintiff's opinion as to his obligation to pay on arrival of the mealies at the Salisbury Station, he was prepared to pay on being satisfied by the rail notes that the requisite quantity had been forwarded from Salisbury Station to the mine. On the same day, however, the defendants' attorneys wrote to the plaintiff as follows: "Our clients instruct us to intimate to you, as you have failed in keeping your agreement to pay cash against delivery from time to time, they will not deliver further grain to you, and consider the contract at an end." A further correspondence followed between the attorneys of the respective parties, but after one of the parties had given definite notice that he considered the contract at an end, the further correspondence does not throw much light upon the real issue between them. Within two days after the defendants had put an end to the contract the plaintiff paid the full amount due for the goods already delivered, and he then instituted his action for damages for non-delivery of the remainder.

The learned Judge in the Court below held that the plaintiff had failed to prove the contracts set up in his pleadings, that it was one of the terms of the contracts that the plaintiff should pay promptly on arrival of the goods at Salisbury Station, that this condition was of the essence of the contracts, that the acts and conduct of the plaintiff, especially his refusal to pay promptly, evinced his intention to be no longer bound by the real contracts, and that consequently the defendants were entitled to repudiate the contracts.

In regard to the question whether there is a variance between the contracts, as alleged in the declaration and the contracts as actually proved, there is considerable force in the argument as to those goods which the plaintiff would have no opportunity of inspecting at Salisbury, that the parties might fairly be considered to have intended that payment should be made at the places where the goods were to be delivered for acceptance. On the whole, however, I consider that, in regard to those notes in which Salisbury Station was mentioned as the place of delivery, the defendants were entitled to demand payment upon such delivery, even although the goods were consigned to places beyond Salisbury. In this view of the case there certainly was a variance in respect of the contracts embodied in the first and third notes, and the judgment of abolition from the instance, in so far as it affects the counts in the declaration relating to these contracts, will not be disturbed.

In the second note no place of delivery was mentioned, but, in point of fact, the mealies were sent to Selukwe Station, and, as already pointed out, one of the defendants himself referred to that station as "the point of delivery." It is true that the plaintiff, in his declaration, admits Salisbury to be the place of delivery originally agreed upon, but that admission is coupled with the statement that it was subsequently agreed that the place of delivery should be altered to Selukwe Station. As Salisbury was not mentioned in the note as the place of delivery, the Court is of opinion that, having regard to the actual dealings of the parties, they must have intended Selukwe to be the place of delivery of the mealies bought under the second broker's note.

In regard to the fourth and fifth notes, it is common cause that delivery was to be at Salisbury. On the fourth note the plaintiff was, as the learned judge held, to a small extent in default. For 500 bags he paid promptly on delivery; 300 bags were delivered, but not paid for promptly, but the payment for them was only a few days due when the defendants repudiated the contract. Under the note, delivery had to be made to the end of November. Under the 5th note, delivery had to be made between the 17th August and end of November, and the contract was repudiated before the time had arrived for the execution of the bulk of the order.

The important question then arises, whether the plaintiff's undoubted delay in paying for some of the parcels as they arrived at the places of delivery legally justified the defendants in repudiating all the contracts, and refusing to deliver any more mealies or mealie meal. According to Voet (19, 1, 21), the non-payment of the price of goods sold is not, in the absence of express agreement, a ground for dissolution of a contract of sale and restoration of the goods already transferred by delivery. The proper remedy, he says, is to compel the purchaser to perform his part of the contract, but I do not understand him to go so far as to say that where a purchaser evinces a determination to repudiate the contract, the seller is bound to deliver such of the goods sold as have not yet been delivered to the purchaser. As was pointed out in Wolff v. Bruce (7 Juta, 139), Voet refers in this passage to the case in which the thing sold has been delivered. "Where it has not been delivered," it was said in that case, "the absolute refusal of the purchaser to accept it in terms of the contract would justify the seller in treating the contract as at an end." And even where there has been delivery, if the sale was for cash, the vendor may assert his right to the ownership of the goods within the time allowed by law (see Voet, 19, 1, 11, and 12, and Sadie v. Standard Bank, 7 Juta, 87). Where under a contract of sale for cash, part of the goods only has been delivered, the seller is quite justified in refusing to deliver the remainder until he has received payment for what he has delivered, and he may even, failing payment, re-claim the goods within ten days after delivery, but he has no right to cancel the contract unless the delay in payment had taken place under such circumstances as to evince an intention on the purchaser's part no longer to be bound by the contract. In this respect there appears to me to be no substantial difference between the law of England and the law of Southern Rhodesia. In the case of Attwell v. Login (3 Juta, 107), the English cases of Freese v. Burr (R. 9, C.P. 268), and Mercy Company v. Naylor (L.R. 9, A.C. 434) were not cited, but I take it that the law as laid down by the Supreme Court is quite in accord with these English cases.

A person may repudiate his contract in express words, as the defendants did in the present case, or he may evince his intention to repudiate by his acts and conduct, and the question is whether the plaintiff's acts and conduct before the 7th of September evinced an intention on his part no longer to be bound by his contracts. It was clearly his interest to abide by the contracts, for the price of mealies was rising, and he had effected sales which he wished to complete by delivery. He had, however, himself to deliver mealies and mealie meal of sound quality and in proper quantities, and was anxious to be assured that the goods sent on by the defendants to his customers were of the desired quality and did not fall short of the proper quantity. The mere fact, therefore, that he insisted upon treating any payments made by him as advances does not evince any desire to repudiate. It is, no doubt, quite true that at times the delay in payment was due to the plaintiff not having the funds immediately in hand, but it is not suggested that he was in insolvent circumstances, and when early in September he was pressed for payment he had no difficulty in paying for the goods already supplied. The defendants could have protected themselves by refusing delivery of any parcel without simultaneous payment of the price of such parcel, and the plaintiff might well have supposed that, as the defendants did not insist upon his fulfilling his obligations to the letter, his delay in payment would not afterwards be regarded as evincing a desire to repudiate his contract altogether. If it be correct, as the learned judge held, that cash payment on delivery was of the essence of the contract, the defendants themselves did not so treat it, for they sent the goods away from Salisbury without insisting upon previous payment. The broker's notes say nothing whatever as to time of payment, but I quite agree that the vendor was not bound to deliver without cash payment. In one sense, no doubt, time is of the essence of every executory contract, for if a party to any contract delays in performing his part under such circumstances as to show that he is evading the contract altogether, the other party is not bound to fulfil his own obligations under the contract. Where, in a contract of sale, no time is fixed for the payment of the price, the presumption is that the parties intended cash to be paid on delivery, but if the vendor delivers part of the goods without payment of their price, he cannot afterwards cancel the sale merely because the price was not paid on delivery. Where there is a further delay in the payment of the price, the vendor can only cancel the sale if it can fairly be inferred from the acts and conduct of the purchaser that he no longer considered himself bound by the contract. Holding, as the Court does, that no such intention can be inferred from the acts and conduct of the plaintiff, the Court is of opinion that he is entitled to damages for the defendants' refusal to deliver the remainder of the goods sold under the second, fourth, and fifth contracts. No evidence was given on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiff could have gone into the market, and obtained contracts for the purchase of mealies and mealie meal for delivery at the dates mentioned in the broker's notes, or on such terms as would mitigate his loss. It is fair, therefore, that the measure of damages should be the difference between the contract prices and the market prices at the several periods of delivery. The plaintiff has given evidence of the prices actually paid by him in the purchase of grain to supply his customers in consequence of the defendants' breach of contract, and the defendants' counsel has not seriously disputed the correctness of the amounts claimed by the plaintiff as damages. On the second contract the damages amount to £36 9s., on the fourth £84 15s. 10d., and on the fifth £50, making a total of £171 4s. 10d. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed to this extent that judgment will be entered for the plaintiff for £171 4s. 10d., with interest a tempore morae, and with costs in this Court, and in the Court below. There will be absolution from the instance in respect of the first, third, and fourth claims in the declaration. I may add that my brother Maasdorp concurs in this judgment.

Mr. Justice Buchanan concurred.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ROSSOUW V. RANER.

{ 1907.
Aug. 20th.
" 21st.
" 22nd.

This was an action for the recovery of a debt of £225, which the plaintiffs (Daneel G. Rossouw and Son) alleged was due to them from the defendant Raner. The declaration stated that on or about December, 1906, defendant negotiated to sell to the plaintiff certain premises, the property of the defendant, situated in Vandeleur-street, Cape Town. He entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiff, whereby he agreed that if the plaintiff purchased the said premises he (the defendant) would be bound without remuneration to collect the rents of the said premises, and to pay to the plaintiff for and in respect of such rents a fixed sum of £45 per month for the period of two years from January 1, 1907. Thereafter the plaintiff purchased the premises from the defendant, and duly executed a written guarantee in terms as aforesaid. All the conditions had been fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiff to claim the sum of £225, being at the rate of £45 per month for the five months ending May 31.

Defendant, in his plea, stated that plaintiff, according to the agreement had to effect certain repairs to the house, but failed to do so, with the result that some of the properties could not be let. By this he suffered loss to the extent of £50 12s. The properties were sold to the plaintiff for £6,250, and on the same day the plaintiff sold, on behalf of his son, to defendant's son, a certain farm situate in the Malmesbury district for £5,500, the farm being valued at £5,000, and the movables at £500. It was agreed that the difference in the price between the property in Cape Town and the farm and movables (£750) should be paid in cash, and that the £5,500 balance should be paid by transferring and delivering to the defendant's son the aforesaid farm and movables. Defendant states that in violation of the agreement there was due in respect of the non-delivery of movables a sum of £297 1s., caused by the removal of certain rats necessary for pressing grapes. He admits the liability of £225 claimed by plaintiff, but is entitled to a set off against this amount of £50 12s., £297 1s., and £188. This was his claim in reconvention.

Plaintiff, in replication, admitted paying the sum of £750. It was his son Rossouw, jun., who sold the farm and movables to defendant's son by a broker's note signed by both Rossouw, jun., and Raner, jun. Certain of the movables were removed by mistake to the value of £83 19s., and that sum was tendered to defendant, but it was refused, and although denying the liability in reconvention, he is willing to set that amount off his (plaintiff's) own claim.

Mr. De Villiers, with him Mr. Van Zyl, was for the plaintiff; Mr. Burton, K.C., with him Dr. Greer, was for the defendant.

Mr. De Villiers intimated that his learned friend might like to lead evidence at this point.

Mr. Burton agreed.

Nathan Raner, the defendant, said he was a builder and contractor, residing in Cape Town. He had some negotiations with Mr. Rossouw for the exchange of some property in Cape Town. In connection with this, plaintiff came into Cape Town to inspect the property. There were in all 10 houses, which Mr. Rossouw inspected. Witness asked £7,000 for the property, but the plaintiff refused. The whole arrangement was simply an exchange of the town property for a farm and movables in the Malmesbury district called Modderkloof, and a cash payment.

Mr. Burton: Had you any idea that this farm did not belong to plaintiff?

Witness: No; I thought it belonged to him.

Did you come to an arrangement about the price?—After a good deal of discussion we came to an arrangement.

What was that arrangement?—He was to give me the farm and £750 cash.

That is to say, £6,250 for the property and £5,000 for the farm, and £500 for the movables?—Yes.

When these broker's notes were signed, did you then discover that Rossouw was not the proprietor?—Rossouw called his son in to sign, and then explained that he (Rossouw) was the real owner of the farm, as he had a bond of £4,000 upon it, although it stood in his son's name. Witness said he wanted his son to have this farm, but as he was not of age, he did not take any part in the contract. Afterward, his son, having become of age, he placed his signature on the back of the promissory note because plaintiff's attorneys stated that if his son did not wish to have the farm, then the arrangement would fall through. He did not make arrangements to keep the town property in repair at the price agreed upon. While on the farm he saw certain of the assets, the sheep and goats. In the broker's note was inserted the words "all assets and stock."

[Maasdorp, J.: Were the goods on the farm valued at £500?]

Mr. Burton: Yes, my lord.

Mr. Burton (to witness): This list of articles you show, you say were removed from the farm?—Yes, with the exception of two wine tubs, which were afterwards returned.

What about this item of oathay?—The loft was full of oathay when I saw it, but it was afterwards removed by Rossouw.

There were 6,000 bundles, and you claim £60 for these?—Yes.

How did you arrive at that figure?—I took it at £1 per 100 bundles.

Witness said he bought 200 sheep, but he only received 190. He claimed for the difference, and as out of the flock of 277, Rossouw, junior, selected 77 of the very best, he claimed for an adjustment also in the value on the number bought.

Witness further explained that he bought a horse and three mules from the plaintiff, but the horse he actually bought was not worth 15s., and he claimed £15 as compensation. Young Rossouw was left on the farm by arrangement when the farm was bought until such time as he (witness) got a manager. The tubs, which were removed by plaintiff, were necessary for the vintage, and he wrote Rossouw telling him that he would hold him responsible for any loss that might arise through any delay in returning them. With regard to the house rents he got a special power of attorney from Rossouw to collect the rents. Rossouw agreed to keep the properties in repair while witness held the power of attorney, but he did not do so. On account of this certain of the people left the houses. Rossouw had recently put the places in repair. The loss on rents he claimed in reconvention on account of the repairs not being made as £42 10s. He wrote plaintiff and told him that a certain door had to be cut to retain a tenant. Plaintiff wrote asking for an estimate, but when the estimate was sent he considered that the amount was too much. Afterwards he wrote plaintiff stating that he declined to send the rents until the movables removed from the farm had been returned. The rents he received were less than the £45 per month agreed upon.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: He signed the guarantee for £45 per month for a period of two years. The purchaser was entitled to the rents from January 1, 1907. During these two years witness said he had to remain in possession, and collect the rents.

Mr. De Villiers: Do I understand that if you received £50 per month you would have to hand the full amount over?—Yes.

It is stated in the declaration that you agreed to deliver the premises in a proper state of repair to plaintiff?—I didn't undertake to do that.

Witness handed in a statement showing the amount collected from January to May, which exhibited considerable reductions. Asked whether he could get out another statement showing his receipts for the previous six months, witness said he could easily do so.

You signed "q.q." on the agreement, but you did not put the name of your principal. Do you know that made the agreement void?—I don't understand what you mean by the word "void"—that is high English.

The plaintiff's attorneys wrote stating that it would be necessary to have your son's signature on the agreement, so as to put the agreement in order?—I paid for the farm, not my son.

[Maasdorp, J.: When young Rossouw was on the farm, where did the father live?]

Witness: In Wellington.

How far is that from the farm?—About 1½ hours or so.

Mr. De Villiers: During the time young Rossouw was there, you had three mules and a horse on the farm there: these had to be fed?

Witness: The horse could not eat. He was too sick. I think he was a donkey of a horse.

Witness further added that young Rossouw was never left as manager of the farm, and he had no authority to kill sheep to feed either himself or the boys.

Mr. De Villiers: You say in your plea that the vintage was delayed three weeks on account of the non-delivery of these pressing tubs. Where did you get your information from?

Witness: From my manager—Mr. Louw.

Continuing, witness said that he estimated he lost 15 leaguers of wine by the delay, and one leaguer of brandy. The grapes in many instances were allowed to turn into raisins, and were useless for wine making.

Johannes Basson said he was engaged on the farm under Rossouw, junior, as manager. Witness said there were 6,000 bundles of oathay at the time of purchase. These bundles were mainly sold by Rossouw, junior, to a man in Malmesbury, and Rossouw also took away some. It would not pay to put up this hay in bundles of three or four pounds.

Dr. Greer: Did you know about the cart that was taken away from the farm?—Yes.

What is the price of it?—About £7 is a reasonable price.

Where are the pressing tubs?—They have not been delivered.

If you had had these pressing tubs when would you have begun to press?—Early in February.

Witness went on to say that Modder Kloof was an early farm, and the vintage had to be got over early.

Dr. Greer: Did any of the grapes go to ruin on account of defendant not having these tubs?—Yes.

What was the loss?—About 12 to 15 leaguers, and about a leaguer of brandy.

Witness (continuing) said that the 14 pigs were made up of well-grown pigs and a litter of two. Only 180 sheep were handed over, but he could not say what number of sheep were slaughtered. There were 8 leaguers of wine in the cellars, part of which was sold to various farmers. With regard to the horse which Raner received, witness said that Raner stated the horse wasn't worth 1½d. Young Rossouw said that everything not on the paper belonged to him.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: He was under the various managers at one time, now he was overseer. With reference to the cart which witness said young Rossouw had made, it was worth £7. Witness emphatically denied that the farm was a late farm for wine-pressing.

Mr. Edmund Parry said he was a broker residing at Kalk Bay. He was responsible for the drawing up of the agreement. He did not recollect that Rossouw agreed to keep the houses in repair. It was certainly stated that defendant should have one of the horses, and he chose the one that drove them to the station with the three mules.

Adrian Siebrits stated that the tubs in question were not available at the vintage. Witness's evidence went to prove the removal of certain of the movables incorporated in the agreement. He also stated that a quantity of the wine was sold to various farmers in the neighbourhood.

Julius Verster said he had been acting as agent for the houses now owned by the plaintiff Rossouw. He had had frequent complaints about the condition of the houses, and had on that account been unable to let them.

Alfred Raner, son of the defendant, said he was now living on Modder Kloof farm, and carrying on operations there. On December 25 he was 21 years of age. Witness corroborated the statement made that the farm was bought in his name. He could not say when the pressing of the grapes began. With reference to the removal of the tubs, witness affirmed that many of the grapes could not be pressed, on account of this. What tubs they eventually used were those of the neighbouring farm.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

D. G. Rossouw, the plaintiff, said he had been farming in the Malmesbury district for 25 years. He bought a farm for his son in that district, for which his son passed a bond. With regard to the Cape Town property, he inspected it. The defendant was not present when the first inspection was made, but he was present on the second. The idea was that the defendant should hand over the property as new.

Mr. De Villiers: Which of the mov-ables were to be handed over to defendant?

Witness: I was under the impression that it was all the articles mentioned in the schedule. Continuing, witness said the words "all assets" in the agreement were not suggested by him, but were put in by the broker. Certain of the articles he could not understand how they got into the schedule. Personally, he did not undertake any liability for the handing over of the movables. Witness stated that his son was put in possession of the farm until Raner found a manager. His son was told to engage boys at 3s. per day, and was also told to buy meat for them. His son was afterwards told to slaughter sheep, and to provide food for himself and boys. When plaintiff viewed the houses, he told defendant that as rents were coming down all over the town, that he would not buy the property unless he had some guarantee regarding the rents. Afterwards defendant agreed to pay £45 a month for two years. Raner only wanted to give a guarantee for a year, because after that time, he said, would improve, and plaintiff would benefit accordingly. Witness, however, stated that it did not matter whether times improved or not; he would insist upon a two years' guarantee of £45 per month. Witness further stated that he gave no guarantee to keep the houses in repair. With regard to the removal of certain articles, these were removed by witness's son. Witness was not on the farm at the time. Witness further stated that the price of good wine sold by him to the merchants was from £5 to £6 per leaguer. Brandy would fetch about £12. He did not know how much wine there was in the cellar at the time when defendant agreed to buy the farm, but certainly he did not specify that any particular horse should be handed over to the defendant.

Mr. De Villiers: Do you know what horses and mules were to be handed over to defendant?

Witness: Three mules and a horse.

Continuing, witness said that with regard to the pressing tubs, he was of opinion that Raner would prefer the money rather than the articles. The agreement was that young Raner should ask his father which he preferred.

Mr. De Villiers: Is it easy to get a new pair of tubs?

Witness: Oh, yes; quite easy. You can get a tub in two or three days for about £7.

Cross-examined by Dr. Greer: He inspected the property, but insisted that the property should be handed over to him in good repair.

Dr. Greer: Why did you not put it into the broker's note?

Witness: Because everything was done so hurriedly at the farm, and that point was omitted.

Dr. Greer: I put it to you that you agreed to take the property as it was?—That is not correct.

Did you tell Mr. Raner that the vines were affected with phylloxera?—I simply told him what young vines had been planted.

Who wrote the broker's note?—Parry and Verster. Parry wrote and then Verster copied it. The copy I signed.

You say that you took no personal liability with regard to the movables?—Yes.

But these were included in the purchase price?—When the place was sold it was sold with all the movables that I understood were on the schedule.

Witness (continuing) said that it was after he discovered that the words "all assets" were in the broker's note that he offered the sum mentioned in the replication for the articles missing. Witness admitted that on the advice of his attorneys he had put the houses in proper condition, but maintained that if the houses had been handed over in good repair there would not be any need for any outlay.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case, and counsel having been heard in argument on the facts:

Postea (August 22nd).

Maasdorp, J.: In December, 1906, plaintiff bought certain buildings in Cape Town from the defendant, and in the past the defendant had drawn certain profits from these buildings in the shape of rents. The plaintiff expected to draw similar profits, and a discussion took place as to the condition of the buildings and the probable amount of the rents in the future. Thereupon, as an inducement and as part of the consideration, the defendant guaranteed that the monthly rental from the buildings would be £45. The defendant admitted the agreement and admitted liability on the guarantee for five months, but he counter-claimed for damages suffered through loss of tenants owing to the houses not being kept in a proper state of repair by the plaintiff. So it was necessary to ascertain the duty of the plaintiff with regard to repairs. When the defendant guaranteed the rents, it should be taken, in the absence of any agreement to repair, that he guaranteed the rents from the buildings as they then stood. If the plaintiff had been expected to make repairs, the guarantee would have been a different form. The plaintiff knew the condition of the buildings; they were not in good repair, and it was natural that the plaintiff should call the defendant's notice to their condition and ask for a guarantee. No evidence whatever was given on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff had undertaken to repair the buildings, while on the other hand there was evidence that the defendant had undertaken to put them into a proper state of repair. So he (the judge) thought that the buildings were guaranteed as they stood and there was no promise by the plaintiff to put them into good repair. Of course, it was the plaintiff's duty to keep the buildings in as good a state of repair as they were when handed over to him; it was admitted, however, that in January the buildings were in the same condition as they were in before the sale, and the Court was quite satisfied that there had been no breach of duty or delay on the plaintiff's part in making repairs. Even if the plaintiff had not done the necessary repairs there was still the question whether the loss of rents from the building had been traced to lack of repairs. A statement had been put in showing the fall of the rents, but complaints were only made about a portion of the buildings, and yet there was a fall in the rents of all the buildings except two—2, William-street, and 39, Vandeleur-street. So he (the judge) came to the conclusion that no neglect had been proved on the part of the plaintiff to cause damage to the defendant by the fall in rents. There was another issue between the parties; the sale of a farm in the Malmesbury district from the plaintiff's son to the defendant's son was contemplated, so it was agreed that part of the value of the buildings should be paid in cash and the balance settled by this transaction. The contract for the sale of the farm was drawn up in writing, and it was clearly a sale by the plaintiff's son to the defendant's son, consequently it might have been contended that the proper parties were not before the Court. The counter-claim was made by the defendant against the plaintiff for property which the plaintiff's son had removed from the farm belonging to the defendant's son, and so the plaintiff might have repudiated liability. The plaintiff might also have pleaded that the things were not removed from the farm till after he (plaintiff) had given delivery of the farm and the movable property to the defendant, and so he (plaintiff) was not liable. These pleas had, however, not been raised, and the plaintiff accepted liability for all his son's actions, and the only question to be decided was the amount of damages. To do that the Court had to consider the value of all the property. It was a matter of very material importance whether there had been any dishonesty in the removal of the goods from the farm. If the removal had been dishonest the Court would have thrown the burden of the loss on the plaintiff, but if the removal were honest the Court would inquire very carefully into the value of the things removed. The plaintiff's son said that he honestly believed he had a right to remove the goods, and certainly if the written contract were looked at it might he strongly contended that there was good ground for his belief. Not only might he have rested his belief on the words of the contract, but also on certain conversations which might have led to the conclusion that all the assets of the farm were not included in the sale. The plaintiff had, however, not set that up in his replication as a ground of defence, but he was prepared to pay the value of the goods removed, and he (the judge) thought that he had been very well advised in doing so. He thought young Rossouw acted quite honestly, and so the only question remaining was as to the value of the goods removed. There were two witnesses as to the amounts and values of these articles, Basson and young Rossouw. The one was in a subordinate position and the other not, and one relied on his memory, and the other on documents, and it was quite clear that Rossouw's figures were more accurate. There was one item which affected the credibility of the parties seriously. Witnesses for the defendant said the young Rossouw had substituted one horse for another, which had been sold with the farm, and this was denied. Now the defendant's claim with regard to the horse had at one time been quite different; he had previously claimed that the horse had been damaged by young Rossouw, but now he claimed that a horse had been substituted. He (the judge) believed Rossouw and Furter on that question, and did not believe the defendant. The Court came to the conclusion that the goods removed from the farm had been fairly enumerated and fairly valued by the plaintiff, and £85 19s. would be awarded to the defendant on that counter-claim in terms of the tender. There was a further counter-claim for damages for the removal of two wine pressing tubs. On that point the Court was quite satisfied that Raner could in a few days have procured other tubs, and that he need not have lost any of his vintage, so he had not proved that he had suffered any damage from their removal. The plaintiff had tendered £3, the value of the tubs, and had also returned the tubs, so he had over-tendered, but he was bound by his tender. The Court also held, as a question of fact, that there was not sufficient evidence before it to show what the amount of the vintage would have been. There was the evidence of Basson, but he was young and inexperienced, and so the defendant had failed to prove any damage. Consequently judgment would be given for the plaintiff on the claim in convention for £225, with costs; judgment would be for the defendant on his counter-claim for £85 19s. in terms of the plaintiff's tender, costs to be paid by the defendant.

Mr. Gutsche said it seemed to him also that the matter was not one that could be decided on affidavit.

Dr. Greer said that if the plaintiff was ordered to go into the principal case he should have to apply for security for costs, as plaintiff was not domiciled in this colony.

Mr. Gutsche said that the plaintiff was only in England on a visit.

Hopley, J., said he would make no order at present as regards security for costs. That matter might form the subject of a substantive application.

Ordered that the parties go into the principal case, costs to be costs in the cause.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte MURRAY. { 1907.
{ Aug. 20th.

Mr. De Waal moved for a certain rule nisi, under the Derelict Lands Act, to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte MCGREGOR MUNICIPALITY.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., said that this was an application, under the Derelict Lands Act, and it had already been placed before Mr. Justice Maasdorp in Chambers. Mr. Justice Maasdorp endorsed the application thus: "Referred to the full Court, under section 6, Act 28, 1881." Counsel added that he did not quite know whether "full Court" meant a bench of three Judges.

Hopley, J., said that no doubt when the Act was passed, what was meant was a Court of two Judges, as was constituted in those days. He would hear the application.

Mr. Benjamin then read the petition of the Mayor of McGregor, from which it appeared that the Municipality desired to have registered the remainder of the farm Over-de-Berg, situate in the division of Robertson, of the extent of 1,811 morgen, inclusive of streets, roads, and squares, in the name and as the property of the Municipality. The ground had hitherto been used as commonage under a grant from one Naude.

Hopley, J., remarked that Naude seemed to have transferred portions out and out, and to have given commonage rights over the remainder. The question was whether he intended to do anything more with regard to the remainder? Now the applicants came and asked to be given full rights of ownership over the remainder. They did not show that they had exercised anything more than commonage rights for over 30 years, and it did not appear that anyone was trying to deprive them of those rights.

Mr. Benjamin: A portion of the land has been set aside or sold, I don't exactly know which, by the Municipality for school purposes, and it is necessary that this piece of land should be transferred. Counsel said that on the 23rd May last there was a somewhat similar fered. Counsel said that on the 3rd application from Villiersdorp (17 C.T.R. 397).

Hopley, J.: Applicants seem to me to have taken a good deal upon themselves. I think that Mr. Justice Maasdorp probably meant, when he endorsed this matter to be heard before a full Court, that it should be heard before a Court more fully constituted than one Judge. I think we had better follow out his intention by referring this application to the full Court, especially as there has been a similar matter before. The application may be renewed before a full Court, and set down for Monday next.

ATTWELL V. CUTHBERT AND CO., LTD.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., moved to make absolute a certain rule nisi admitting petitioner to sue the respondents in forma pauperis for £1,000 damages, alleged to have been sustained by reason of the fact that judgment had been taken by the East London branch of respondent company against petitioner in respect of a debt which he had already satisfied.

Respondents did not appear.

Rule absolute, Mr. Buchanan, K.C., to be counsel, and Mr. P. A. Myburgh Cloete to be attorney to the petitioner.

HOFFMAN V. CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL

Applicant in this matter (Hoffman) had obtained leave to sue the Cape Town Council in forma pauperis for damages, and counsel and attorney had been assigned to him. He now applied in person for the appointment of fresh attorneys.

Dr. Greer (who appeared for A. and C. Friedlander) explained that the Court originally appointed Mr. Frank as the petitioner's attorney. Mr. Frank had gone up-country, and he had handed over to Messrs. Friedlander his papers in this and other matters. Applicant objected to Mr. Friedlander acting as his attorney, seeing that he was a member of the Town Council. He (Dr. Greer) was asked by Mr. Friedlander to state that he had no desire to act in the matter, but the papers had been handed over to his custody, and he thought it best that they should remain in his custody pending the appointment of fresh attorneys.

Applicant (in answer to the Court) said he desired that Messrs. Wahl, Fuller and De Klerk should be substituted as his attorneys.

Rule discharged, so far as the appointment of Mr. Frank is concerned, no order as to costs, and Messrs. Wahl, Fuller and De Klerk substituted as attorneys of record to the petitioner in his suit against the Cape Town Council.

Ex parte FRANCIS BROS.

Mr. Close moved, on the petition of Francis Bros., of Ugie, district Maolear, for leave to sue by edictal citation one Rachel Charlotte A. Devonshire, as executrix testamentary in the estate of the late Hajo Jacobus A. Spandau, and to attach certain property in the estate ad fundandam jurisdictionem. From the petition it appeared that applicants in July, 1903, bought, at public auction, a certain piece of perpetual quitrent land, situate at Ugie, and belonging to the estate. Petitioners had duly paid the purchase price, but the said Rachel Devonshire had repeatedly refused to give transfer of the property in her capacity as executrix. Respondent was domiciled at Krugersdorp, Transvaal. Petitioners asked that the land in question, as well as the farms Deep Valley and Mount Hope, situate in district Maolear, should be attached ad fundandam jurisdictionem in an action which they proposed to institute to obtain transfer of the quitrent land, and to recover £50 damages, sustained by reason of respondent's refusal to pass transfer.

Leave to sue by edict granted, and to attach the property named in the petition ad fundandam jurisdictionem, with leave to serve intendit, citation, and notice of trial together, personal service, citation returnable on the 6th September.

Ex parte ESTATE CONRADIE.

Mr. Roux moved, on the petition of Johannes S. Conradie, as executor testamentary of the late H. C. Conradie and spouse, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent Gabriel

L. M. Conradie and Aletta P. Conradie, in an action to have them declared of unsound mind, and a curator of their persons and property appointed, with power to invest certain funds and to pass transfer of certain property. The parties reside in the division of Robertson.

Hopley, J., said that he did not see how the respondents could be joined in one action. It appeared to him that two summonses would have to be issued.

Ordered that an inquiry be made into the state of mind of the respondents, Advocate De Waal appointed curator ad litem of the respondents, summonses returnable on the 10th September, with leave to give proof on affidavit in each case.

WOLHUTER V. DE KOCK AND LOW.

This was an application upon notice to respondents, an auctioneer and attorney respectively, at Prince Albert, to show cause why they should not pay over to applicant from the insolvent estate of Fredk. J. de Kock a sum of £38 19s. 8d. as dividend, or such other sum as may be due to him, or in the alternative, why they should not render an account of all sums received and disbursed by them in the said estate.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for applicant; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., was for respondents.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan said that the position the respondents took up was that the application was wrong in form and practice. An action should have been instituted for the payment of this money, and for debate of the account in the usual way; and apart from that, on the notice of the application, there was no cause shown for it. Counsel then read replying affidavits by the respondents.

Hopley, J., I regret so much time has been taken up with this application. The respondent did not disassociate himself from the firm when acting as trustee. Respondents were called, not as attorneys, who would be amenable to the discipline of the Court, nor is the one partner, Mr. De Kock, called as the trustee of an insolvent estate, in which capacity he would also be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court, but the action is brought against De Kock and Low in their capacity as applicants' agents, to recover moneys collected for them. The payment of this sum of money to his agent arises, it is true, on the payment by one of themselves—the trustee in an insolvent estate, to his own firm as agents for the applicant, but that does not change the aspect of the case, nor make the procedure, which would be irregular, against anyone else regular by these agents. Without going deeply into the contradictory question as to the rights of the matter, or as to whether there was some misunderstanding, or without going into the contradictory matter in the affidavits with regard to the tender of money, the question I have to ask myself is, is this a proper or competent procedure to adopt when a principal wishes for a settlement with his agent for money received? I know of no principle, I know of no case in which it has been done. On the contrary, I know many instances where the procedure has been the ordinary course of an action. It is said, I must look at this matter in another light, because there is no dispute that the agents have not received this money, and they seek to do on motion what requires an action at law. I do not think that is a fair test to apply, because we would be constantly having applications here of a similar nature. Mr. Jones said that in this particular case, even if this irregular notice had been given, and certain costs had been incurred, and his clients had been tendered the amount with costs to date, he would not have gone further, and that makes me still more disinclined to deal with the application, because the matter of a few pounds and the costs incurred to-day should not have stopped them. It is true that a person who has been kept waiting for his money may always proceed against his debtor, but then he must proceed in the proper way, and that brings me back to the question as to whether the applicant has proceeded in the proper way or not. He should have proceeded by action, but he did not do so. He has brought the matter on by motion, and costs have been incurred on both sides. It seems to me that the whole proceedings are wrong, and therefore the application must be refused with costs.

ALBOW BROS. AND GEZNER V. ISSEROWE.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved as a matter of urgency, on behalf of the applicants for the appointment of a curator bonis in the insolvent estate of Chone Isserowe, a butcher.

In reply to the Court, Mr. Jones said the urgency arose through the insolvent having perishable goods in his custody.

[Hopley, J.: What are the perishable goods?]

Mr. Jones: Contracts he may have for the supply of meat.

[Hopley, J.: But those contracts cease to exist when he becomes insolvent.]

Mr. Jones said that the insolvent might have some live-stock.

Hopley, J.: So as not to put your clients to any additional expense, you can mention this case to-morrow, but if you have no further particulars you need not do so, as the application will not be considered by the Court.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

Ex parte HAHN. { 1907.
Aug. 21st.

Mr. Bisset applied for leave to amend order granted on August 13 in application of Carl Hahn, for leave to amend deed of transfer in his favour. The order incorrectly referred to the deed as in favour of Hahn and Jakens.

The words "and Jakens" were ordered to be struck out.

ESTATE GOLDSTUCK V. { 1907.
AUG. 21st.
GOLDSTUCK AND OTHERS. { " 22nd.
" 23rd.
" 26th.

Insolvent Ordinance, Secs. 83 and 84—Sale—Mortgage.

G., finding himself pressed by certain creditors, sold a certain farm to his two sons, who passed a mortgage bond in his favour on the farm for the full amount of the purchase price. The S. Bank already held a mortgage on the farm, but raised no objection to the sale by G. to his sons.

Held, that as no proof had been given that at the time of the sale G.'s liabilities exceeded his assets, and as he had acted bona fide, the sale could not be impeached under either the 83rd or the 84th section of the Insolvent Ordinance.

This was an action in which Hugo Michaelis in his capacity as sole trustee in the insolvent estate of Benjamin Goldstuck sought a declaration to the effect that the sale of a certain farm at Vrouwpan and all the stock, the property of the insolvent Benjamin Goldstuck, to Simon Goldstuck, of Vrouwpan, division of Hope Town, and Nicholas Goldstuck, a minor, residing at Vrouwpan, on the 9th July last, is null and void, and that the pledge, cession or delivery of a certain mortgage bond for £3,500 passed on August 11 by the defendants, Simon Goldstuck and Nicholas Goldstuck, in favour of the insolvent, Benjamin Goldstuck, and by him pledged, ceded, or delivered to the Standard Bank, constituting an undue preference, a declaration that the Standard Bank has on the ground of collusion forfeited all right to claim on the insolvent estate of Benjamin Goldstuck.

Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff sues in his capacity as the sole trustee in the insolvent estate of Benjamin Goldstuck, of Hope Town. The first and second defendants reside at Vrouwpan, in the division of Hope Town, and are the sons of the said insolvent; the second defendant being a minor, and therefore sued as assisted by his father and natural guardian, who also resides at Vrouwpan aforesaid. The third defendant is the Standard Bank of South Africa, Ltd., carrying on business at Cape Town and elsewhere in this Colony.

2. The said Benjamin Goldstuck applied on or about the 11th of December, 1906, for the surrender of his estate, and the same was accepted as insolvent on or about the 17th of January, 1907. The plaintiff was duly appointed as sole trustee thereof on or about the 4th of February, 1907.

3. Prior to the 1st of August, 1906, the said insolvent was the registered owner of the said farm Vrouwpan, upon which there rested a mortgage bond for the sum of £1,400 in favour of the defendant bank at Hope Town, to which the insolvent was at that time indebted in an amount far exceeding the amount of the said bond.

4. In or about July, 1906, it was arranged between the insolvent and the third defendant that the insolvent should sell the said farm with certain live-stock thereon to the first two defendants for the sum of £3,500 in all, being £2,500 for the farm and £1,000 for the live-stock, and that the first two defendants should pass a mortgage bond in favour of the insolvent for the full amount of the said purchase price, which bond should then be ceded by the insolvent to the third defendant.

5. In pursuance of the said arrangement, the insolvent on or about the 9th of July, 1906, purported to sell to the two first defendants the said farm and live-stock for the said sum of £3,500 and thereafter delivered the said property to them, transfer of the said farm to them being passed on or about the 1st of August, 1906. On or about the date last mentioned, the two first defendants passed a mortgage bond in favour of the insolvent, as arranged with the third defendant, for the sum of £3,500 (being the said purchase price), binding specially the said farm and containing also the usual general clause, and on or about the 9th of August, 1906, the insolvent, still in pursuance of the said arrangement, pledged, delivered, or ceded the said bond to the third defendant, which cancelled the previously existing bond for £1,400.

6. The plaintiff says that, at the time of the said sale, delivery, and transfer by the insolvent to the first two defendants, the liabilities of the insolvent fairly calculated exceeded his assets fairly valued, that the said sale and alienation were not made bona-fide upon just and valuable considerations, and that the same are null and void under the provisions of the 83rd section of Ordinance 6 of 1843, or otherwise are void as having been made in fraud of creditors.

7. The plaintiff also says that the pledge, delivery, or cession of the said bond for £3,500 as aforesaid to the third defendant, who was then a creditor of the insolvent, was made at a time when the insolvent contemplated the sequestration of his estate, and that he intended thereby to prefer the third defendant before his other creditors, and that the said pledge, delivery, or cession is null and void as an undue preference under the terms of section 84 of the said insolvent Ordinance.

8. The plaintiff says further that the said undue preference was received by the third defendant by or through a collusive arrangement, mutual understanding, or common consent between the said defendant and the insolvent, the one to give and the other to get such undue preference.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays: (a) As against the first two defendants, a declaration that the said sale, alienation, and transfer are null and void, either under the 83rd section of the said ordinance or under the common law, and that the said farm and live-stock belong to the said insolvent estate; (b) as against the third defendant a declaration that the said pledge, delivery, or cession of the said bond constituted an undue preference, and is null and void under the provisions of section 84 of the said ordinance; (c) as against the third defendant, a declaration that it is not entitled, on the ground of the said collusion, to claim or prove as a debt the amount of the said bond, but that it shall wholly forfeit such amount as regards the said estate, in terms of sections 86 and 88 of the said ordinance. As against all the defendants: (d) Alternative relief; and (e) costs of suit.

The plea of the first and second defendants was as follows:

1. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of the declaration are admitted.

2. The defendants admit that in or about the month of July, 1906, the insolvent sold and the defendants bought the said farm Vrouwpan, together with certain live-stock, for the price or sum of £3,500, that the said live-stock were duly delivered to them, that transfer of the said farm was duly passed to them on the 1st day of August, 1906, and that they duly passed a mortgage bond in favour of the insolvent for the said sum, binding specially the said farm, and containing the general clause, which said bond was subsequently duly ceded to the third defendant. The defendants crave leave to refer to the terms of the said transfer and mortgage bond when produced at the trial.

3. The defendants and the insolvent entered into the said contract of sale bona fide, for just and valuable consideration, and in the usual and ordinary course of trade and business.

4. Save as above, the defendants have no knowledge of the allegations in paragraphs 4, 5, 7, and 9, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof. They deny each and every allegation in paragraph 6, as specifically as if herein set out.

Wherefore the first and second defendants pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

The plea of the third defendant was as follows:

1. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of the declaration are admitted.

2. The defendant admits that in or about the month of July, 1906, the insolvent sold and transferred the said farm Vrouwpan, together with certain live-stock, to the first two defendants for the sum of £3,500, and that the said defendants passed a mortgage bond in favour of the insolvent for the said sum, specially hypothecating the said farm, and containing the general clause.

3. On or about the 9th day of August, 1906, the insolvent bona fide for valuable consideration, and in the ordinary course of business duly ceded the said bond to the defendant, in security of his indebtedness to the latter, and the defendant, in consideration thereof, inter alia, released the said farm from the operation of the said bond for £1,400.

4. The defendant denies that the said cession and, or, bond are null and void, under the provisions of sections 83, and, or, 84 of Ordinance 6 of 1843, or as having been made in fraud of creditors, or that it has received any undue preference by or through a collusive arrangement, mutual understanding, or common consent between the defendant and the insolvent, the one to give and the other to get such undue preference.

5. Save as above, defendant denies each and every allegation in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, as specifically as if herein set out.

6. The defendant contends, if the Court should find the allegations in paragraphs 6 and 7 to be proved, but not otherwise, that it is still entitled to claim preferentially upon the said insolvent estate for the sum of £1,400, with interest, being the amount of such mortgage bond so released as aforesaid.

Wherefore the third defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Burton, K.C. (with him Mr. Howes) for plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington) for defendants.

Hugo Michaelis stated he resided at Cape Town, and was trustee in the insolvent estate of Goldstuck. Witness put in the schedules in the estate, which showed liabilities at £11,678, and assets at £3,965, for immovable property, £1,562 for stock-in-trade and movable property, and £4,217 outstanding. After witness was appointed he went to the district of Hope Town, where the insolvent had resided. The bank proved for £3,281. The total amount of the debts proved in the estate was £11,905 16s. 1d. The assets realised outstandings £87 14s., but from the total amount had to be taken the bond of £3,500. Two of the amounts in the outstandings had been advanced as collateral security to the Standard Bank. They amounted to £240. Owing to the faulty way in which the insolvent kept his books it was impossible to take proceedings to recover the outstandings. It was impossible to find specified accounts, and consequently many accounts had to be abandoned. The movables realised £298 6s. 10d., with the exception of 22 ostriches, which were subsequently sold together with the farm. The prices realised were very fair. The goods were in a very poor condition. The farm realised £2,500, although it was brought up in the schedules at £3,965. That left a final deficiency of £4,969.

In cross-examination by Mr. Schreiner, the witness stated that Hirsch and Loubser were the principal creditors. Witness said that the action was instituted by several of the creditors. It was the Port Elizabeth creditors who were pushing the bank. The outstandings that could not be recovered were sold by public auction. Witness could not say that the farm Zaaidam was more valuable than Vrouwpan. Witness could not say the value of Vrouwpan. He had sold Zaaidam for £2,400.

Alexander Yule, accountant, in the employment of Hirsch, Loubser and Co., of Port Elizabeth, stated that he was sent out to insolvent's farm in September last. Insolvent resided on the farm Zaaidam, and his sons held the next farm. He carried on a business at Vrouwpan for insolvent. Witness drew up a balance sheet for Goldstuck, and found he had a balance to his credit of £410. The farm property was put down at £3,965 at Goldstuck's valuation. The live stock was valued at £600, also by Goldstuck. The insolvent communicated to witness his liabilities. Goldstuck kept his books very badly, not specifying to whom payments were made from time to time.

In cross-examination, witness stated that in September last, after he had made his investigation, he handed Goldstuck £200 to purchase wool for Hirsch, Loubser, and also sent him on goods. When witness went to Vrouwpan he knew that the farm had been sold.

[Buchanan, J.: Did you give Goldstuck the £200 before or after you had inspected the estate?—Before.

Witness (continuing) said he asked Goldstuck's son for a return of the money, as he was doubtful about leaving it. Witness went down to Vrouwpan again in November. He wrote to his principals whilst up there. He really went up to collect overdue accounts. He did not get cash, but some "bills," which were no good. Goldstuck offered witness stock, but witness told him to sell them and send on the amount as a remittance.

Witness further stated that Goldstuck had not sent along £200 worth of produce, and he wrote to him advising him to go to Port Elizabeth and settle the matter up amicably.

Do you mean to say that you went up to see this man and threaten him with a criminal prosecution?—Yes.

But he was not amenable to that sort of thing, was he?—No.

Mr. Loubser, of the firm of Hirsch and Loubser, stated his firm had dealt with Goldstuck for about 12 years. He carried on a mercantile and farming business at Zaaidam. In 1904 they got from him a power of attorney to pass a bond dated July 8. He acknowledged his indebtedness to the firm of between £3,000 and £4,000, and gave authority to bind Zaaidam and Vrouwpan for a special bond to that amount. They also got his title-deeds, which they continued to hold. He requested them not to pass the bond, so they held it over. On April 25, 1906, they sent the title-deeds to insolvent, at his request. They wrote several letters asking for their return. Goldstuck wrote back on May 31 stating he had not received transfer. The next letter witness received was on August 20, informing him of the sale of the farm. They wrote to him to go to Port Elizabeth to see them, and he did so. They had bought the farm Zaaidam.

In cross-examination, the witness stated he was in Port Elizabeth in September when Goldstuck went down, but he left in October, and did not return until August. Many of the documents put in by witness were received and sent by his partners. The power of attorney passing the bond was drawn up in September. Witness discussed the position with Goldstuck, and took the bond as a set-off to the deed of transfer previously in his possession. At the time the bond was taken they had not arrived at the conclusion that Goldstuck was hopelessly insolvent. Mr. Yule was sent up to investigate, but did not send in any report. He just submitted the balance sheet. Mr. Goldstuck was written to on October 23, stating that he owed £2,200, and asking him if it would not be desirable to remove his stock from Vrouwpan to Zaaidam. Witness's firm did not take any steps to sequester Goldstuck's estate. Witness objected to the bank having a mortgage on the property and his firm having none. Witness had known Goldstuck for 12 years, and trusted him and gave him credit until about two years ago, when they took over the power of attorney. A bond was not issued until September, 1906. Witness did not know before he went to England that Goldstuck had gone security for Gallowitz. Goldstuck led them to believe that the bank was going to advance him £1,000 to stock his son's farm.

Did you really think the bank was going to do anything like that when you knew the state of his account?—That was what we understood.

Witness (continuing) said he had always found Goldstuck honest in his dealings.

In re-examination witness said that when he received Yule's report he came to the conclusion that Goldstuck was hopelessly insolvent. Taking his assets at the value put on them by Goldstuck into consideration, witness arrived at the conclusion that the margin was not sufficient to conduct such a business.

Claude V. Krummech, a clerk in the Deeds Office, produced the bonds, etc.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Benjamin Goldstuck stated he had been sixteen or seventeen years in South Africa. He came here from Russia. He had always lived in the country between Hope Town and Prieska, and could only speak Dutch. He paid £2,600 for Zaaidam, and improved it much, spending £1,200 in doing so. He brought it up in his schedule as valued at £3,960. He bought Vrouwpan after. It was larger than Zaaidam, but the latter was better. He gave £1,900 for it, and spent £600 in improvements. Later he had business at both farms. He sold the stock for £1,000, and the farm for £2,500. He went on with the business till November, 1906, after which he carried on the business at Zaaidam only, his sons carrying on the other business. He had two bonds—one for £1,800 on Zaaidam, and one for £1,400 on Vrouwpan. When he first thought of selling Vrouwpan, he was surety for one Nieberg, to whom he had also lent £800, and who went insolvent, and the bank was pressing him. He told his sons that he would sell them the farm, and they must arrange to pay the bank's claims. Nobody from the bank suggested that he should sell to his sons. After they had agreed to purchase the farm, witness went to the bank and told them, and the local manager said he could not do anything until he heard from Cape Town. Later on witness received a letter from the bank, stating they approved of the sons purchasing the farm. Witness would have been better off in this respect. He would not owe the bank anything. Witness considered £2,500 was a fair price for the farm. It had cost him that amount. Witness's sons kept his books for him. After the receipt of the letter from the bank, witness went to Hope Town, and saw the bank's attorney (Mr. Van Coller), and the documents were drawn up. Witness left them with him, and eventually heard the bond had been passed. They made an agreement that the sons should pay over £100 a year and the interest. Witness told the bank manager the arrangement was to be made in June. He had no expectation of insolvency then. He had had no threats of sequestration; £2,500 was a fair price for the farm. From time to time he gave balance-sheets to the bank. The last was in February, 1906. The figures were in the handwriting of the bank manager, and detailed by witness. The bond was passed on August 1. After he communicated with Hirsch and Loubser, Yule went up to see him. He told Hirsch and Loubser that the bank had promised to stock the farm with £1,000. He had paid £1,000, and considered that as if the bank had given him £1,000 for the stock. His sons had purchased £1,000 worth of stock from him, and that money was put into the bond. He owed the bank on Nieberg's account between £1,700 and £1,800. He showed Yule all his books, and gave him all the information he could. He gave Hirsch and Loubser power to pass a bond when he was in Port Elizabeth in September. They passed the bond, and wrote to him in October. Gallowitz was his son-in-law. He had a shop at Prieska. Witness had guaranteed Gallowitz for £1,000. In June Gallowitz paid off £300. Witness could not say how he got the money; he did not give it to him.

In cross-examination, witness stated, although he had carried on business at Zaaidam for twelve years, his cash-book only began in July, 1906. Prior to that the only books he had were little ones, written in Yiddish. The reason why he kept books in English was to see his position. Witness had had business dealings with Heydenrich, Nieberg, Ashpole, and Yallowitz, and lost money through them. Nieberg, Ashpole, and Gallowitz had all become insolvent. With regard to Gallowitz, he had a letter from the bank in April, stating that Gallowitz had renewed the bill for four months, which was contrary to the agreement, and that he was opening a business at Prieska. He paid his bill off a little at a time. Witness could not say when Gallowitz came to this country. When witness's daughter married him, he trekked about the country with horses and cart, selling jewellery. He had £1,500 or £1,600 when witness's daughter married him. Witness denied that he financed Gallowitz. Witness borrowed £250 in September from Gallowitz to buy produce. Witness had no reason to suspect, in November, that Gallowitz was going insolvent. He had always had good reports from people coming from Prieska.

It is very strange that you should have written to the bank on November 8, stating that Gallowitz had surrendered. Did you get information from him?—No.

When Michaelis was round in January, 1906, he insisted on witness signing bills for Gallowitz. Witness did not tell Michaelis that Gallowitz was all right. Witness rendered balance-sheets to the bank at intervals.

They progress backwards. In February, 1906, you show a balance of £6,450?—Yes.

And in May, you show a balance of £3,491?—I do not know. I did not make up the books.

[Buchanan, J.: That was not sent to the bank?]

Mr. Burton: It is in his books. (To witness): Can you explain the difference of £3,000 between February and May?—I cannot.

Between May and September there is another drop of £3,000. In the latter month you have only a balance of £418. We know Nieberg let you in for £1,600. What happened to the £1,400?—I put in my estimate of the value of the things I sold, and Mr. Yule put down his valuation. He was present when Yule put the valuation on.

On July we find £320 paid in wages; what is that?—That is for my clerks.

How many clerks do you employ?—Two.

Your sons?—Yes.

And in July you paid your sons £320?—Yes; it was due to them as wages for the time they worked for me. Over three years.

Did you pay it in a bulk sum, or spread over the three years?—Over the three years. They were entitled to over £500.

Later on in the same month you have a sum of £200 for wages. How do you account for that?—That was due to my sons, but I did not pay them.

His eldest son had been in his employ four years, and the youngest 2½ years.

If you paid them nothing on the last day, what made you enter that you had?—I was going to have a reckoning up with them. The eldest son got £8 a month, but after the farm was purchased the eldest son only got £5, and the youngest, who had been receiving £5, only got £3.

What is the meaning of the entry, dead stock, in November, £360. I see in September you value your stock at over £600, and in November they have reduced £360 in value?—The stock died from the drought and the subsequent rain.

Witness denied that he had told Mr. Michaelis that the bank manager told him to sell the property to his sons.

It was your own idea then to sell to your sons?—Yes. It was not a very big idea.

It was rather a good idea for your sons and yourself and the bank?—I only did it so that the bank would not press me. Continuing, witness said he wrote to Hirsch and Loubser for his title deeds, because the bank wanted them. Witness did not say that Hirsch and Loubser had power of attorney to pass a bond over the property. Witness and the bank manager agreed that the sons should pay £100 a year on the bond. After the bond had been passed, witness did not get a further advance from the bank. Witness understood the bank had a cover for its money.

You expected no more trouble from them?—No. The bank manager knew witness had debts. He knew he owed £4,000 to Hirsch and Loubser and £1,500 on behalf of Gallowitz. No suggestion was made to witness that the bank should have a second bond on the farm, but witness suggested it.

Mr. Wetney, bank manager at Hope Town, stated he had been there for five or six years. He had prepared statements of Goldstuck's accounts with the bank. They consisted of five accounts altogether, and were as follows: Adv. accounts 1 and 2, ordinary account, collateral security and bill account. Adv. account No. 1 was started on a £1,400 bond, and was a current account up to £1,400; No. 2 was in connection with Gallowitz's bond for £500: the ordinary account gave the paid-in amounts and cheques; collateral security account was opened with regard to pledged bills the bank held. The bill account showed the position of bills at any time. Goldstuck gave the bank balance sheets for 1903-4-5 and 6. Witness kept all balance sheets. De Villiers and Scholtz witnessed the earlier ones, and witness the latter. He wrote down the figures. He often did so for farmers. The bank indebtedness was taken from the books. The farm Zaidam was brought up in 194 as valued at £4,000.

His 1906 balance showed over £6,000 in his favour. Goldstuck owed the bank £3,240. Between June and July, 1906, Nieberg, who was a party with Goldstuck on bills for between £1,100 and £1,200, inclusive of £935 with Gallowitz, became insolvent. After Nieberg's insolvency witness knew there was a loss of £1,600. Nieberg had been in difficulties for between 12 and 18 months.

Witness did not know that it made Goldstuck's position precarious, but it made it less substantial. On June 15 Goldstuck called on witness and told him he would like to arrange to meet the bank and sell the farm to his children and give a bond to the bank.

Witness did not suggest that plan to him. Witness told him he was perfectly satisfied, and said he would refer the matter to the general manager at Cape Town. A good deal of correspondence on the matter took place. Witness did not remain at Hope Town while the papers were drawn up. Witness had gone on a shooting trip to the Orange River Colony. Witness first saw the bond after the registration, and then noted the condition, and when Goldstuck visited Hope Town witness interviewed him on the subject. The bond was noted on December 29. On March 27 witness wrote to Goldstuck for his transfer. Witness had no idea the titles were with Hirsch, Loubser and Co. At that time there was no idea of another bond or sale to Goldstuck's sons. On August 6 the original cession was signed by Van Coller. Mr. Wege noted as Mr. Van Coller's name was already on the document as qq. for Goldstuck. Goldstuck also signed subsequently. The cession was not received as a collusive arrangement. It was a transaction in the ordinary course of business.

In cross-examination, witness stated he and Goldstuck were on very friendly terms. Witness wrote to him always as bank manager, not privately. He was always being requested to reduce his account. Early in 1906 Goldstuck told witness he would have to sell his stock to pay his liabilities. Witness did not insist on his reducing his liability. He allowed him to renew. Prior to 1906 he had a large liability to Nieberg. £1,400 was secured by overdraft. In 1906 Goldstuck owed the bank £1,466. The ordinary account was only opened in June, 1906. The bank held two bills as collateral security. In February, bills for £400 and £700 fell due. Witness was astounded at Goldstuck's insolvency. Witness knew the estate paid nothing to concurrent creditors. Witness did not know that Hirsch and Loubser had the deed till after he had got it. Goldstuck may have told him that that firm had a power to pass a bond. Witness did not know that Goldstuck's sons had no money. He thought that with the guidance and assistance of their father they would be able to comply with the arrangements. Witness before he left instructed Van Collier to get the papers ready for an ordinary mortgage bond. Goldstuck sold the property to settle with the bank. Witness did not tell the head office about the £100 condition. The head office suggested a second bond, but witness did not like it as Goldstuck's proposal was better. Witness now knew that the sons could not pay. Possibly they might procure assistance. Witness did not enter the £1,000 guarantee, as it was not a debt.

Simon Goldstuck, one of the defendants, stated he was 23 years of age. He and his brother, who was 19, purchased the farm Zaaïdam from his father at what they considered a fair valuation. When witness purchased the farm, he did not know that his father was insolvent, or that there was any likelihood of his insolvency. It was not for that reason that he purchased the farm.

In reply to Mr. Burton, witness said he could not say the amount he had when he purchased the farm, but he had some money. Witness offered to pay the bond every month, but the first two months that it became due he did not send it, not because he had not got it, but because he could not get into town, as his father was absent from home. When witness's father returned, £35 was sent in by post.

Evidence of a corroborative nature having been given, Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Mr. Burton said that the consideration of this matter naturally fell into two divisions. The first was the case of the trustee against the two sons of the insolvent to have the sale of the farm Vrouwpan declared null and void, under the 83rd section of the Ordinance, or as an alienation in fraud of creditors, and the second was the case against the Standard Bank to have a bond of £3,500 set aside as an undue preference. With regard to the first part of the case, they had the fact that in July and prior to the 1st August, 1906, there was in the estate of Goldstuck the farm Vrouwpan, valued at £2,500. There was also a certain amount of stock. Then the property was made away with and was no longer available, except that one of the creditors, the Standard Bank, had a mortgage bond for £3,600. Plaintiff said that the circumstances of the sale by the insolvent to his sons were such as to fall within the terms of the 83rd section of the Ordinance, and that the trustee of the insolvent estate was entitled to say that the sale and transfer to the sons should be declared null and void. He submitted that there was no clear proof that between July and August the insolvent's liabilities fairly calculated exceeded his assets fairly valued. For the sake of convenience he would take the date as the 9th July.

From the insolvent's statement, they were asked to believe that he had a balance of £6,450 in February, 1906, while his schedules showed a deficiency in December, 1906, of £1,900, and the realisation of the estate showed a deficiency of £4,919. On the 1st May insolvent showed a balance of £3,491, and in September he and Yule showed a balance of £418. Counsel contended that the insolvent greatly exaggerated the value of his assets. He submitted that the evidence as to improvements alleged to have been made by the insolvent on the farm Zaaïdam was unsatisfactory, and that what the Court had to consider was what was the proper value of the farm, not what had the insolvent spent on improvements. The whole transaction between insolvent and the first two defendants showed a want of bona fides, and a desire to benefit his children at the expense of his creditors. Coming to the second part of the case, Mr. Burton said that the power to cede the bond to the bank was dated the 9th July, and the bond was actually ceded on the 9th August. The insolvent sent in his schedule on the 17th December, and the surrender was accepted on the 17th January. The question arose whether, under Act 38, 1884 (sec. 8), this cession could not be set aside as a collusive arrangement. If the Court took the date of the actual cession, then the transaction would be within the period of six months, but, if the date of the power were taken, the transaction would be out by one week. The circumstances were such that, he submitted, the Court would take the date of completion of the transaction. Counsel cited Sluiter's Trustee v. J. O. Smith and Co. (8 E.D.C., 9), and Cillier's Trustee v. Cilliers (13, S.C., 68). Apart from the question of period, the insolvent when he entered into the transaction clearly contemplated the surrender of his estate, and he intended to prefer the bank to his other creditors. He cited Van Reenen's Trustee v. Abrahams (1, C.T.R., 329), and Smith v. Carpenter (1869, Buch., 214).

Mr. Schreiner said the Court required proof by the trustee of a collusive arrangement before a case of this kind succeeded. He cited in support the case of Du Plooy v. Pluman (7, Juta, p. 332), in which Mr. Justice Buchanan laid down that principle. He did not know how the trustee could expect to succeed under section 84 of the Insolvent Ordinance, when he had not shown undue preference. If plaintiff succeeded on part 1 of his case, then he could only succeed if it was proved that the bank was a party to a fraud. Counsel then proceeded to review the evidence. He argued that Goldstuck's evidence was extremely satisfactory, and such as to give favourable colour to his statement that at the time of the transfer of the farm to his sons he had no idea of becoming insolvent. He maintained that there was no shadow of ground for impeaching the transaction on the part of the sons. They should not be stigmatised as parties to a fraud unless there was the clearest proof of it. He said that the insolvent had always been available to give an explanation of his transactions and books. The trustee who impeached the figures must prove that they are wrong, and he had produced no proof at all of the condition of the estate at the time of the transaction. He accounted for the large falling off in the insolvent's balance-sheet from £6,400 in February, 1906, to about £3,490 in May, 1906, by suggesting that between the two dates he had received an account from Hirsch, Loubser and Co., showing that, instead of his debt to that firm being £2,600, it was really £4,200. But even that large difference did not sweep away his assets, and make the result a deficiency. Mr. Schreiner said that a very strong case in his favour was that of Goosen's Trustee v. Goosen (1 Appeal Court, 414) and Hugo's Trustee v. Lindenberg (in 2 Juta), where if a man did not contemplate insolvency, although his position was an insolvent one, but did what he did to improve his position, his action could not be impeached. He said that Slater's case in the E.D. Court laid down that the old law was in no way altered by the Act of 1884, but that the new law merely shifted the onus of showing contemplation of insolvency. The same doctrine was laid down in our Court in the South African Loan, Mortgage and Mercantile Agency v. the Cape of Good Hope Bank (6 Juta, 163), in which the Chief Justice said that if the insolvent did not pass the bond in the view of supervening bankruptcy, and to disturb the proper distribution of assets under that bankruptcy, the Court would not consider it an undue preference. He also quoted Du Plooy's Trustee v. Pluman (7 Juta). He concluded by urging that there was no proof that the Court would consider satisfactory that the insolvent's assets, fairly valued, would not meet his liabilities, fairly estimated, at the time of the sale of the farm to the sons.

Mr. Burton, K.C., in reply, referred to Jordan's Trustee v. Fletcher (11 S.C.R., 43). He said that the Act did not say that the decision of the matter hung upon the value which the insolvent placed upon his assets, but as to what their value was when fairly valued by others.

Buchanan, J.: At first sight this case bears a somewhat complicated aspect, but upon analysis the issues will be found to work out with tolerable simplicity. The plaintiff is the trustee in the insolvent estate of Benjamin Goldstuck; the defendants are the two sons of this Goldstuck and the Standard Bank of South Africa, but the cases against the defendants are divisible. In the first place, the plaintiff seeks to set aside a transaction between the insolvent and his two sons with reference to the sale and transfer of the farm Vrouwpan. This transaction is attacked under the 83rd section of the Insolvent Ordinance. The evidence shows that the insolvent Goldstuck was a farmer and trader, carrying on his trading business upon his farm, and was supported by Hirsch, Loubser and Co., of Port Elizabeth. At the time he was so carrying on the business he had incurred liabilities to the Standard Bank who held a mortgage bond for £1,400 over one of the two farms belonging to Goldstuck, namely, Vrouwpan. The other farm (Zaaidam) had a bond upon it, due to a charitable institution, and held by a Mr. MacIntosh, a partner in the firm of Hirsch, Loubser and Co., for the sum of £1,800. The Standard Bank, judging from the accounts put in, had been in the habit of allowing Goldstuck to draw upon a general account up to £1,400, the extent to which they were secured by their bond. In July one Nieburg with whom Goldstuck had business transactions, became insolvent, or was in such difficulties that he was unable to take up his obligations, and some £700 of his promissory notes, endorsed by Goldstuck, were in the Standard Bank. The bank pressed Goldstuck for a settlement. Incidentally it was stated in evidence that Goldstuck was advised by a friend to sell Vrouwpan, and so relieve himself of his liabilities to the bank. He was unwilling to do so, but entered into the agreement now attacked. He suggested to his elder son Nicholas that he should buy the farm, and pass a bond over it for the purchase price. Nicholas Goldstuck was not willing to do this unless his younger brother would become a partner in the transaction. It was finally agreed between the brothers to enter into the transaction and become partners in the farm and in the new business to be carried on there. But the Standard Bank holding a bond over the farm, no such transaction could go through without its concurrence. The Standard Bank agreed to the sale, and the farm was transferred by Goldstuck to his two sons, together with some stock, and a mortgage bond for the amount of £3,500 was passed by the sons in favour of their father. This is the transaction which is attacked under the 83rd section. This section deals with malafide or gratuitous alienation. It enacts that every alienation of pledge of goods made at a time when it should be made to appear by proof that the liabilities of the insolvent, fairly calculated, exceed the assets fairly valued, shall, unless the same be made bona fide and for just and valuable consideration, be null and void. The section then goes on to say that whenever the necessary effect of such alienation is to create an excess of liabilities over the assets, then such alienation shall be void to the extent of such excess. Under this section the plaintiff bringing an action must, in the first place, prove that the insolvent's assets fairly valued do not equal his liabilities fairly calculated, and it is this point in this case which, to my mind, causes the greatest difficulty. The onus is upon the plaintiff, and I have been closely following the argument to see whether I could not say that this point has been established. The evidence shows that from time to time, the insolvent for years past supplied the bank with balance sheets showing his position, and they show that up to February of last year the balance in favour of the insolvent amounted to over £6,000. In May of last year the insolvent seems to have taken stock, and the figures brought up in his books show a balance to his credit of £3,400—a considerable reduction on the previous balance. But, on looking at the details of the second valuation, it will be seen that, whereas in the statement given to the Standard Bank in February, he brought up his creditors Hirsch, Loubser and Company for the sum of some £2,000 only, subsequently this was increased by a considerable amount, and it is suggested that the increase has arisen from the fact that the accounts of that firm were not regularly rendered, and the amount of the interest charged upon the current account increased insolvent's liability considerably beyond what was stated in previous balance sheets. The next statement of assets and liabilities put before the Court was the one prepared in September, by the representatives of Messrs. Hirsch, Loubser and Co. After all the transactions with the sons had gone through and were known to the creditors, Mr. Yule went to Hope Town, where the insolvent was carrying on his business, and on behalf of his principals took stock, and made out a balance sheet in which he showed a balance of £500 still in favour of the estate. It is perfectly true that the books of the insolvent render the trustee very little assistance in his work in connection with the estate. That is an unfortunate circumstance which is to the disadvantage of the trustee, but it is not necessarily a matter which could be taken advantage of as against the two defendants, so as to do away with the necessity of proving the condition of the estate at the date the transaction now attacked was entered into. The defendants have pleaded to the claim to set aside the sale, that amongst other things, it was for just and valuable consideration, and in the ordinary course of business. I may say at once that I do not think any Court would hold this transaction to be one in the ordinary course of business. To sell the property and to take a bond for the full amount of purchase price, is not what one would call a transaction in the ordinary course of business, but it must be borne in mind that the 83rd section does not require the transaction to be one in the ordinary course of business, but only that it must be made bona fide even when the liabilities fairly calculated exceed the assets fairly valued. Therefore, upon the very threshold of the case the state of the assets and liabilities is a matter which must be clearly established. Looking at the balance sheets, which have been produced, one may fairly say that where creditors like Hirsch, Loubser, and Company, who, after having been put upon their guard, take a balance-sheet with a knowledge of all the facts before them, some time after the event and find that the assets fairly valued did exceed the liabilities fairly calculated, the Court would not be justified in bringing the transaction under the 83rd section. It is true that in the balance-sheets there was no mention made of certain contingent liabilities of the insolvent. These contingent liabilities arose from the transactions insolvent had with Nieberg and the guarantee he had given for Gallowitz, but at that time neither of these transactions had altered the state of the balance-sheet of the insolvent. It is true that Nieberg had been considered to be in difficulties for some time before, but it was only about July that his affairs came to a crisis, and these contingent liabilities became immediate liabilities of Goldstuck's, and had to be met by him. Gallowitz became insolvent later on, and it was known to all the parties that since 1904 the insolvent had been guaranteeing him to the extent of £1,000. Goldstuck subsequently increased that guarantee without the knowledge, apparently, of his creditors, but still that liability did not fall due until the failure of Gallowitz, when it was found that the insolvent had become liable for a balance of £1,500 due to Dunell, Ebdon and Company. The insolvencies of Nieberg and Gallowitz, and the failure of other creditors to pay their debts, certainly brought down Goldstuck toward the end of that year, but at the time that the transaction now in question was entered into, I do not think it was contemplated by him that insolvency was either inevitable or probable. The transaction was made with a view to meet the liability with which he was faced in regard to Nieberg. Goldstuck rejected the proposal to sell the farm to pay this account, preferring rather to sell the farm to his sons in the manner which has been described. Another difficulty which I have arises from the fact that for the farm and the stock sold for £3,500 a mortgage bond was passed for the whole of the amount over the landed property, with the general clause. I find difficulty in seeing how the estate was diminished or lessened in value by the transaction, except possibly to this extent, that the £1,000 of stock was an asset which could be used by the purchasers and against which they only gave the mortgage bond, whereas the landed property could not be alienated or dealt with in any way so long as the debt was upon it. The effect of the transaction was to keep the value of the farm an asset in the insolvent estate. Therefore, the transaction, although not in the ordinary course of business, was for a just and valuable consideration. It was entered into bona fide in this sense, that there was no secrecy about it, the insolvent informing the Standard Bank of the transaction, and obtaining their consent to its going through. Though holding this to be a transaction not to be cancelled under the 83rd section, that does not necessarily dispose of the whole case. After the bond was passed, it was ceded to the Standard Bank, and it was alleged that the cession to the Standard Bank was an undue preference under section 84 of the Insolvent Ordinance. Formerly in practice it was always difficult to prove an undue preference, because the intention to prefer and contemplation of insolvency was a condition of the mind of the insolvent. This contemplation of insolvency was formerly required to be proved by the plaintiff; but the Act 38 of 1884 shifted the onus of proof, and raised a presumption of this contemplation in any case in which the transaction challenged took place within six months of the insolvency, if it was proved by the person seeking to set aside the transaction that at the time the assets fairly valued were less than the liabilities fairly calculated. Hence the necessity in a case of undue preference, when it is desired to take the benefit of this presumption, of proving the condition of the estate at the time of the transaction. The question of the condition of the assets and liabilities of the insolvent therefore stands at the very threshold of an action under either of the clauses of the Ordinance. I cannot upon the evidence before me hold that the onus of proof which in this case lies upon the plaintiff, has been discharged. Even had the fact been proved, it would only raise a presumption. It has still to be considered whether there is otherwise sufficient evidence of contemplation of insolvency. A question has arisen whether, as the transaction was arranged in July, and Goldstuck's insolvency only took place in the subsequent January, the benefit of the Act of 1884 could be taken advantage of by the plaintiff.

But I think not only is that question doubtful, but also that he could not take advantage of the presumption, seeing that he has failed to prove that the assets were insufficient to meet the liabilities at the time of the transaction. In considering whether the transaction was an undue preference, the Court is bound, as has been frequently laid down, to consider all the circumstances in the case. The mere statement of the insolvent that he had not the expectation of insolvency in his mind is not necessarily conclusive, where the Court is satisfied that he ought to have had this expectation in his mind, or that, considering all the circumstances, he ought to have known that the necessary consequence of his act such as the giving of security to one creditor, would be to bring all his other creditors upon him and force him into insolvency. In this case it is remarkable that although the principal creditors knew of this transaction in August, they did not thereupon take proceedings so as to set aside the security given to the bank. On the contrary, they themselves in September took a mortgage for £2,500 in their favour upon the other property of the insolvent, and we also find that their representative, Yule, on visiting Hoptown and going through the insolvent's books, actually gave him £200 to enable him to purchase produce. Further, from the accounts put in, I find that these creditors continued to supply goods to the insolvent until very shortly before the actual sequestration. It was not the ceding of the bond that brought about the insolvency, it was the subsequent failures of persons with whom the insolvent had had business transactions that were the immediate cause of a sequestration of his estate. When the liability for Gallowitz had been changed from a contingent liability to an actual liability, owing to Gallowitz's failure, Goldstuck consulted his principal creditors, and on their advice he then prepared his schedules and surrendered his estate. It was therefore not in consequence of the cession of the bond to the bank that the sequestration came about, but in consequence of other matters—these other insolvencies falling about his ears, and other losses—that rendered the insolvent unable to perform his obligations to his creditors. As to the question of collusion it is sought to cause the Standard Bank to forfeit their claim under section 86, but if the sale is not to be set aside, and if the undue preference is not proved, the claim of forfeiture by reason of any collusive arrangement necessarily falls to the ground. Judgment will therefore be given for the defendant with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

BAM V. BAM.

1907.
{ Aug. 21st.

The plaintiff Amelia Johanna Bam (born De Villiers) sued her husband, Alfred Walter Bam, for a decree of judicial separation, on the ground of his intemperance and violence.

It appeared that the parties were married in 1881 at Darling. There are eight children of the marriage, the eldest being 25 and the youngest eight. Defendant denied the intemperance, and alleged that plaintiff had deserted him; he therefore claimed restitution of conjugal rights. Defendant was formerly secretary of the old Tramway Company, and had once been a broker and shipping agent.

Mr. D. Buchanan was for plaintiff, and Mr. Inchbold for defendant.

In evidence plaintiff alleged that defendant had never been temperate, and matters came to a crisis about four years ago. Apart from systematic intemperance, her husband used frightful language in her hearing and that of the children; in various ways he had humiliated them. He frequently cursed them, and expressed the hope that they would all be found dead.

Cross-examined: When he was half-drunk, defendant was most objectionable. Only once had she seen him really incapable. His cruelty consisted in the use of foul language, for he never struck her. Formerly she used to submit quietly to his abuse, but she discovered that if she retaliated a little he was more quickly subdued, but she never cursed him. To keep quiet under defendant's abuse one would have had to be made of blood and iron.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is there any possibility of the parties agreeing upon some compromise?]

Mr. Inchbold: We are still willing to adhere to our offer—defendant to go away for a year, allow plaintiff £6 a month, and she to keep the children until he comes back about a year hence. [Why not have a deed of separation altogether?]

In that case he would want the boys to live with him.

[Will he deny intemperance?]

Mr. Inchbold: Yes; we have witnesses who can prove that he was not intemperate.

Mr. Buchanan: My client feels that she cannot accept anything but a deed of separation.

Plaintiff, re-examined, stated that she was not willing to go back to her husband.

Defendant stated that he had never been addicted to intemperance, and had never used threatening language to his wife, or ill-treated her. There were words about the children, but he had never cursed her. The children treated him in an insulting manner, and they were the cause of the trouble—especially the two elder ones. The mother took their part, and that was how all the trouble had arisen. It was untrue that he did not contribute towards the household expenses.

Cross-examined: He was as fond of his wife now as he was on the day he married her, and he also loved the children, with the exception of the two elder children. Unfortunately, his wife had taken their part.

Maria Bam, the eldest daughter, said she had often seen her father the worse for liquor, when he was frequently violent. On one occasion he threatened to cut their throats and his own as well. She had heard him call her mother names.

Cross-examined: The defendant had thrown a joint of meat at her. He did not keep wine in the house.

Isaac Bam stated that he had frequently seen his father in an intemperate state, and had also heard him call his mother and sisters most insulting names.

Mr. Inchbold: Did your mother ever say anything back?

Witness: Rather.

Susan Elizabeth Bam said she had often seen her father under the influence of liquor. He had frequently cursed and swore at plaintiff, and on one occasion, he was going to raise his hand against her when witness's brother stopped him.

Jessie Alfreda Bam deposed that she had frequently seen her father the worse for liquor.

This closed the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Inchbold called

A coloured domestic, formerly in the employ of the parties. During the three months of her service, witness said she had never seen defendant intoxicated nor had she heard him use strong language.

Frank Tyson Hopkirk said he had known defendant for about four years, and although he saw him almost daily, he had never seen him the worse for liquor.

Julius Heyneker stated that he had known defendant for a long time, having lived next door to him for years. He had never heard noises from the Bam's house as if the parties were quarrelling, nor had he seen defendant the worse for drink.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J., asked plaintiff if there was any chance of their living together again?

Plaintiff replied that defendant had so frequently deceived her that she had lost faith in him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it not be more satisfactory, the parties having come to such a state, that defendant should have his plea of restitution and there should be a divorce?]

Mr. Buchanan: It would be exceedingly hard on the wife that she should have to suffer the stigma of a divorce.

[I mean for her own sake. If you succeed in getting a judicial separation they are still husband and wife, and she is tied to him still.]

She has no objection to a divorce, provided she is given the custody of the children.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is in every way a painful case, and I was in hopes up to the last that the parties would come to some arrangement for living together again, and forgetting the past, but I gather from the evidence that it is hopeless to expect it. The test in cases of this kind is whether the general misconduct on the part of defendant has been so great as to make further living together insupportable to plaintiff. I am bound to say that the evidence in this case, although conflicting, has convinced me that the conduct of defendant has been very improper towards his wife in every way. Although he never actually struck her he used language towards her which no husband should use, and which she certainly never deserved. He has threatened to assault her, and although he might not have been serious in that threat, yet that threat—coupled with the fact that he did on several occasions show signs of intemperance—would justify the Court in granting a decree of judicial separation. It is true that others have not seen him intoxicated, and even a neighbour—Mr. Heyneker—has never seen him intoxicated. But that is not the test in cases of this kind, because a man would naturally prevent neighbours from seeing the condition in which he is, but he could not prevent his own people, living in the same house, seeing it. Mr. Heyneker speaks of what took place over a year ago, but as he never went into the house his evidence cannot be held to override the evidence of all the children of the parties who have been called. If it had been only one child who had given evidence, one might have understood that partiality for the mother might have induced that evidence, but three daughters and a son all agree that the father was continually intoxicated. I could not agree that these children had formed a conspiracy to give false evidence against their father. I believe their evidence to be correct—that there has been habitual intemperance on the part of defendant. He denies this; naturally he has not considered he has been so bad as others have made him out to be. But there is the evidence of the children and the plaintiff that habitual intemperance has been continued, and the whole conduct of defendant towards his wife has been such that she cannot reasonably be expected any longer to live with him. For plaintiff is entitled to a decree of judicial separation, and is entitled to the custody of the minor children of the marriage, but, of course, defendant must have access to them at all reasonable times and places. Plaintiff does not press for costs, nor do I think it is likely that she would obtain costs from him, and under all the circumstances I think each party might pay their own costs. I am prepared to reserve leave to defendant to apply for the custody of the children on proof that they are not being properly cared for, or that reasonable access to them is not being allowed him.

REHABILITATIONS.

Mr. Roux applied, under the 117th section of the Insolvent Ordinance, for the discharge from insolvency of Wm. Temple Nourse. Counsel pointed out that the first liquidation account and plan of distribution was confirmed in December, 1906, while in the Master's certificate mention was only made of the fact that the second plan of distribution was confirmed in May, 1907.

Hopley, J., said that the matter had better stand over until the Master's certificate was corrected. The Master should look into the matter, and if he thought all the necessary steps had been taken by applicant, there would be no difficulty in the matter.

Later, Mr. Roux presented a corrected certificate by the Master, stating that the first liquidation account and plan of distribution was confirmed in December, 1906, and cited ex parte Siebert (17 C.T.R., 686).

Application granted.

Mr. H. G. Lewis applied, under the 117th section of the Ordinance, for the discharge from insolvency of Wilhelm Andreas Ole Wernberg.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte BECHUANALAND { 1907.
PRESS, LTD. { Aug. 21st.

Mr. M. Bisset moved, on the petition of J. P. Boyle and Wm. Dawson and Sons, for a winding-up order in the matter of the Bechuanaland Press, Ltd., and the appointment of an official liquidator. Petitioners stated that the company had carried on business at Vryburg, but that its affairs were at a standstill for want of control. The company owed Boyle £250, and Wm. Dawson and Sons £47 14s. 7d. The company was unable to pay its debts, and its assets exceeded its liabilities. Petitioners prayed that Mr. John Peter Frylinck, of D. Wessels and Co., Vryburg, be appointed official liquidator.

Ordered that the company be wound up as prayed, and that Mr. John Peter Frylinck be appointed provisional liquidator, rule to issue, returnable on the 24th September, calling upon all persons concerned to show cause why Mr. Frylinck should not be appointed official liquidator, with the powers under the 149th section of the Companies Act, publication once in the "Government Gazette," the "Diamond-fields Advertiser," and the "Bechuanaland News" (if still published).

BERGMANN V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

[The above matter was standing over at the date of going to press.]

Ex parte SNELL.

Mr. De Waal moved for the rectification of a certain diagram attached to transfer deeds of ground at Yzerplaats, Cape Division. Counsel explained that petitioner first bought one piece of ground, and afterwards bought an adjoining piece of ground, but when a survey was made it was found that a narrow strip remained between the two pieces of ground. Petitioner now desired to have this strip included in his diagrams.

Ordered that the Registrar of Deeds be authorised to substitute the diagram as recommended in his report.

Ex parte PETERSE.

Mr. Louwrens moved for the amendment of petitioner's name in certain transfer deeds, mortgage bonds, and ante-nuptial contract.

Order granted as prayed.

STEPHENS V. MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF NEW YORK.

This was an application upon notice to respondents to show cause why an order should not be granted declaring applicant to be alone entitled to the rights and benefits accruing from a certain policy of insurance, or the surrender, or lawfully deal with the same as applicant may think fit.

Mr. Benjamin, K.C., was for applicant, W. K. Stephens, of Stellenbosch; respondents did not appear.

It appeared that in 1891 applicant took out a life policy in the respondent company for £500. He purposed to give the policy to his wife for the benefit of herself and the family, but the gift was not accepted, and he claimed that it was revocable.

Order granted as prayed; no order as to costs.

Ex parte POTGIETER.

This was an application on behalf of the petitioner, Johannes Stephanus Frederick Potgieter, for an interdict restraining the respondents, Reuben Bresky and Marcus Hotz, from conveying to Frederick Matthys Christian Calitz certain land in the division of Oudtshoorn.

The affidavit of the petitioner set out that he was a farmer residing at Nooitgedacht, in the division of Oudtshoorn, and was 81 years of age. He was a creditor in the insolvent estate of Johannes Stephanus Frederick Potgieter, jun., whose estate was sequestrated on 1st August, 1907: his claim amounted to upwards of £4,000; the whole of which was unsecured. On 22nd May, the insolvent purchased from his brother Her-class Petrus Jacobus Hermanus Potgieter, portions of the farm Nooitgedacht for £3,550. Deponent interposed, and bound the debtor to the extent of £3,000, and passed a bond for that amount. The deponent further bound himself as surety and co-principal debtor for the accommodation and the insolvent to the respondents, Reuben Bresky and Marcus Hotz to the extent of £1,250, being an amount alleged to be due to respondents by the insolvent, and a mortgage bond was passed for that amount by the insolvent and deponent. Deponent was further induced and persuaded to bind the debtor for the accommodation of the insolvent to the extent of £900, being for a debt alleged to be due to the respondent Reuben Bresky, and a mortgage bond was passed by deponent and insolvent jointly. On 14th May, insolvent sold to the respondents the land purchased by him for £2,050, and the respondents sold it to Frederick M. C. Calitz for £2,750. No transfer had yet been passed to Calitz. The remainder of deponent's claim against the insolvent consisted of items for cash lent and advanced, debts taken over, and promissory notes. Deponent had strong and cogent reasons to suspect that no proper or full consideration had been given by respondents in respect of the items of £1,250 and £900, and that an undue advantage had been taken of him in his old age and feeble state of health. A full and proper account had been demanded from the respondents, but no satisfactory account had been rendered. At the date of the alienation by the insolvent of his landed property to the respondents, his liabilities were far in excess of his assets, and his estate was hopelessly and irretrievably insolvent. Deponent submitted that this alienation of the most important asset to the respondents was irregular, contrary to law, and in fraud of creditors, and that, under the circumstances attending the sale, he was in effect unduly preferring the respondents, and seriously prejudicing deponent's position as a large creditor, for the ground was worth considerably more than the amount for which the respondents had secured the same. He contemplated challenging the transaction between the insolvent and the respondents, as the principal creditor of the insolvent. He therefore submitted to the Court his application for an interdict restraining the respondents from conveying to Frederick Matthys Christian Calitz, or to any other person, the land acquired by them from the insolvent, pending an action to test the legality of the sale by the insolvent to respondents.

Mr. Bisset moved,

A rule nisi was granted, calling upon the respondents and F. M. C. Calitz to show cause why the respondents Bresky and Hotz should not be restrained from passing transfer to Calitz of the property purchased by Calitz from them, pending an action to be instituted by the applicant or the trustee of the insolvent estate when appointed.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

HOLZMANN V. MCKENZIE.

Mr. Gutsche moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £42, rent due from 1st February to 31st July, 1907, with interest and costs. Counsel explained that originally defendant entered appearance and declaration was filed, but the appearance was afterwards withdrawn.

BRANDON V. BRANDON.

This was an action brought by Daisy Pauline Florence Brandon, of Cape Town, against her husband, Charles Edward Brandon, for restitution of conjugal rights on the ground of his malicious desertion.

Mr. Wallach was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

Defendant was sued by edictal citation. It was stated that efforts had been made to discover his whereabouts, but without success, and substituted service, as directed, had been given.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in charge of the Marriage Register, Colonial Secretary's office, gave formal evidence of registration of the marriage.

Plaintiff said she was married to defendant on the 16th October, 1905. He came from England. She had known him for some years previously as a commercial traveller. They were married in community. There was one child of the marriage. After they had lived together for three days, he disappeared. She did not know where he went. She ascertained subsequently that he had been sentenced to seven months' imprisonment for forgery. In October, 1906, he reappeared, and stayed about two hours at her mother's house, where witness was living. He then went away, stating that he was going to see what he could do, and that he would write to her. She had not received any message from defendant since then. She had heard, in consequence of inquiries, that he had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment for housebreaking in Natal since she last saw him.

Defendant was ordered to restore conjugal rights on or before the 1st November, failing which, to show cause on the 14th November why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with custody to plaintiff of the child, and costs, service as before.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ERASMUS V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1907.
Aug. 23rd.
" 26th.

This was an action brought by Pieter Joshua Erasmus against the Secretary of Agriculture and the Colonial Government, in which he claimed a declaration of rights in respect of a portion of ground adjoining his farm, De List, situate in the district of Sutherland. The declaration stated that plaintiff bought the farm from P. J. Reynolds in 1899, and obtained transfer in 1900. Reynolds went over the ground with him, and pointed out the beacons. The piece of ground, which was now claimed as Government ground, he certainly believed belonged to the property. Plaintiff had used this land for his own benefit, as had all the other owners of the farm.

Defendant, in his plea, admits that the said piece of land has been fenced, but claims that it is Crown land, and refuses to acknowledge plaintiff's claim or to give transfer.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. Roux) was for the plaintiff; Mr. McGregor, K.C. (with him Mr. Nightingale) was for the defendant.

Pieter Joshua Erasmus, the plaintiff, said he was the owner of the farm De List, bought from Peter Reynolds in July, 1899. When he purchased the farm he went over the ground with the late proprietor, who pointed out the beacons. Shown the plan, witness said that it was correct. When the beacons were pointed out, the fence round the piece of ground was there; in fact, it was there now. This piece of ground was situated between the farms De List, Krans Kraal, and Vlakke Kraal. He had used that piece of ground ever since he bought the farm as his own, without recognising anybody else.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: He purchased the ground on the condition that he received possession after one year. He could not tell whether he saw the diagrams before he got transfer.

When did you first see the diagram?

—I cannot say.

You can see that this piece of blue ground on the map, which is the ground in dispute, is shown as distinct from your farm?—Yes.

[Maasdorp, J.: When did you first ascertain that there was a piece of ground not shown upon your diagram?—On January 25.

[Who made this discovery that the land was Government ground?]

Mr. McGregor: Well, my lord, two people have made application for it.

Cornelius Groenewald, one of plaintiff's attorneys, stated he had made a search in the Deeds Office. He handed in a list of the owners of the farm De List, which showed that K. A. Snyders, one of the former proprietors, owned the farms De List and Kranz Kraal. These farms were contiguous and included the piece of ground in dispute.

Peter Jacobus Reynolds said he formerly owned the farm De List, which he sold to plaintiff.

[Maasdorp, J.: I notice that your name is given as Peter James on the deed of transfer?]

Witness: Yes; that is a mistake.

[Did you not meet with some difficulty in effecting transfer?]

Witness: I don't recollect any, my lord.

In reply to Mr. Close, witness said that a neighbouring farmer, Bothma, did not use the ground in dispute during his occupation. Bothma did at one time want to make an exchange of a piece of ground for the ground in question, but witness did not agree to this. He never knew that there was Government ground there although Bothma said there was. Witness made investigations, and he was told by Mr. Bosman, of the Surveyor-General's office, that there was no Government ground between the farms De List and De Kranz.

Mr. McGregor: You did not get any letter from Mr. Bosman on the subject?—No.

What were his exact words?—As far as I recollect, he said, "Go and enclose the land, there is no Government ground between De List and De Kranz."

Did you sell the farm according to beacons or according to your title-deeds?—According to beacons. I pointed out the beacons as they were shown to me by Mr. Home, from whom I bought the farm.

Zachary Andina Swanepoel said she was one of the daughters of one of the former owners of the farm De List. The farm was sold in her father's estate to a Mr. Home. She was on the farm during Mr. Home's and Mr. Reynolds's occupation of the farm. Her first husband was manager. The farm De List she always understood, took in the ground which was now claimed as Government ground. She never heard anyone speak of Government ground in that particular part.

W. M. v. d. Westhuisen said he remembered when J. H. Snyders bought Government ground which he had already leased. People knew that there was Government ground round about. The piece of ground marked with blue was the ground in dispute. He did not know that it was a special ground until when he came down to Cape Town, and was desirous of buying certain land, he was informed that the particular piece marked on the chart was Government ground.

Zacharias Andrious Snyders said he was a son of the late proprietor of the farm De List, and said he always considered that the piece of ground belonged to the farm. He certainly never heard anyone specially refer to that piece of ground as Government ground.

Johan Hendrik Snyders said he was living on the farm Buffels Vlei, adjoining De List. He was a son of one of the owners of the latter farm. Witness pointed out that the farm Buffels Vlei he bought from Government. This farm he had formerly leased. If he had known that the piece of ground in dispute was Government land he would have bought that too.

Mr. Close closed his case.

Peter Benjamin Reynolds Winterbach said he lived now in the Prinse Albert district. He was manager of the farm De List during Mr. Home's occupation. The latter told him that the triangular piece of ground, shown on the map, was really Government ground, and that was why he did not extend his ostrich camp so as to include this ground. The ground was not fenced in 1894. When he first came to the farm his father-in-law, the last witness, told him that the ground belonged to Government.

Johan Hendrik Snyders (recalled) said that he had no recollection of telling his son-in-law in 1891 that the ground belonged to Government. He had heard statements that it belonged to Government, but these were disputed.

Huybregge Grebenhouw said that her late husband's employer, Mr. Bothma, told her that the ground was Government ground, and she could allow the sheep to graze there.

Gertrude Maria du Plessis said she lived on Bothma's farm; the latter's sheep used to graze on the ground in question. Other people's sheep grazed there also.

Daneel Johannes Grebenhouw corroborated the statement mentioned by the other witness for defendant, that this ground was generally considered to be Government ground. His father was shepherd under Mr. Bothma, and told Mr. Winterbach that he could beat him if he liked, but he would not remove his sheep from the piece of ground.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: How old are you now?

Witness: Twenty-one years.

How old were you when your father told you this?—Eight years.

What sort of a day was it?—I can't say.

Franz Stephanus Bothma, farmer in the Prince Albert district, said in 1892 he bought a neighbouring farm to that of De List. He reckoned at the time he was on the farm that the ground was Government ground. When he went down to the Surveyor-General, with two creditor against the defendant, and a writ of execution had been issued to which a return of nulla bona had been made. Defendant had thus committed an act of insolvency.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan, K.C., appeared for defendant, and opposed the application. Defendant denied that he had committed an act of insolvency, as alleged by petitioner. His assets, if fairly valued, exceeded his liabilities by about £200. It would be of no benefit to the creditors or himself if the estate was placed under sequestration. Counsel cited in re Reitz (5 Searle 101), Van der Poel v. Langerman (3 Menzies, 307), Marsh v. Makein (2 Juta, 104), and Dell v. Cairo (1 H.C. 393).

Mr. Sutton said that petitioner proceeded on two acts of insolvency. One was that defendant had failed to point out sufficient goods to satisfy the writ. The other was the judgment of a competent Court against the defendant.

Hopley, J.: It is quite possible that had the whole of the facts in this case been set out in the petition upon which a provisional order was granted no order would have been made by the learned Judge before whom the matter came. Petitioner states that defendant is indebted to her to the extent of £100 on a mortgage bond, and that there is a small amount of interest overdue on this bond, but she goes on to say that on the 3rd May a writ of execution was issued on a judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Cathcart, obtained by Elliott Bros. against defendant and one Brown, and on the 7th May the Messenger of the Court made a return on the writ of no property in respect of both debtors, and petitioner said that in failing to meet the amount of the execution aforesaid, Bright has committed an act of insolvency. The petition did not go on to say that thereafter the debtor was arrested, and that he is now making payments of £1 a month under such judgment, and to satisfy the same. Defendant has a trade; he has also property, and there is a dispute as to whether he is in insolvent circumstances, but, besides that, he has the great asset of his own energy and his own trade to fall back upon, and the Magistrate, considering all that, has granted a mode of satisfying this judgment, which is being carried out, and it seems that the act of insolvency ceased to be an act of insolvency when the satisfaction by means of monthly payments was arrived at, and that, therefore, when the petitioner in this case came and said he had not pointed out sufficient means of satisfying the judgment, she ought also to have been able to say "nor has he satisfied the same"; and I do not think she could have said that under the circumstances of this case. The judge, of course, presumed that defendant was not satisfying the same. It seems to me that on the present proceedings petitioner must fail, and the provisional order must be set aside, with costs.

HEYDENRYCH V. LEVI.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

STANDARD BANK V. BENKWITZ.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £326 1s. 6d., balance of account due to the bank, with interest, and that the property, under two mortgage bonds, be declared executable, with costs.

Order granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

VAN WYK V. VAN WYK. { 1907.
Aug. 23rd.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for a commission de bene esse to take the evidence of the plaintiff, and other witnesses at Calvinia, in an action instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant (his wife) for divorce by reason of her adultery. The defendant had not pleaded to the declaration, and had no right now to appear to defend the action.

Order granted as prayed, the Resident Magistrate of Calvinia to act as commissioner, notice of the commission to be served on the defendant.

Ex parte COOTE, NOBLE AND CO., LTD.

Mr. Louwrens moved for an order confirming a special resolution of the shareholders, reducing the capital of the company from £60,000 to £43,000, and for the registration of the minute in the Deeds Office. In the articles of association, no provision was made for the reduction of the capital of the company. The only creditor, the Standard Bank at Mossel Bay, agreed to the proposal.

Order granted as prayed, the minute approved of, notice to be published on-e in the "Gazette."

WAGENAAR V. KLEINBOOI.

Mr. Roux appeared for the applicant in certain two matters to move in the first instance for an interdict against the respondent restraining him from selling or transferring a certain erf at Oudtshoorn, the property of her late husband, in whose estate she was executrix dativo pending an action. The second application was on notice of motion, calling upon the respondent (applicant's husband and son of the first respondent) to show cause why she should not be granted leave to proceed for the transfer of the erf without his assistance.

The parties were married in community of property, and the respondent, with whom she was not at present living pending an action for divorce which she was about to institute against him, had refused to join her in the suit.

Hopley, J., taking the applications together, said, in the first case Mrs. Kleinbooi, executrix in the estate of her late husband, Solomon Wagenaar, asked that Hendrick Kleinbooi should be restrained from parting with a certain erf, of which she alleged she was entitled to one-quarter because her late husband, before his death, purchased and paid for it without getting transfer thereafter. The second application was for leave to institute proceedings against Hendrick Kleinbooi without the assistance of her husband, Nicholas Kleinbooi, who had refused to assist in the action against his father. The application to bring the action as executrix would be allowed without the assistance of her husband, but there would be no order as to costs against Nicholas Kleinbooi. An order would be granted restraining Hendrick Kleinbooi from parting with the erf in question pending an action in the ensuing Circuit Court.

Ex parte SCHOCHER.

Dr. Greer said that in this matter, which was an application to sue in forma pauperis for the recovery of £82 3s. 2d., alleged to be due for goods sold and delivered, he was unable to certify without fuller information.

The matter was referred to Dr. Greer.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

Ex parte GREEF AND OTHERS. { 1907.
Aug. 24th.

Constitution Ordinance—Voters' roll—Occupation—Grazing rights.

A structure consisting of wooden frame-work attached to poles fixed in the ground and covered on the top and on all sides with canvass or with iron, and used as a habitation held to be a house in terms of the 8th section of the Constitution Ordinance: but an ordinary tent held not to be such a house.

A male person who for twelve months lived in a house upon land occupied with such house under a lease of grazing rights held to be entitled to be registered as a voter where the value of the house, together with the grazing rights, is £75 or upwards.

This was an application by Gabriel P. Greef and a number of others for an order directing the registration officer to place their names on the roll of Parliamentary voters for the division of Prieska.

Mr. W. J. van Zyl was for applicants; Mr. Wallach appeared to oppose.

Mr. Van Zyl said that in Greef and others, Weessels P. Germershuys and others, and Cloete and others, the issue was practically identical, the question being whether the places inhabited by the applicants were buildings within the meaning of the Ordinance. Greef and others inhabited buildings made of corrugated galvanised iron, while Germershuys and others inhabited frame tents with posts driven into the ground and covered over with canvas, and Cloete and others inhabited ordinary tents. In the case of Martinus le Roux, the question was whether applicant was in receipt of wages or salary, so as to entitle him to be registered.

De Villiers, C.J., said that, except in the case of Le Roux, the only question to be decided in these matters, as far as he could gather, was whether these people lived in houses. Did they or did they not occupy houses?

Mr. Van Zyl argued that in each case the applicants were occupying buildings fixed to the soil, that for their purposes they were occupying buildings which served as dwelling-places, and that they were entitled to registration under section 8 of the Constitution Ordinance. He cited Kimberley Mutual Building Society v. Hughes and Others (1, H.C., 241). As to Le Roux's case, he was a contractor, and the question was whether he was receiving salary or wages within the meaning of the Act. Le Roux had apparently earned more than £50 a year. It appeared that he had lived in a zinc house during the period.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But what is the value?]

Mr. Van Zyl: That does not appear from the record. Applicant says that he has earned between £400 and £500 during the last 2½ years. He is employed on a farm.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If he does not occupy a zino house, valued at £75, and he does not receive wages, then he is not entitled to be registered.]

Mr. Van Zyl asked whether the Court would allow Le Roux's case to stand over for further information.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am afraid we could not, as it is time the voters' lists were published.]

Mr. Wallach referred to the English Reform Act of 1832, and cited Powell v. Boriston (18 C.B.D. New Series, 175, and 34 Law Journal, New Series, Common Pleas, 73). Buildings within the meaning of the section should, he urged, be something substantial, and not temporary and removable. These people were bywoners living in buildings which, as described by the Magistrate, were wanting in permanency, and not of the necessary value. He cited Watson v. Cotton (5 C.B.D.).

De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel if he had read the previous case?

Mr. Wallach said that he had, and he admitted that the decision was rather against him.

Hopley, J., asked what had been the fate of the applicants in the present case?

Mr. Wallach said that the Civil Commissioner allowed the claims of Greeff and others occupying galvanised iron buildings, but disallowed the claims of those living in tents.

De Villiers, C.J.: I shall first of all deal with the tents, pure and simple. No doubt, in one sense, they may be called "houses," because they are used as dwellings by those people who have the grazing rights or the rights of occupation of the farms in question. But I do not consider that they can rightly be classed under the denomination of "houses or other buildings," because by no method of construction can a tent be regarded as a building. The use of the word building shows that the legislature required something more than an ordinary tent which may be put up or removed without much labour or trouble. A "building" may not require masonry, but the word implies some degree of trouble, skill and elaboration in fixing or removing the structure, and I therefore consider that the Revising Officer was quite right in holding that persons living in tents were not occupying "houses or other buildings." Then, as to frame tents, or, as I think, they should rather be called "canvas houses," I am of opinion that they may fairly be considered to be "houses or other buildings." A certain amount of building is required for the purpose of constructing frame tents. They are structures consisting of wooden framework attached to poles fixed in the ground, and covered on the top and all sides with canvass. Considering the skill, labour and elaboration required for their erection, they may fairly be considered as having been built. As their value taken with the value of the land occupied therewith amounts to £75 and upwards, I am of opinion that all these people ought to be registered as voters. As to the cases of Wessel P. Germershuys, Dirk Human Jacobus, Germershuys, Philip Loots, John P. de Klerk and Nicolaus G. Swart, the Court is of the opinion that their claims should have been allowed. The same remarks apply a fortiori to the case of the galvanised iron buildings. They are also structures which are erected by driving posts into the ground, and then covering them on all sides with iron, and also roofing them with iron. They are all, in my opinion, houses occupied as such by these people, and their claims were properly allowed by the Magistrate. An objection has been raised to one, that, instead of having his building covered with galvanised iron, it is covered with canvas, but for the reasons I have stated that will make no difference to his case. Therefore, the Revising Officer's decision as to the galvanised iron buildings will be upheld. Then there is the case of Le Roux. There is no evidence whatever as to the value of the house occupied by Le Roux. For aught the Court knows, it may be of the value of £75, but it does not appear whether he occupies any ground attached to that house, and, therefore, if he has any qualification at all it would be under the wages or salary qualification, but there is no proof whatever that he receives wages or salary. He had been a contractor for the previous year, and had drawn a certain amount of money, but the Court has in other cases decided that making money by means of contracts does not amount to receiving wages or salary. He was put on the list by the Magistrate. That must be disallowed. As to the remaining claimants, they for 12 months and upward had lived in houses upon land occupied with such houses under leases of grazing rights, and the value of each of the houses together with the grazing rights clearly amounts to £75 or upwards. Their claim to be registered will therefore be allowed.

Buchanan, J.: I would like to add a few words supplementary to the judgment of the Chief Justice. Considering the circumstances of this country and the habits of the people, and the kind of buildings in which they reside and the kind of houses which they have, it is very difficult to lay down a hard and fast rule as to what should be considered a house and what should not be considered a house but I think there is something as between the two extremes before us, the movable tent and the galvanised house. As far as the galvanised house is concerned, the Revising Officer has allowed those claims, and I think very properly. As far as the tent is concerned, it is not a structure of any kind, but a covering that cannot be considered a house or building in any way. It is very difficult to see where between those two you must fix a line, but I think if you allow a galvanised iron house on framework attached to the soil, and you have framework attached to the soil with a covering of other material it should be considered to be within the Ordinance. As to Le Roux's case, that has been settled by previous decisions.

Hopley, J., concurred.

Mr. Van Zyl applied for costs in the cases of Greef and others and Germershuys and others.

Mr. Wallach urged that no order should be made as to costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: In some cases only the applicants have been successful, and I think the parties had better arrange among themselves as to costs. The Court will make no order.

Ex parte DELPORT AND GROVE.

This was an application by Jurgens J. Delport and Stephanus Andries Grove, of the Kuruman district, to have their names placed on the list of parliamentary voters.

Mr. Pohl was for applicants; Mr. Wallach opposed.

The question raised in the one case was as to whether the applicant occupied premises of sufficient value to entitle him to be registered, and in the other as to whether he (Delport) was entitled to be registered as the occupier of a tent.

The Court decided against Delport's claim, and, as to the other, said that the Revising Officer, in taking into consideration the value of the premises occupied by Grove, appeared to have overlooked the rooms occupied by applicant in addition to his grazing rights. Grove's claim would be allowed.

DUNBAR V. SMALE BROS. { 1907.
AND CO. { Aug. 26th.

This was an appeal from the Resident Magistrate, Elliot, by the defendant Dunbar, in which the Magistrate had given judgment for the plaintiff. The question was whether the property in the partnership of Smale and Dunbar amounted to £190, or £250.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the appellant; Mr. Gutsche appeared for respondent.

After argument on the facts, the matter was referred back to the Magistrate to clear up the evidence given by Mr. Kilbride when he stated that the cash was £147 7s. 6d. banked at June 19, to find out to whose credit was the money banked, and to know if the parties might consent to judgment upon this point, and so obviate the necessity of calling for further evidence.

DUNBAR V. SMAIL.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate of Elliotdale.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for appellant; Mr. Gutsche for respondent.

After argument, Mr. Justice Maasdorp ordered the matter to be referred back to the Magistrate to clear up the evidence of Kilbride, where he states that the cash book shows £140 7s. 6d. deposited in the bank on the 19th June—that is, to whose credit was the money deposited? The parties might consent to an admission on this point, and obviate the necessity of calling for further evidence. He wished to know if Smail got the benefit of the money. If it was put to the credit of Dunbar, he would take it that he never accounted for it.

FIRST DIVISION.

BELL V. ESTATE DOUGLASS { 1907.
AND ANOTHER. { Aug. 27th.
" 28th.
" 29th.

Partner—Partnership account—
Managing partner—Remuneration.

Independantly of a special agreement, a partner who devotes his services to a partnership is not entitled to remuneration.

This was an action brought by John William Bell against (1) John Linden Bradfield and (2) Andrew Barclay Shand, in his capacity as secretary of the Eastern Province Guardian Loan and Investment Company, Arthur Wingfield Douglass, and Edward Wingfield Douglass, all in their capacity as executors testamentary of the estate of the late Hon. Arthur Douglass.

Mr. McGregor stated that a settlement had been made in the case of the first defendant, and the issue now was only as between the plaintiff and the second defendants.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff, heretofore residing at Queen's Town in this colony, now resides at Nairobi, in British East Africa. The defendants are (1) John Linden Bradfield, of Dordrecht, in the division of Wodehouse, and (2) the executors testamentary duly appointed of the estate of the late Arthur Douglass.

2. In or about August, 1895, the plaintiff and the said John Linden Bradfield acquired certain rights to water and a site for electric power works on the farm of Glen Grey Reserve, on the White Kei River, near Queen's Town aforesaid, and had proceeded to establish works, construct buildings, and acquire rights in furtherance of a scheme (known as the Glen Grey Power Works) for supplying electric lighting and energy and otherwise promoting industrial enterprise in the vicinity; and, prior to September, 1896, a sum exceeding £2,000 had been expended on the undertaking.

3. Thereafter the said Douglass purchased a third share in the said venture or undertaking, and the further prosecution thereof for £780, under an agreement dated September 3, 1896, to which plaintiff craves leave to refer at the trial. The said purchase included a share in a certain corn mill, the interest in which belonged to plaintiff alone prior to the said purchase by the said Douglass.

4. Thereafter the said undertaking was proceeded with for account of the plaintiff, the said John Linden Bradfield, and the said Douglass, and rights were acquired, works constructed, and moneys duly expended for the above purposes, and in furtherance of the said undertaking and the prosecution thereof.

5. Plaintiff, as manager of the undertaking (as hereinafter set out), personally advanced and paid out considerable sums of money for the furtherance of the said undertaking, for portion of which sums the said John Linden Bradfield and Arthur Douglass became and were liable; and, though they paid in certain moneys in reduction of their said continuing and increasing liability, the amount expended on their behalf and account exceeded the amounts paid in.

6. Thereafter in June, 1899, the said Douglass wished to have an account of expenditure, and thereupon, after plaintiff had rendered an account, one H. C. Lloyd, duly authorised by a power of attorney from the said Douglass, met plaintiff at Queen's Town and duly audited the accounts relative to the said undertaking and expenditure as agent for the said Douglass, and on the 21st July, 1899, transmitted to plaintiff a copy of the result of his audit, showing on a stated account a balance of £610 6s. 1d. as due to plaintiff by the said Douglass in respect of the moneys expended as aforesaid up to June 30, 1899, the said amount being money actually due, and plaintiff accepting as correct the balance shown.

7. The said £610 6s. 1d. represent the excess of the amount duly advanced by plaintiff on behalf of the said Douglass in furtherance of the said undertaking over the sums paid in by the latter, and his estate, represented by defendants, is liable to reimburse plaintiff in that sum, together with interest thereon (according to the usage obtaining herein between plaintiff and the said Douglass and Bradfield) at 6 per cent. from August 10, 1899, to date of payment.

8. Alternatively, plaintiff says that the said sum represents money paid and advanced by plaintiff on behalf of the said Douglass at his request, and is now owing by defendants, together with interest as aforesaid.

9. Or otherwise, alternatively, he says that in June, 1899, an account was stated between the parties, the said Lloyd acting for the said Douglass, and that on such stated account a balance of £610 6s. 1d. was settled to be due to plaintiff by the said Douglass, and that sum is now owing by defendants, together with interest as aforesaid.

10. On August 10, 1899, plaintiff gave his cheque to the said Douglass for a certain amount payable to him out of an amount paid by one Richard Barry not herein further mentioned) on the understanding that the said Douglass should give his cheque for the said stated amount, but the latter failed so to do, and accordingly plaintiff is entitled to claim interest at 6 per cent. on the said stated sum from the said 10th August.

11. (a) The defendant Bradfield had been cognisant of, and party to, the aforesaid audit of July, 1899, and accounts were duly from time to time rendered to and accepted, and acquiesced in by him, and thereafter, on or about September 30, 1901, plaintiff rendered an account to the said Bradfield, which was accepted and acquiesced in by him, showing as due to plaintiff by Bradfield aforesaid, in respect of the indebtedness set out in paragraph 5 hereof, in furtherance of the said undertaking, an amount of £393 13s. 1d., with interest due thereon (according to the usage obtaining herein between plaintiff and the said Bradfield and Douglass) from 30th September, 1901, to date of payment, less the sums of £34 10s. 1d. (received March 31, 1900) and of £49 3s. 3d. (received October 4, 1900), with interest on such sums from the respective dates of receipt. (b) Alternatively, plaintiff says that the said sum represents money paid and advanced by him on behalf of the said Bradfield, at his request, and is now owing by him with interest as aforesaid, less the aforesaid sums to be severally deducted with interest thereon respectively as aforesaid.

12. (a) On or about the 18th March, 1902, plaintiff, through his son Grahame Bell, acting as his agent, gave his promissory note for £200 to one Shearer, acting for and on behalf of the said Bradfield, for the purpose of enabling the said Shearer to take up certain promissory notes then in the African Banking Corporation, Ltd., Queen's Town, on condition that this sum, if eventually paid by plaintiff, should be deemed to be an advance by plaintiff to the said Bradfield, and also that an account should be made up, and the resultant balance paid by the party who was the debtor on such balance. The said note was to be, and was, utilised to discharge certain older notes on which money had been raised for the purposes of the said undertaking on account of and by agreement between plaintiff and Bradfield aforesaid. (b) On the due date, July 18, 1902, plaintiff was obliged to, and did, take up the said note, and paid the amount thereof, viz., £200; but, though an account having been duly made up, the said Bradfield on the said date was shown to be and was the plaintiff's debtor independently of the said note, he failed on the said due date, and has since failed, to pay any part thereof, and now owes the said sum of £200 to plaintiff, with interest from the said July 18, 1902.

13. For a further count, plaintiff says that during the period from about August, 1895, to about September 3, 1896, he acted as manager in respect of the said undertaking, and the prosecution of the works thereunder on behalf of the said Bradfield and himself, and thereafter during the period from the 3rd September, 1896, to the 3rd August, 1899, he acted as such manager on behalf of the said Douglass, the said Bradfield and himself, and expended much time and labour thereon, by, inter alia, engaging engineers and others, framing indents for plans, engaging transport and superintending delivery, paying wages, keeping accounts, conducting negotiations with the Government and with owners of land, interviewing householders at Queen's Town, obtaining servitudes, visiting Cape Town, negotiating for a sale of leased land, and otherwise, and for his services as such manager—the sum of £1,000 is a fair and reasonable remuneration, and the said Bradfield and the said Douglass were, and the said Bradfield and the executors of the said Douglass, herein sued as the second defendants, now are liable each to pay plaintiff one-third thereof, viz., each of them, £333 6s. 8d.

14. All things have happened entitling plaintiff to be paid the said several sums, but defendants severally refuse to pay any part thereof.

Wherefore plaintiff claims: (A) As against the first defendant: (a) Judgment in the sum of £393 13s. 1d., with interest thereon from September 30, 1901, less the sum of £34 10s. 1d., with interest thereon from March 31, 1900, and the sum of £49 3s. 3d., with interest thereon from October 4, 1900; (b) judgment in the sum of £333 6s. 8d., with interest a tempore morae. (B) As against the second defendants: (c) Judgment in the sum of £610 6s. 1d., with interest thereon at 6 per cent. from August 10, 1899; (d) judgment in the sum of £333 6s. 8d., with interest a tempore morae. (C) As against both the first defendant and the second defendants, severally: (e) Alternative relief; (f) costs of suit.

The second defendants' plea was as follows:

1. They admit paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4, save that they say that the amount exceeding £2,000 spent on the undertaking prior to September, 1896, included expenditure on the mill, and that as to the alleged ownership by the plaintiff alone prior to the said date of the interest in the mill they have no knowledge, and save further that they say that the undertaking was proceeded with as a partnership venture for account of the partners aforesaid.

2. As to paragraph 5, they do not admit that the plaintiff was ever appointed manager of the undertaking, but they admit that he was in the position of managing partner. They admit that from time to time he paid out sums of money for the furtherance of the undertaking, for portion of which sums the said Douglass was liable, and that the said Douglass paid in certain moneys on account of his said liability, but they do not admit that the amount expended on his behalf and account exceeded the amounts paid in, and they put the plaintiff to the proof thereof. They say, further, that it was the duty of the plaintiff to keep proper books and accounts, and that he has never rendered to them, nor did he ever render to the said Douglass, a proper statement of the partnership account duly supported by vouchers showing inter alia the moneys expended by him on behalf of the undertaking, whereby they or the said Douglass could ascertain what sum, if any, was owing by the said Douglass.

3. As to paragraphs 6, 7, 8, and 9, they admit that in or about June, 1899, the said Douglass requested the plaintiff to render him a proper statement of account, and say that on divers occasions prior to the said date the said Douglass had requested the plaintiff to render him such account. They admit that in the said month the plaintiff did render an account, but say it was incorrect, and was not duly supported by vouchers. They admit that in July, 1899, the said Douglass appointed one Lloyd to investigate the affairs and account of the undertaking, to audit the accounts of the syndicate, and to report thereon, but they deny that the said Lloyd had any authority from the said Douglass to state an account between the plaintiff and the said Douglass, or in any way to bind the said Douglass, and they deny that on behalf of the said Douglass he purported to state an account so as to bind the said Douglass. They admit that the said Lloyd did, after investigation, report in writing on the accounts of the undertaking, and for the terms of the said report they crave leave to refer to the same when produced at the trial. They deny that the sum of £610 6s. 1d. represents the excess of the amounts expended by the plaintiff on behalf of the undertaking over the sums paid in by the said Douglass, and that the said Douglass owed, or his estate now owes, the said sum to the plaintiff. They have no knowledge of any excess as alleged, or of any sum owing by the said estate to the plaintiff, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof. Save as above, they deny the allegations in paragraphs 6, 7, 8, and 9.

4. As to paragraph 10, they admit that in or about August 10, 1899, the plaintiff gave his cheque to the said Douglass for £831 6s., being a sum payable to him out of an amount paid by one Barry into the plaintiff's hands for account of the syndicate, but they deny that there was any understanding that the said Douglass should give his cheque for the sum of £610 6s. 1d., or for any amount. They admit that the said Douglass did not give the plaintiff his cheque for the said amount, or any part thereof. Save as above, they deny the allegations in paragraph 10.

5. As to paragraphs 11 and 12, save that they admit that the defendant Bradfield was cognisant of the investigation of the accounts of the syndicate by the said Lloyd, they have no knowledge of the allegations therein contained, do not admit the same and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof.

6. As to paragraph 13, they admit that the plaintiff in his capacity as partner did expend time and labour on the undertaking, but they deny that he is entitled to the sum of £1,000, or to any remuneration therefor, and crave leave to refer to the agreement of the 3rd September, 1896, when produced at the trial for the terms of the partnership.

7. Save that they admit that they refuse to pay any sum to the plaintiff, they deny the allegations contained in paragraph 14.

Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs. Mr. McGregor, K.C. (with him Mr. (Case), for plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Sutton), for the second defendants.

John Wm. Bell, the plaintiff, was called. He said that until September of last year he was Master of the Supreme Court at Pretoria. He detailed the circumstances which led to the establishment of the electric power works, as stated in the declaration, and to the purchase of an interest by the late Mr. Arthur Douglass. Before the agreement was entered into, Mr. Douglass went out, and saw what had been done in connection with the enterprise. Very much less work had been done at that time than had subsequently to be done. Witness superintended the control of the work from the beginning, and continued to do so until Mr. Barry was appointed manager in 1899. Mr. Douglass was advised from time to time of what was being done, and of the expenditure that was being made. Witness went out weekly—often twice a week—to the place. He particularised the work he did in connection with the matter. After Mr. Douglass came in, about £5,000 was spent on the undertaking. The total cost of the work was about £7,000. The expenditure made from time to time was never questioned either by Mr. Bradfield or Mr. Douglass. There was a proposal to admit one Barry as a partner in the syndicate, whereupon Mr. Douglass offered to retire from the concern on being paid back the £1,700 odd which he had paid in, plus interest. Mr. Bradfield said he was sure Mr. Douglass would consent to Mr. Barry coming in, and he agreed on Douglass's behalf, to Barry coming in. Bradfield and Douglass had been doing everything together in connection with the scheme. Douglass afterwards wrote refusing to agree to Barry coming in, and asking for a statement of accounts, which witness sent. This showed the expenditure from May, 1896, until 1899. Mr. Douglass sent up a representative (Mr. Lloyd) to investigate the accounts on his behalf. Lloyd went into the accounts very carefully, and took about three days over the auditing. Lloyd, after his return to Graham's Town, forwarded witness a copy of the balance he had drawn up, showing £610 due to witness. The plaintiff went on to give evidence at length as to the correspondence and accounts. He said that the scheme was not yet in operation, but it was in working order, and it was hoped the Queen's Town Council would shortly purchase it. Witness had the command of a corps during the war, and afterwards became Master of the Supreme Court of the Transvaal. He was kept very busy, but on coming to Cape Town in June, 1905, when Mr. Douglass was still alive, he instructed his attorneys to take proceedings. The claim for remuneration for witness's work was, he considered, a reasonable one. Mr. Barry received payment, but did nothing like the amount of work witness did.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Douglas had withheld his consent to Barry coming into the syndicate, until he could get his account stated. He had not definitely told Barry that the amount put into the concern was £10,000, but had said that he could come into the syndicate at that figure. In 1899 he had accepted a requisition to stand for a seat on the Town Council, and meant to work in the matter of securing electric lighting for the town, but he was not doing so from personal interest. He had a perfectly clear conscience in adopting that attitude, feeling sure that electricity would be a great boon to the town. When admitting Douglass he had put £150 premium on to the purchase price of the mill machinery, because he had been able to secure it at half cost, and did not see that Douglass should benefit thereby. Douglass asked no questions about actual cost, when he joined the syndicate, but simply came in on Bradfield's representations, and his own inspection of the scheme. Witness had never agreed that his payment for management services should be by shares when the company should be floated. He had not liked to sue Bradfield, because they were related by marriage. They had had an acrimonious correspondence, and finally Bradfield had settled his claim by payment of £300. Bradfield said that witness's actions had not been marked by a friendly spirit, but that was to be accounted for by the fact that when a man was asked to pay money he often "cut up rough." Douglass verbally never took up the position that he declined to pay either the £600 on the account or the £333 for the management charges, but only maintained that he was not satisfied as to the amounts. His letters were not in agreement with that attitude, but witness did not consider that remarkable in Douglass. In Cape Town, when witness paid over the share of Barry's entrance money to Douglass, it was only because he had been given to understand by Douglass that he would return his cheque for £600. Witness had kept no separate books of the syndicate's accounts. He had taken no credit in the syndicate's name. All the accounts were kept in his own business books. Douglass had come unexpectedly on the 15th March, 1899, to see the accounts, and had been shown everything, and then had paid a cheque for £466 3s. 4d. on account. He knew of other outstanding accounts to the amount of £880, and another item of £200 wrongly struck out of the reckoning. Witness was surprised at the calculation that the works should not have cost within £1,300 of what had been spent. He had got the work done extremely cheaply—natives at 1s. per day without food, masons 12s. per day, and overseers 5s. per day. He had bought the material exceptionally cheaply also. When he had stopped his cheque for £800, and Douglass had sued him in the Circuit Court, he had not defended it, because Barry thought it would spoil the prospects of the syndicate if its affairs were dragged into Court. He had been unaware until some time afterwards that the audit by Lloyd had been jointly paid for by Douglass and Bradfield. Bradfield had written a letter to him in connection with the monetary affairs of this transaction, which he had afterwards withdrawn, and witness did not now remember the contents. Douglass had declined to have any transactions with him after the Circuit Court matter, but Douglass was no gentleman.

Re-examined by Mr. McGregor, the witness said he had written at the time to Bradfield his reasons for not going on with his defence to the claim by Douglass for £800.

Mr. Harry Gibson, accountant, testified to having examined the accounts of the syndicate. He had copied the accounts press-copied into Mr. Bell's book, and the originals of which were stated to have been taken away by Mr. Lloyd.

He gave evidence in detail as to the accounts. Witness testified as to the manner in which plaintiff kept joint books as a usual practice.

In cross-examination, the witness stated that goods supplied to the syndicate were allotted by plaintiff to the accounts of the syndicate.

Mr. McGregor closed his case.

Mr. H. O. Lloyd, of Graham's Town, stated he went into Bell's accounts on behalf of the other partners in the syndicate. In his opinion, the plaintiff over-stated his claim.

Wm. James Tamlin, quantity surveyor, of Queen's Town, gave evidence concerning the survey of the works, and controverted the statement of plaintiff to the effect that the furrow leading to the works was driven for considerable distance through solid granite; whereas the plaintiff stated the cost of this excavation at 20s. per cubic yard, whilst witness estimated it as 3s. 6d., as the material consisted of boulders and gravel.

In cross-examination, the witness stated that he started quantity surveying at 18 years of age. He had never done any hydraulic works himself.

Mr. McGregor: Then what you know is derived from common-sense or other books?

Witness: What do you mean?

Mr. McGregor: Oh, never mind.

Witness (continuing) said that a charge of dynamite would move about 6 cubic feet of earth. Of the 325 yards blasted, two-fifths would be rock and three-fifths earth. Molesworth contended that a charge of dynamite would move 6 cubic yards.

Mr. McGregor: Well, I think we'll leave Mr. Molesworth where he is. Of course, I quite respect Mr. Molesworth, but where does he hail from?

Witness: His is a recognised work on engineering.

Mr. McGregor: But where is he? Where does he hail from?

Witness: In England.

Mr. McGregor: He has not been out here, has he?

Witness: I cannot say.

Mr. McGregor: Well, we'll leave Mr. Molesworth where he is.

Robert Ed Atkins, employee of Peacock Bros., gave evidence as to articles being charged in his firm's books to Bell individually, and not to the syndicate.

James Robinson, bookkeeper, in the employ of Peacock Bros., said he had had the books of Tiffin and Sons in his hands since February, 1905. The items supplied to Bell were charged up to him, but there was no mention of the syndicate.

Charles Murray Ingledue, railway engineer, gave evidence with regard to the cost of blasting stone. The blasting of granite cost about 3s. 6d. per cubic yard—that was, for a large quantity. The cost of cutting a furrow with granite in it would cost about 6s. per cubic yard. He never heard of 20s. a cubic yard being paid for such work. When making his estimate, he estimated labour at 3s. a day per head. Of course, if labour could be obtained for 1s. a day, the estimate would be less.

In cross-examination, witness stated he had been both an engineer and sub-contractor during the six years he had spent in South Africa. He had made furrows in Rhodesia. There was plenty of rock there. It cost him 3s. 6d. per cubic yard.

Mr. McGregor: What was the total cost?—I cannot say.

But you remember the cost per yard so well?—We do all work by yards. We think in yards.

Continuing, witness said the reason he was so confident of the cost per yard was because all work was tendered for by the yard.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Mr. McGregor maintained in argument that after Lloyd made an investigation of the syndicate's affairs, Douglass did not throw any light upon the manner in which he took exception to plaintiff's claim. Hence defendants must be bound by Lloyd's report, upon which plaintiff based his claim. No suggestion of mala fides had been brought against plaintiff.

Mr. Schreiner said that any claim of the kind submitted by plaintiff must be subjected to a great deal of scrutiny. When a claim had been repudiated by defendant during his lifetime, and when he had lived for years unmolested by claimant, and when claimant after defendant's death preferred the claim—which he represented as being undisputed, but as to the amount of which there might be some dispute—then the ordinary principle of requiring close investigation was trebly fortified, and the Court would go rather narrowly into plaintiff's statements. When a claimant had had every opportunity for years to bring an action, and did not do so, then it was a matter for comment when the case was eventually brought into Court. Proceeding, counsel laid stress upon the contention that plaintiff did not keep proper books, as Douglass had complained, and Bell acknowledged in the correspondence.

Without calling upon Mr. McGregor to reply,

Maasdorp, J.: It seems that some time before September, 1896, the plaintiff and Mr. Bradford entered into a joint venture for the construction of certain buildings, machinery and plant, with the object of supplying electric light to Queen's Town. In September, 1896, certain expenditure had been incurred, properties had been acquired, and the works had made some progress. During that month Mr. Douglass came forward and entered into negotiations with the joint venturers for the purchase of a third share in this venture of theirs. This purchase was made after inquiries had been made by Mr. Douglass, and after he had himself seen the work which had been done and the property that had been acquired, he purchased a one-third share in the concern for £700. I consider that when he did so he considered that he had received value for his money. That is to say, he entered into the partnership, being satisfied that the concern was worth at least £2,340. From that time the three joint venturers were only in the business, but it was wholly conducted by the plaintiff, who by common consent became the managing partner. Everything was left in his hands, and he carried on the whole business of purchasing the necessary material, paying the necessary expenses, and acquiring the necessary properties for this venture. From time to time his partners paid on account certain moneys to cover the expenditure made by him, and in the year 1889 a question arose between Mr. Douglass and the plaintiff with respect to the state of the accounts and Mr. Douglass's indebtedness. After certain interviews and after discussion of the accounts between the plaintiff and Mr. Douglass, it was found necessary to make an end to the differences that existed between them, and Mr. Douglass employed Mr. Lloyd to proceed to Queen's Town and inquire into the matter. The plaintiff now claims from Mr. Douglass's estate the sum of £610, and it has been satisfactorily proved that merely as a matter of bookkeeping, and an examination of the items alleged to have a bearing upon this business that the claim of the plaintiff stands at the figure of £610. In 1899 he rendered an account to Mr. Douglass, which, after allowing for an error which he subsequently admitted, the figure was brought by him close to the sum of £610. Mr. Douglass was not satisfied with this account, and he obtained the assistance of an accountant to inquire into the matter for him. Now, supposing that the case had come into Court without the assistance previously of inquiries made by accountants, the first thing that the Court would have done would be to have directed an accountant to make the necessary inquiries and report, and I think if that had been the position, the Court could have done no better than employ a man of the experience and position of Mr. Lloyd to proceed to Queen's Town, and make the necessary inquiry on behalf of the Court. Mr. Lloyd examined the books, and as far as the correctness of the items was concerned, he had to depend upon the statements made by the plaintiff. Accepting these statements and examining the books, he arrives at the figure of £610. Again, after that, another accountant is employed to go into the matter thoroughly, and Mr. Gibson, a very able accountant, has told the Court that he found as a result of his inquiries the figure found by Mr. Lloyd to be the correct indebtedness upon the books as they stood, and he says there is nothing in the books to create any suspicion that they were not properly kept, and, to his mind, the entries were made in the ordinary course of business from time to time, and they seemed to him to be genuinely entered as items in this concern. So far only we have arrived at the indebtedness as shown upon the books, but that is far from concluding the matter, because the books do not prove the transactions alleged in them. It is now necessary for the plaintiff to produce evidence to show that the transactions which are entered in the books actually took place, and that the indebtedness is not merely a matter of figures upon the books, but of real transactions which of his own knowledge have taken place. The plaintiff has come forward to supply that evidence. The first inquiry is, did he possess the necessary knowledge, and the next inquiry would be, does he display the necessary honesty for the Court to rely upon his statements. As to his knowledge of this affair, he seems to have conducted this business in all its trivial details from the beginning to the end, and has had a full and accurate knowledge of every little transaction that took place from time to time. It was not a very complicated business. It was apparently very plain sailing. There is nothing very complex in the nature of the business. Materials had to be bought and paid for, and labour had to be employed and paid. That is an answer to the question of whether the plaintiff was likely to possess the necessary knowledge. It is probable that he should possess it, and he speaks positively. He is fully aware of all the transactions as they appear in the books that he has checked them from time to time, and that he saw the works from time to time, as they proceeded, and he has no doubt that what was entered in the books represents the actual business of this concern, and that the figures are correct with reference to these transactions. Now this is a bare statement made by the plaintiff, and, of course, it can be controverted. In the first place the inquiry might arise whether there is not something in the conduct of the plaintiff, which shows that his evidence cannot be wholly relied upon. And so his evidence may be impeached, and if impeached in some detail, in some trivial matter it may seriously impair the value of his evidence generally. Now, the way in which the defendants attempt to impeach
